The mode of carrying on the war in Ireland was a method with which Schomberg was entirely unacquainted. The forces he had to combat were incursive, barbarous, and shy; those he had to command were tumultuary, ungovernable, and brave. He did not sufficiently consider the dangers which threatened the health of his troops by being confined to one place; and he kept them in a low moist clump, near Dundalk, without firing almost of any kind; so that the men fell into fevers and fluxes, and died in great abundance. The enemy likewise were afflicted with similar disorders. Both camps remained for some time in sight of each other, and at last the rainy season approaching, they both, as if by mutual consent, quitted their camps at the same time, and retired into winter quarters, without attempting to take advantage of each other's retreat.

The bad success of the late campaign in Ireland, and the miserable situation of the Protestants in that country, at length induced king William to attempt their relief in person, at the opening of the ensuing spring. Accordingly on the 4th of June, 1690, the king set out for Ireland, attended by prince George of Denmark, the duke of Ormond, the earls of Oxford, Scarborough, Manchester, and many other persons of distinction: on the 14th he landed at Carrickfergus, from whence he immediately proceeded to Belfast, where he was met by the duke of Schomberg, the prince of Wirtemberg, major-general Kirke, and several other officers. By this time colonel Wolsey, at the head of a thousand men, had defeated a strong detachment of the enemy near Belturbat: sir John Lanier had taken Bedloe Castle; and that of Charlemont, a strong post of great importance, together with Balingargy, near Cavan, had been reduced. King William, having reposed himself for two or three days at Belfast, visited the duke's head quarters at Lisburne: then advancing to Hillsborough, published an order against pressing horses, and committing violence on the country people. When some of his general officers proposed cautious measures, he declared he did not come to Ireland to let the grass grow under his feet. He ordered the army to encamp and be reviewed at Loughbrilland, where he found it amount to six and thirty thousand effective men well appointed. He then marched to Dundalk; and afterwards advanced to Ardee, which the enemy had just abandoned.

James trusted so much to the disputes in the English parliament, that he did not believe his son-in-law would be able to quit that kingdom; and William had been six days in Ireland before James received intimation of his arrival. This was no sooner known, than he left Dublin under a guard of the militia commanded by Luttrel, and with a reinforcement of six thousand infantry, which he had lately received from France, joined the rest of his forces, which now almost equalled William's army in number, exclusive of about fifteen thousand men who remained in different garrisons. He occupied a very advantageous post on the bank of the Boyne, and, contrary to the advice of his general officers resolved to risk a battle. They proposed to strengthen their garrisons, and retire to the Shannon, to wait the effect of the operations at sea. Louis had promised to equip a powerful armament against the English fleet, and send over a great number of small frigates to destroy William's transports, as soon as their convoy should be returned to England. The execution of this scheme was not at all difficult, and must have proved fatal to the English army; for their stores and ammunition were still on board; the ships sailed along the coast as the troops advanced in their march; and there was not one secure harbour to which they could retire in case of emergency. James, however, was bent upon hazarding an engagement; and expressed uncommon confidence and alacrity. Besides the river, which was deep, his front was secured by a morass and a rising ground: so that the English army could not attack him without manifest disadvantage.

King William marched up to the opposite bank of the river, and, as he reconnoitred their situation, was exposed to the fire of some field pieces which the enemy purposely planted against his person. They killed a man and two horses close by him; and the second bullet rebounding from the earth, grazed upon his right shoulder, so as to carry off part of his clothes and skin, and produce a considerable contusion. This accident, which he bore without the least emotion, created some confusion among his attendants, which the enemy perceiving, concluded he was killed, and shouted aloud in token of their joy. The whole camp resounded with acclamation; and several squadrons of their horse were drawn down towards the river, as if they intended to pass it immediately, and attack the English army. The report was instantly communicated from place to place, until it reached Dublin; from thence it was conveyed to Paris, where, contrary to the custom of the French court, the people were encouraged to celebrate the event by bonfires and illuminations. William rode along the lines to shew himself to the army after this narrow escape. At night he called a council of war; and declared his resolution to attack the enemy in the morning. Schomberg at first opposed his design; but finding the king determined, he advised that a strong detachment of horse and foot should that night pass the Boyne at Slane Bridge, and take post between the enemy and the pass at Duleck, that the action might be more decisive. This counsel being rejected, the king determined, that, early in the morning, lieutenant-general Douglas, with the right wing of infantry, and young Schomberg with the horse, should pass at Slane Bridge, while the main body of foot should force their passage at Old Bridge, and the left at certain fords between the enemy's camp and Drogheda. The duke, perceiving his advice was not relished by the Dutch generals, retired to his tent, where the order of battle being brought to him, he received it with an air of discontent, saying, it was the first that had ever been sent to him in that manner. The proper dispositions being made, William rode quite through the army by torch-light, and then retired to his tent, after having given orders to the soldiers to distinguish themselves from the enemy by wearing green boughs in their hats during the action.

At six o'clock in the morning general Douglas, with young Schomberg, the earl of Portland, and Auverquerque, marched towards Slane Bridge, and passed the river with very little opposition. When they reached the farther bank, they perceived the enemy drawn up in two lines, to a considerable number of horse and foot, with a morass in their front; so that Douglas was obliged to wait for a reinforcement. This being arrived, the infantry was led to the charge through the morass, while count Schomberg rode round it with his cavalry, to attack the enemy in flank. The Irish, instead of waiting the assault, faced about, and retreated towards Duleck with some precipitation; yet not so fast, but that Schomberg fell upon their rear, and did considerable execution. James, however, soon reinforced his left wing from the centre; and the count was obliged in his turn to send for assistance. At this juncture William's main body, consisting of the Dutch guards, the French regiments, and some battalions of English, passed the river, which was waist high, under a general discharge of artillery. James had imprudently removed his cannon from the other side; but he had posted a strong body of musqueteers along the bank, behind hedges, houses, and some works raised for the occasion. These poured in a close fire upon the English troops before they reached the shore; but it produced very little effect: then the Irish gave way; and some battalions landed without further opposition. Yet before they could form, they were charged with great impetuosity by a squadron of the enemy's horse; and a considerable body of their cavalry and foot, commanded by general Hamilton, advanced from behind some little hillocks to attack those that were landed, as well as to hinder the rest from reaching the shore. His infantry turned their backs, and fled immediately; but the horse charged with incredible fury, both upon the bank and in the river, so as to put the unformed regiments into confusion. Then the duke of Schomberg passed the river in person, put himself at the head of the French protestants, and pointing to the enemy, said, "Gentlemen, those are your persecutors;" and with these words he advanced to the attack, where he himself sustained a violent onset from a party of the Irish horse, which had broke through one of the regiments, and were now on their return. They were mistaken for English, and allowed to gallop up to the duke, who received two severe wounds in the head: but the French regiments being now sensible of their mistake, rashly threw in their fire upon the Irish while they were engaged with the duke; and instead of saving, shot him dead on the spot. The fate of this general had well nigh proved fatal to the English army, which was immediately involved in tumult and disorder, while James's infantry rallied, and returned to their posts with a face of resolution. They were just ready to fall upon the centre, when king William having passed with the left wing, composed of the Danish, Dutch, and Inniskillin horse, advanced to attack them on the right. They were struck with such a panic at this appearance, that they made a sudden halt, and then facing about, retreated to the village of Dunore. There they made such a vigorous stand, that the Dutch and Danish horse, though headed by the king in person, recoiled; even the Inniskilliners gave way; and the whole wing would have been routed, had not a detachment of dragoons, belonging to the regiment of Cunningham and Luison, dismounted, and lined the hedges on each side of the defile through which the fugitives were driven. There they did such execution upon the pursuers as soon checked their ardour. The horse, which were broken, had now time to rally, and returning to the charge, drove the enemy before them in their turn. In this action, general Hamilton, who had been the life and soul, as it were of the Irish during the whole engagement, was wounded and taken: an incident which discouraged them to such a degree, that they made no farther efforts to retrieve the advantage they had lost. He was immediately brought to the king, who asked him, if he thought the Irish would make any farther resistance; and he replied, "Upon my honour I believe they will; for they have still a good body of horse entire." William, eyeing him with a look of disdain, repeated, "Your honour! your honour!" but took no other notice of his having acted contrary to his engagement, when he was permitted to go to Ireland, on promise of persuading Tyrconnel to submit to the new government. The Irish now abandoned the field with precipitation; but the French and Swiss troops, that acted as their auxiliaries, under Lauzun, retreated in good order, after having maintained the battle for some time with intrepidity and perseverance.

As king William did not think proper to pursue the enemy, the carnage was not great. The Irish lost fifteen hundred men, and the English about one-third of that number; though the victory was dearly purchased, considering the death of the gallant duke of Schomberg, who fell in the eighty-second year of his age, after having rivalled the best generals of the age in military reputation (y). This battle proved likewise fatal to the brave Caillemore, who had followed the duke's fortunes, and commanded one of the protestant regiments. After having received a mortal wound, he was carried back through the river by four soldiers, and though almost in the agonies of death, he with a chearful countenance encouraged those who were crossing to do their duty, exclaiming, "A la gloire, mes enfans; à la gloire!" that is, "To glory, my lads: to glory!" The third remarkable person who lost his life on this occasion was Walker, the clergyman, who had so valiantly defended Londonderry against James's whole army. He had been very graciously received by king William, who gratified him with a reward of five thousand pounds, and a promise of further favour; but his military genius still predominating, he attended his royal patron in this battle, and, being shot in the belly, died in a few minutes.—The persons of distinction who fell on the side of James were the lords Dongan and Carlingford, sir Neile O Neile, and the marquis of Hocquincourt. James himself stood aloof during the action, on the hill of Dunmore, surrounded with some squadrons of horse; and seeing victory declare against him, retired to Dublin, without having made the least effort to re-assemble his broken forces. Had he possessed either spirit or conduct, his army might have been rallied, and reinforced from his garrisons, so as to be in a condition to keep the field, and even act upon the offensive; for his loss was inconsiderable, and the victor did not attempt to molest his troops in their retreat—an omission which has been charged upon him as a flagrant instance of misconduct. Indeed, through the whole of this engagement, William's personal courage was much more conspicuous than his skill in military tactics.

No sooner did James arrive at Dublin, than he assembled the magistrates and council of the city, and in a short speech advised them to make the best terms they could with the victor. He complained of the cowardice of the Irish; signified his resolution of leaving the kingdom immediately; forbade them, on their allegiance, to burn or plunder the city after his departure; and assured them, that, though he was obliged to yield to force, he would never cease to labour for their deliverance. The next day he set out for Waterford, attended by the duke of Berwick, Tyrconnel, and the marquis of Powis. He ordered all the bridges to be broken down behind him, and embarked on board a vessel which had been previously prepared for his reception. At sea he fell in with the sieur de Foran, who persuaded him to go on board one of his frigates, which was a prime sailer. In this he was safely conveyed to France, and returned to the place of his former residence at St. Germain's. James had no sooner quitted Dublin, than it was also abandoned by all the partizans of the Romish church. The protestants immediately took possession of the arms belonging to the militia, under the conduct of the bishops of Meath and Limeric. A committee was formed to take charge of the administration; and an account of these transactions was transmitted to king William, together with a petition that he would honour the city with his presence.

At an early hour on the day following the battle of the Boyne, William ordered a detachment of horse and foot, under the command of M. Mellionere, to march to Drogheda, the governor of which surrendered the place without opposition. William then directed his march towards Dublin, at the head of his army, and halted the first night at Bally Breghan, where, being informed of the enemy's retreat from the capital, he dispatched the duke of Ormond, with a body of horse, to take possession. The duke was immediately followed by the Dutch guards, who secured the castle. Shortly after William encamped at Finglas in the vicinity of Dublin, where the bishops of Meath and Limeric, at the head of the protestant clergy, waited on him, and received assurances from the monarch (y) The duke of Schomberg was descended from a noble family in the Palatinate, and his mother was an English woman, the daughter of lord Dudley. Being obliged to leave his country on account of the troubles by which it was agitated, he commenced a soldier of fortune, and served successively in the armies of Holland, England, France, Portugal, and Brandenburgh. He attained to the dignities of Mareschal in France, Grandee in Portugal, Generalissimo in Prussia, and Duke in England. He professed the Protestant religion; was courteous and humble in his deportment: cool, penetrating, resolute, and sagacious; nor was his probity inferior to his courage.

of his favour and protection. He then issued a declaration of pardon to all the common people who had served against him, provided they should return to their dwellings, and surrender their arms by the first of August. Those persons that rented lands of popish proprietors who had been concerned in the late rebellion, were directed to retain their rents in their own hands, until they should have notice from the commissioners of the revenue to whom they should be paid. In the mean time, the principal officers of James's army, after having seen him embark at Waterford, returned to their troops, determined to carry on the war so long as they could be supplied with the requisite means to execute their purpose.

While these things were carrying on, the queen, as regent, found herself surrounded with numberless cares and perplexities. Her council being composed of Whigs and Tories, were not always unanimous. She was also distracted between her apprehensions for her father's safety and her husband's life: she was threatened by an invasion by the French from abroad, and by an insurrection of the Jacobites at home. But she prudently disguised her fears, and behaved with equal prudence and fortitude. Advice being received that a fleet was ready to sail from Brest, lord Torrington hoisted his flag in the Downs, and sailed to St. Helen's in order to assemble such a number of ships as would enable him to give them battle. The enemy being discovered off Plymouth, on the 20th of June, the English admiral, reinforced with a Dutch squadron, stood out to sea, with a view to intercept them at the back of the Isle of Wight, should they presume to sail up the Channel: not that he thought himself strong enough to cope with them in battle. The French fleet consisted of seventy-eight ships of war, and two-and-twenty fire-ships; whereas, the combined squadrons of England and Holland did not exceed six-and-fifty; but he had received orders to hazard an engagement, if he thought it might be done with any prospect of success. After the hostile fleets had continued five days in sight of each other, lord Torrington bore down upon the enemy, off Beachy-head, on the 30th of the same month, at daybreak. The Dutch squadron, which composed the van, began the engagement about nine in the morning: in about half an hour the blue division of the English, commanded by sir Ralph Delaval, were closely engaged with the rear of the French: but the red, which formed the centre, under the command of lord Torrington in person, did not fill the line till ten o'clock, so that the Dutch were almost surrounded by the enemy, and, though they fought with great valour, sustained considerable damage. At length, the admiral's division drove between them and the French, and in that situation the fleet anchored about five in the afternoon, when the action was interrupted by a calm. The Dutch had suffered so severely, that, Torrington thought it would be imprudent to renew the action; he, therefore, weighed anchor in the night, and with the tide of flood retired to the eastward. The next day the disabled ships were destroyed, that they might not be retarded in their retreat. They were pursued as far as Rye: an English ship of seventy guns being stranded near Winchelsea, was set on fire, and deserted, by the captain's command. A Dutch ship of sixty-four guns met with the same accident, and some French frigates attempted to burn her; but the captain defended her so vigorously that they were obliged to desist, and he afterwards found means to carry her safely into Holland. In this engagement the English lost two ships, two sea-captains, and about four hundred men; but the Dutch were more unfortunate: six of their ships were destroyed. Dick and Brackel, rear-admirals, were slain, together with a great number of inferior officers and seamen. Torrington retreated without further interruption into the mouth of the Thames, and, having taken precaution against any attempts of the enemy in that quarter, returned to London, the inhabitants of which were overwhelmed with consternation and alarm.

The government was likewise infected with the same panic. The ministry pretended to believe that the French acted in concert with the malcontents of the nation; that insurrections in the different parts of the kingdom had been projected by the Jacobites; and that there would be a general revolt in Scotland. These insinuations were circulated by the court agents, in order to justify the measures that were deemed necessary at this juncture; and they produced the desired effect. The apprehensions thus artfully raised among the people inflamed their aversion to nonjurors and Jacobites. Addresses were presented to the queen by the Cornish tinners, the lieutenancy of Middlesex, the mayor, aldermen, and lieutenancy of London, filled with expressions of loyalty, and promises of supporting their majesties, as their lawful sovereigns, against all opposition. The queen, at this crisis, exhibited remarkable proofs of courage, activity, and discretion. She issued proper orders for putting the nation in a posture of defence, as well as for refitting and augmenting the fleet: she took measures for appeasing the resentment of the States-General, who exclaimed against the earl of Torrington for his behaviour in the late action. He was deprived of his command, and sent to the Tower, and commissioners were appointed to examine into his conduct. A camp was formed near Torbay, where the French seemed to threaten a descent. Their fleet, which lay at anchor in the bay, cannonaded the village of Teignmouth. About a thousand of their men landed without opposition, set fire to the place, and burned a few coasting vessels: after which they re-embarked, and returned to Brest, so elated with this atchievement, that they printed a pompous account of their invasion. Some of the Whigs published pamphlets, and diffused reports, which implied that the bishops who had been suspended were concerned in the conspiracy against the government: and these arts so wrought upon the common people, that the prelates thought proper to print a paper, in which they asserted their own innocence in the most solemn manner. It does not appear that the court harboured any suspicion against them, otherwise it is probable they would not have escaped imprisonment. The queen issued a proclamation for the apprehension of the earls of Litchfield, Aylesbury, and Castlemain; viscount Preston; the lords Montgomery and Bellasis; sir Edward Hales, sir Robert Tharold, sir Robert Hamilton, sir Theophilus Oglethorpe, colonel Edward Sackville, and some other officers. These were accused of having conspired with other disaffected persons to disturb and destroy the government, and of a design to concur with her majesty's enemies in the intended invasion. The earl of Torrington continued a prisoner in the Tower till next session, when he was brought into the house of commons, and made a speech in his own defence. His case produced long debates in the upper house, where the form of his commitment was judged illegal: at length he was tried by a court-martial, appointed by the commissioners of the Admiralty, though not before an act had passed, declaring the power of a lord high-admiral vested in those commissioners. The president of the court was sir Ralph Delaval, who had acted as vice admiral of the blue in the engagement. The earl was acquitted, but the king dismissed him from the service; and the Dutch exclaimed against his judges for having acted with partiality.

We have before observed that James's friends were determined to second those interests which he himself had abandoned. Limeric, a strong city in the province of Munster, still held out for the late king, and braved all the attempts of William's army to reduce it. Sarsfield, a popular and experienced general, put himself at the head of the army that had been routed at the Boyne, and went farther into the country to defend the banks of the river Shannon, where he resolved to await the enemy. James, though he would not defend the country himself, determined that none but such as were agreeable to him should defend it. He therefore appointed St. Ruth, a French general, who had signalized himself against the protestants in France, to command over Sarsfield, which gave the Irish universal discontent, as it shewed that James could neither rely on their skill nor their fidelity. On the other hand, general Ginckle, who had been appointed to the command of the English army in the absence of William, who was gone over to England, advanced with his forces to meet the enemy, towards the Shannon, in order to pass that broad and dangerous river. The only place where it was fordable was at, Athlone, a strong walled town, built on both sides of the river, and defending that important pass. That part of the town which lay on the hither side of the river was quickly taken sword in hand by the English; but the part on the opposite bank being defended with great vigour, was for a while thought impregnable. At length it was resolved, in a council of war, that a body of forlorn hope should ford the stream in the face of the enemy, which desperate attempt was performed with great resolution; the enemy were driven from their works, and the town surrendered at discretion.

discretion. St. Ruth marched his army to give it relief, but he arrived too late; for when he approached the walls his own guns were turned upon him. No sooner did he behold this, than his fears increased in proportion to his former confidence; and dreading the impetuosity of a victorious enemy in his very camp, he instantly marched away, and took post at Aghrim, ten miles distant. Here he determined to await the English army, and decide the fate of Ireland at one blow.

Having put Athlone in a posture of defence, general Ginckel passed the Shannon, and marched towards the enemy, determined to give them battle, though his forces did not exceed eighteen thousand men, while that of the enemy was above twenty-five thousand. The Irish were posted in a very advantageous situation; the centre extended along a rising ground, uneven in many places, intersected with banks and ditches, joined by lines of communication, and fronted by a large bog almost impassable. His right was fortified with entrenchments, and his left secured by the castle of Aghrim. He harangued his army in the most pathetic strain, conjuring them to exert their courage in defence of their holy religion, in the extirpation of heresy, in recovering their ancient honours and estates, and in restoring a pious king to the throne, from whence he had been expelled by an unnatural usurper. He employed even the priests to enforce his exhortations; to assure the men that they might depend on the prayers of the church; and that, in case they should fall in battle, the saints and angels would convey their souls to heaven. They are said to have sworn upon the sacrament, that they would not desert their colours, and to have received an order that no quarter should be given to the French heretics in the army of the prince of Orange. Ginckel had encamped on the Roscommon side of the river Suc, within three miles of the enemy: after having reconnoitred their posture, he resolved, with the advice of a council of war, to attack them on Sunday the 12th of July, 1691. The necessary orders being given, the army passed the river at two fords and a stone bridge, and, advancing to the edge of the great bog, began about twelve o'clock to force the two passages, in order to possess the ground on the other side. The enemy fought with surprizing fury, and the horse were several times repulsed; but, at length, the troops upon the right carried their point by means of some field pieces. The day was now so far advanced, that the general determined to postpone the battle till next morning; but perceiving some disorder among the enemy, and fearing they would decamp in the night, he altered his resolution, and ordered the attack to be renewed. At six o'clock in the evening the left wing of the English advanced to the right of the Irish, from whom they met with such a warm and obstinate reception, that it was not without the most surprizing efforts of courage and perseverance that they at length obliged them to give ground; and even then they lost it by inches. St. Ruth, seeing them in danger of being overpowered, immediately detached succours to them from his centre and left wing. Mackay no sooner perceived them weakened by these detachments, than he ordered three battalions to skirt the bog, and attack them on the left, while the centre advanced through the middle of the morass, the men wading up to the waist in mud and water. After they had reached the other side, they found themselves obliged to ascend a rugged hill, fenced with hedges and ditches; and these were lined with musqueteers, supported at proper intervals with squadrons of cavalry. They made such a desperate resistance and fought with such impetuosity, that the assailants were repulsed into the middle of the bog with great loss, and St. Ruth exclaimed, "Now will I drive the English to the gates of Dublin." In this critical conjuncture Ptolemache came up with a fresh body to sustain them, rallied the broken troops, and renewed the charge with such vigour, that the Irish gave way in their turn, and the English recovered the ground they had lost, though they found it impossible to improve their advantage. Mackay brought a body of horse and dragoons to the assistance of the left wing, and at first turned the tide of battle in favour of the English. Major general Rouvigny, who had behaved with great gallantry during the whole action, advanced with five regiments of cavalry to support the centre, when St. Ruth perceiving his design, resolved to fall upon him in a dangerous hollow way, which he was obliged to pass. For this purpose he began to descend Kircommodon-hill with his whole reserve of horse: but in his way was killed by a cannon-ball. His troops immediately halted, and his guards retreated with his body. His fate dispirited the troops, and produced such confusion as Sarsfield could not remedy; for though he was next in command he had been at variance with St. Ruth since the affair at Athlone, and was ignorant of the plan he had concerted. Rouvigny having passed the hollow way without opposition, charged the enemy in flank, and bore down all before him with surprising impetuosity: the centre redoubled their efforts, and pushed the Irish to the top of the hill, and then the whole line giving way at once from right to left, threw down their arms. The foot fled towards a bog in their rear, and their horse took the route by the highway to Loughneagh: both were pursued by the English cavalry, who for four miles made a terrible slaughter. In the battle, which lasted only two hours, and in the pursuit, upwards of four thousand of the enemy were slain, and six hundred taken prisoners, together with the whole of their baggage, tents, provision, ammunition, and artillery, twenty-nine pair of colours, twelve standards, and almost all the arms of the infantry. In short, the victory was decisive, not above eight hundred of the English being killed upon the field. The vanquished retreated in great confusion to Limeric, where they resolved to make a final stand, in hope of receiving such succours from France as would either enable them to retrieve their affairs, or obtain good terms from the court of England. There Tyrconnel died of a broken heart, after having survived his authority and reputation (z).

Directly after this battle, which was so decidedly in favour of the English, detachments were sent to reduce Portumny, Bonnachar, and Moor Castle, considerable passes on the river Shannon, which were accordingly secured. After this general Ginckel advanced to Galway, which he summoned to surrender; but he received a defiance from lord Dillon and general D'Ussone, who commanded the garrison. The trenches were immediately opened; a fort which commanded the approaches to the town was taken by assault; six regiments of foot, and four squadrons of horse, passed the river on pontoons; and the place being wholly invested, the governor thought proper to capitulate. The garrison marched out with the honours of war, and was allowed safe conduct to Limeric. Ginckel then directed his march to the same town, which was the only post of importance that now held out in favour of James. Within four miles of the place he halted, until the heavy cannon could be brought from Athlone. Hearing that Luttrel had been seized by the French general D'Ussone, and was sentenced to be shot for having proposed to surrender, he sent a trumpet, to tell the commander, that if any person should be put to death for such a proposal, he would make retaliation upon the Irish prisoners. On the 25th of August the enemy were driven from all their advanced posts; captain Cole, with a squadron of ships sailed up the Shannon, and his frigates anchored in sight of the town. The following day the batteries were opened, and a line of contravallation was formed: the Irish army lay encamped on the other side of the river, on the road to Killalow, and the fords were guarded by four regiments of their dragoons. On the 5th of September, after the town had been almost laid in ruins by the bombs, and large breaches made in the walls by the battering cannon, the guns were dismounted, the out-forts evacuated, and such other motions made as indicated a resolution to abandon the siege. The enemy expressed their joy in loud acclamations; but this was of short continuance; for in the night the besiegers began to throw a bridge of pontoons over the river, about a mile higher up than the camp; and this work was finished before morning. A considerable body of horse and foot had passed when the alarm was given to the enemy, who were so panic struck, that they threw down their arms and betook themselves to flight, leaving behind them their tents, baggage, two pieces of cannon, and one standard. The bridge was immediately removed nearer the town, and fortified; all the fords and passes were secured, and the batteries continued firing incessantly till the 22nd, when Ginckel passed over with a division of the army and fourteen pieces of cannon. About four in the afternoon, the grenadiers attacked the forts that commanded Thomond Bridge, and carried them sword in hand, after an obstinate resistance. The garrison had made a sally from the town to support them; and this detachment was driven back with such precipitation, that the French officer on command in that quarter, fearing the English would enter with the fugitives, ordered the bridge to be drawn up, leaving his own men to the fury of the victorious soldiery. Six hundred were killed, and two hundred taken prisoners, including many officers, and a great number were drowned in the river.

The English then made a lodgement within ten paces of the bridge foot; and the Irish, perceiving that they were surrounded on all sides, came to the resolution of capitulating. General Sarsfield and colonel Wahop signified their intention to Scravenmore and Rouvigny: hostages were exchanged; a negociation was immediately commenced, and hostilities ceased on both sides of the river. The lords justices arrived in the camp the first of October, and on the 4th the articles of capitulation were agreed to: these extended to all the places in the kingdom that were still in the hands of the Irish. The Roman catholics were restored to the enjoyment of such liberty in the exercise of their religion as was consistent with the laws of Ireland, and conformable with that which they possessed in the reign of Charles the Second. All persons whatever were entitled to the protection of these laws, and restored to the possession of their estates, privileges, and immunities, upon their submitting to the present government, and taking the oath of allegiance to their majesties king William and queen Mary, excepting, however, certain persons who were forfeited or exiled. This article even extended to all merchants of Limeric, or any other garrison possessed by the Irish, who happened to be abroad, and had not borne arms since the declaration in the first year of the present reign, provided they should return within the period of eight months (a).

On the surrender of the town of Limeric to Ginckel, it was agreed on both sides, that the two armies should entrench themselves till the Irish could embark, that no disorders might arise from a communication between the different parties. The protestant subjects of Ireland, however, were highly dissatisfied at the concessions made in favour of the vanquished because they had exercised such flagrant acts of cruelty, rapine, and murder. They vehemently complained, that they themselves, who had suffered for their loyalty to king William, were neglected, and obliged to sit down with their losses, while their enemies, who had shed so much blood in opposing his government, were indemnified by the articles of capitulation, and even favoured with particular indulgences. They were dismissed with the honours of war: they were transported at the government's expence, to fight against the English in foreign countries: an honourable provision was made for the Rapparees, who were professed banditti: the Roman catholic interest in Ireland obtained the sanction of regal authority: attainders were overlooked, forfeitures annulled, pardons extended, and laws set aside, in order to effect a pacification.

When the articles of capitulation were ratified, and hostages exchanged for their being duly executed, about two thousand Irish foot, and three hundred horse, began their march for Cork, where they proposed to take shipping for France, under the conduct of Sarsfield; but three regiments refusing to quit the kingdom, delivered up their arms and dispersed to their former habitations. Those who remained at Limeric embarked on the 7th of November, 1691, in French transports, and sailed immediately to France, under the convoy of a French squadron which had arrived in the bay of Dangle immediately after the capitulation was signed. Twelve thousand men embarked, and when they arrived in France, they were thanked for their loyalty by James, who told them that they should still fight for their old master; and that he had obtained an order from the king of France for their being new cloathed, and put into quarters for refreshment.

Ireland being now completely reduced, baron Ginckel returned to England, where he was solemnly thanked by the house of commons for his great services, after he had been created earl of Athlone by his majesty. When the parliament met, on the 22nd of October, the king, in his speech, insisted upon sending a strong fleet to sea early in the season, and of maintaining a considerable army, to annoy the enemy abroad, as well as to protect the kingdom from insult and invasion; for which purposes, he said, sixty-five thousand men would be barely sufficient. Both houses presented addresses of congratulation upon his majesty's safe return to England, and on the reduction of Ireland: they promised to assist him to the utmost of their power, in prosecuting the war with France; and, at the same time, drew up addresses to the queen, acknowledging her prudent administration during his majesty's absence. But notwithstanding this appearance of cordiality and complaisance, a spirit of discontent had insinuated itself into both houses of parliament, and had even infected a great part of the people.

All the expectations, however, which might arise to James's interest from the attachment of the Irish were now entirely at an end; that kingdom submitted peaceably to the English government, and the late monarch was to look for other assistance to prop his declining pretensions. The chief hopes which he relied upon lay in a conspiracy among his English adherents, and in the succours which were promised him by Louis. The success of the conspiracy was the first to disappoint his expectations. This was originally set on foot in Scotland by sir John Montgomery, a person, who, from being an adherent to William, now turned against him; but as the project was ill-conceived, so it was lightly discovered by the instigator. To this another succeeded, which seemed to threaten more serious consequences, as it was chiefly managed by the Whig party, who were the most formidable in the nation. A number of these joined themselves to the Tory party, and both made advances to the adherents of the late king. They assembled together, and the result of their deliberations was, that the restoration of James was to be entirely effected by foreign forces; that he should sail for Scotland, and be there joined by five thousand Swedes, who, because they were of the protestant faith, it was thought would remove a part of the odium which attended an invasion by foreigners; that assistance should at the same time be sent from France, and that full liberty of conscience should be proclaimed throughout the kingdom. In order that no time might be lost, it was resolved to send over two trusty persons to France to consult with the banished monarch; and lord Preston and Mr. Ashton were the persons appointed for this dangerous embassy. Accordingly Ashton hired a small vessel for this purpose; and the two conspirators went secretly on board, happy in the supposed secrecy of their schemes; but there had been previous information given of their intentions; and lord Carmarthen had them both seized, just at the time when they thought themselves out of all danger. The conspirators refused to inform; their trials were therefore hurried on about a fortnight after they were taken, in order, by the terrors of death, to force a discovery. They were tried at the Old Bailey, for compassing the death of king William and queen Mary. Lord Preston alledged, in his defence, that the treasons charged upon him were not committed in the county of Middlesex, as laid in the indictment; that none of the witnesses declared he had any concern in hiring the vessel; that the papers were not found upon him; that there ought to be two creditable witnesses to every fact, whereas, the whole proof against him rested on similitude of hands, and mere supposition. He was, nevertheless, found guilty. Ashton behaved with great intrepidity and composure. He owned his purpose of going to France, in pursuance of a promise he had made to general Worden, who, on his death-bed conjured him to go thither, and finish some affairs of consequence which he had left there depending; as well as with a view to recover a considerable sum of money due to himself. He denied that he was privy to the contents of the papers found upon him: he complained of his having been denied time to prepare for his trial: and called several persons to prove him a protestant of exemplary piety and irreproachable morals. These circumstances had no weight with the court. He was brow-beaten by the bench, and found guilty by the jury, as he had the papers in his custody; yet, there was no privity proved; and the Whig party themselves had often expressly declared, that of all sorts of evidence, that of finding papers in a person's possession, is the weakest, because no man can secure himself from such danger. Ashton suffered with equal courage and decorum. In a paper, which he delivered to the sheriff, he owned his attachment to king James; he witnessed to the birth of the prince of Wales; denied his knowledge of the contents of the papers that were committed to his charge; complained of the hard measure he had met with from the judges and jury, but forgave them in the sight of Heaven. This man was celebrated by the non-jurors as a martyr to loyalty; and they boldly affirmed, that his chief crime, in the eyes of the government, was his having among his baggage an account of such evidence as would have been convincing to all the world, concerning the birth of the prince of Wales, which by a great number of people was believed suppositious (b). Lord Preston obtained a pardon: Elliot, another of the conspirators, was not tried, because no evidence appeared against him: the earl of Clarendon, who was likewise concerned in the conspiracy, was sent to the Tower, where he remained some months, and was afterwards confined to his own house in the country; an indulgence, which he owed to his consanguinity with the queen, who was his first cousin. The bishop of Ely, Graham, and Penn absconded; and a proclamation was issued for apprehending them as traitors.

The bishop of Ely being implicated in the conspiracy furnished the king with a plausible pretence to fill up the vacant bishoprics; accordingly Dr. Tillotson (c) was advanced to the see of Canterbury, Beveridge was promoted to the see of Bath and Wells, Fowler to that of Gloucester, Cumberland to Peterborough, Moor to Norwich, and Patrick to Ely. These were all divines of unblemished character; and the public in general seemed satisfied with this exertion of the king's supremacy. Although the deprived prelates at first affected meekness and resignation, the press groaned with the efforts of their learning and resentment; and every essay was answered by their opponents. Passive obedience and non-resistance appeared to be the order of the day.

The commons voted three millions, four hundred and eleven thousand, six hundred and seventy-five pounds for the use of the ensuing year; but the establishment of funds for raising these supplies was retarded, partly by the intervention of other affairs, which engrossed the attention of the house. The parliament was amused by a pretended conspiracy of the papists in Lancashire to raise a rebellion, and restore James to the throne. Several persons were seized, and some witnesses examined; but nothing appeared to justify the information. At length one Fuller, a prisoner in the King's Bench, offered his evidence, and was brought to the bar of the house of commons, where he produced some papers. He obtained a blank pass from the king for two persons, who, he said, would come from the continent to give evidence. He was afterwards examined at his own lodgings, where he affirmed, that colonel Thomas Delaval, and James Hayes, were the witnesses for whom he had procured the pass and protection. Search was made for them, according to his direction; but no such persons could be found. The house then declared Fuller a notorious impostor, cheat, and false accuser. He was, at the request of the commons, prosecuted by the attorney-general, and sentenced to stand in the pillory; a disgrace which he accordingly underwent.

A bill for regulating trials in cases of high-treason having been laid aside by the lords in the preceding session, was now again brought forward, and passed the lower house. The design of this bill was to secure the subject from the rigours to which he had been exposed in the late reigns: it provided, That the prisoners should be furnished with a copy of his indictment, as also of the pannel, ten days before his trial; and, That his witnesses should be examined upon oath, as well as those of the crown. The lords, in their own behalf, added a clause, enacting, That upon the trials of any peer or peeress, for treason or misprision of treason, all the peers who have a right to sit and vote in parliament should be duly summoned to assist at the trial: That this notice should be given twenty days before the trial: and, That every peer so summoned, and appearing, should vote upon the occasion. The commons rejected this amendment, and a free conference ensued. The point was argued with great vivacity on both sides, which served only to inflame the dispute, and render each party the more tenacious of their own opinion. After three conferences that produced nothing but animosity, the bill was dropped; for the commons resolved to bear the hardships of which they complained, rather than be relieved at the expence of purchasing a new privilege to the lords; and without this advantage, the peers would not contribute to their relief.

The next object that engrossed the attention of the lower house, was the miscarriage of the fleet during the summer's expedition. Admiral Russel, who commanded at sea, having been joined by the Dutch squadron, sailed in quest of the enemy; but as the French king had received undoubted intelligence, that the combined squadrons were superior to his navy in number of ships and weight of metal, he ordered Tourville to avoid an engagement. This officer acted with such vigilance, caution, and dexterity, as baffled all the endeavours of Russel, who was, moreover, perplexed with obscure and contradictory orders. Nevertheless he cruised all the summer, either in the Channel or in soundings, for the protection of the trade, and in particular secured the homeward bound Smyrna fleet, in which the English and the Dutch had a joint concern, amounting to four millions sterling. Having scoured the Channel, and sailed along great part of the French coast, he returned to Torbay in the beginning of August, and received fresh orders to put to sea again, notwithstanding his repeated remonstrances against exposing large ships to the storms that always blow about the time of the equinox. He therefore sailed back to the soundings, where he continued cruising till the 2nd of September, when he was overtaken by a violent tempest, which drove him into the Channel, and obliged him to make for the port of Plymouth. The weather being hazy, he reached the Sound with great difficulty: the Coronation, a second rate, foundered at anchor off the Ram Head: the Harwich, a third rate, bulged upon the rocks, and perished: two others ran ashore, but were got off with little damage: in short, the whole fleet was scattered and distressed. The nation murmured at the supposed misconduct of the admiral, and the commons subjected him to an enquiry; but when they had examined his papers, orders, and instructions, they perceived he had adhered to them with great punctuality, and thought proper to drop the prose-

(b) To one of the pamphlets published on this occasion, is annexed a petition to the present government, in the name of James's adherents, importing, that some grave and learned person should be authorised to compile a treatise, showing the grounds of William's title; and declaring, that in case the performance should carry conviction along with it, they would submit to that title, as they hitherto opposed it from a principle of conscience.—The best answer that could be made to this summons, was Lock's book upon Government, which appeared at this period.—Ralph.

(c) Dr. John Tillotson was one of the most learned, moderate, and virtuous ecclesiastics of the age, who did not accept this promotion without great reluctance, because he foresaw that he should be exposed to the slander and malevolence of that party which espoused the cause of his predecessor.

cution, out of tenderness to the ministry. At length the funds for the supplies of the ensuing year being established, and several acts passed relating to domestic regulations, the king, on the 24th of February, 1692, closed the session with a short speech, thanking the parliament for the liberality of the supplies, and communicating his intention of repairing speedily to the continent. Then the two houses, at his desire, adjourned themselves to the 12th of April, and the parliament was afterwards prorogued to the 29th of May, by proclamation.

As the Highlanders in Scotland were not yet totally reduced, the earl of Braidalbane undertook to bring them over, by distributing sums of money among their chiefs; and fifteen thousand pounds were remitted from England for this purpose. The clans being informed of this remittance, suspected that the earl's design was to appropriate to himself the best part of the money, and when he began to treat with them made such extravagant demands, that he found his scheme impracticable. He was therefore, obliged to refund the sum he had received; but resolved to wreak his vengeance with the first opportunity, on those who had frustrated his intention. He who chiefly thwarted his negociation was Macdonald of Glencoe, whose opposition rose from a private circumstance, which ought to have had no effect upon a treaty that regarded the public weal. Macdonald had plundered the lands of Braidalbane during the course of hostilities; and this nobleman insisted upon being indemnified for his losses, from the other's share of the money which he was employed to distribute. The Highlander not only refused to acquiesce in these terms, but by his influence among the clans, defeated the whole scheme, and the earl in revenge devoted him to destruction. King William had by proclamation offered an indemnity to all those who had been in arms against him, provided they would submit and take the oath by a certain day; and this was prolonged to the close of the present year, when a denunciation of military execution passed against those who should hold out after the end of December. Macdonald, intimidated by this declaration, repaired on the very last day of the month to Fort-William, and desired that the oaths might be tendered to him by colonel Hill governor of that fortress. As this officer was not vested with the power of a civil magistrate, he refused to administer them; and Macdonald set out immediately for Inverary, the county-town of Argyle. Though the ground was covered with snow, and the weather intensely cold, he travelled with such diligence, that the term prescribed by the proclamation was but one day elapsed when he reached the place, and addressing himself to sir John Campbell, sheriff of the county, who, in consideration of his disappointment at Fort-William, was prevailed upon to administer the oaths to him and his adherents. Then they returned to their own habitations in the valley of Glencoe, in full confidence of being protected by the government, to which they had so solemnly submitted.

Braidalbane had represented Macdonald at court as an incorrigible rebel, as a ruffian, inured to bloodshed and rapine, who would never be obedient to the laws of his country, nor live peaceably under any sovereign. He observed that he had paid no regard to the proclamation, and proposed that the government should sacrifice him to the quiet of the kingdom, in extirpating him, with his family and dependents, by military execution. His advice was supported by the suggestions of the other Scottish ministers; and the king, whose chief virtue was not humanity, signed a warrant for the destruction of those unhappy people, though it does not appear that he knew of Macdonald's submission. An order for this barbarous execution, signed and counter-signed by his Majesty's own hand, being transmitted to the Master of Stair, secretary for Scotland, this minister sent particular directions to Livingstone, who commanded the troops in that kingdom, to put the inhabitants of Glencoe to the sword, charging him to take no prisoners, that the scene might be more terrible. In the month of February, Captain Campbell, of Glenlyon, by virtue of an order from major Duncanson, marched into the valley of Glencoe, with a company of soldiers belonging to Argyle's regiment, on pretence of levying the arrears of the land-tax and hearth-money. When Macdonald demanded whether they came as friends or enemies, he answered as friends, and promised, upon his honour, that neither he nor his people should sustain the least injury. In consequence of this declaration, he and his men were received with the most cordial hospitality, and lived fifteen days with the men of the valley, in all the appearance of the most unreserved friendship. At length the fatal period approached. Macdonald and Campbell having passed the day together, parted about seven in the evening, with mutual professions of the warmest affection. The younger Macdonald, perceiving the guards doubled, began to suspect some treachery, and communicated his suspicion to his brother; but neither he nor the father would harbour the least doubt of Campbell's sincerity: nevertheless, the two young men went forth privately, to make further observations. They overheard the common soldiers say they liked not the work; that though they would have willingly fought the Macdonalds of the Glen fairly in the field, they held it base to murder them in cool blood; but that their officers were answerable for the treachery. When the youths hasted back to apprise their father of the impending danger, they saw the house already surrounded: they heard the discharge of the muskets, the shrieks of women and children, and being destitute of arms, secured their own lives by immediate flight. The savage ministers of vengeance had entered the old man's chamber, and shot him through the head. He fell down dead in the arms of his wife, who died next day, distracted by the horror of her husband's fate. The Laird of Auchintrincken, Macdonald's guest, who had three months before this period submitted to the government, and at this very time had a protection in his pocket, was put to death without question. A boy of eight years, who fell at Campbell's feet, imploring mercy, and offering to serve him for life, was stabbed to the heart by one Drummond, a subaltern officer. Eight-and-thirty persons suffered in this manner, the greater part of whom were surprized in their beds, and hurried into eternity before they had time to implore the divine mercy. The design was to butcher all the males under seventy, that lived in the valley, the number of whom amounted to two hundred; but some of the detachments did not arrive soon enough to secure the passes; so that one hundred and sixty escaped. Campbell, having perpetrated this brutal massacre, ordered all the houses to be burned, made a prey of all the cattle and effects that were found in the valley, and left the helpless women and children, whose fathers and husbands he had murdered, naked and forlorn, without covering, food, or shelter, in the midst of the snow that covered the whole face of the country, at the distance of six long miles from any inhabited place. Distracted with grief and horror, surrounded with the shades of night, shivering with cold, and appalled with the apprehension of immediate death from the swords of those who had sacrificed their friends and kinsmen, they could not endure such a complication of calamities, but generally perished in the waste, before they could receive the least comfort or assistance. This barbarous massacre, performed under the sanction of king William's authority, answered the immediate purpose of the court, by striking terror into the hearts of the jacobite Highlanders: but at the same time excited the horror of all those who had not renounced every sentiment of humanity, and produced such an aversion to the government, as all the arts of a ministry could never totally surmount. A detail of the particulars was published at Paris, with many exaggerations, and the jacobites did not fail to expatiate upon every circumstance, in domestic libels and private conversation. The king, alarmed at the outcry which was raised upon this occasion, ordered an enquiry to be set on foot, and dismissed the master of Stair from his employment of secretary: he likewise pretended that he had subscribed the order amidst a number of other papers, without knowing the purport of it; but as he did not severely punish those who had made his authority subservient to their own cruel revenge, the imputation stuck fast to his character, and the Highlanders, though terrified into silence and submission, were inspired with the most implacable resentment against his person and administration (d).

A great number in both kingdoms waited impatiently for an opportunity to declare in behalf of their exiled monarch, who was punctually informed of all these transactions, and endeavoured to make his advantage of the growing discontent. King William, having settled the domestic affairs of the nation, and exerted uncommon care and assiduity in equipping a formidable fleet, embarked for Holland on the first of March, 1692, and was received by the States General with expressions of the most cordial regard. While William was in Holland promoting the measures of the grand confederacy, the French king resolved to invade England in his absence, and seemed cordially engaged in the interest of James, whose emissaries saries in Britain began to prepare the nation for his return. The papists of Lancashire dispatched one Lant to St. Germain's, assuring the court that they were ready to receive their old sovereign. Colonel Parker was therefore sent over to England, who assured the Jacobites that their lawful sovereign would visit his British dominions at the head of thirty thousand effective men, to be embarked at La Hogue; that the transports were already prepared, and a strong squadron equipped for their convoy. Having given them this information, he exhorted them to be speedy, and secret in their preparations, that they might be ready to take arms, and assist in effecting his restoration. It is likewise said that this officer and a priest had endertaken to assassinate king William; but his majesty was now in Holland.

In the mean time James addressed a letter to several persons of distinction, announcing the pregnancy of his queen; and employed his emissaries in circulating a printed declaration, importing that the king of France had enabled him to make another effort to retrieve his crown. He exhorted the people to join his standard. He forbade them to pay taxes or any part of the revenue to the usurper, as he stiled William. He solemnly protested that he would maintain and protect the church of England, as by law established; and concluded with professions of resignation to the Divine Will, declaring, that all who should reject his offers of mercy, and appear in arms against him, would be answerable to Almighty God for all the blood that should be spilt, and all the miseries in which these kingdoms might be involved by their desperate and unreasonable opposition. In consequence of this declaration, his partizans enlisted men privately for the service of James in several parts of the kingdom. They transmitted a list of of the ships that composed the English fleet, and exhorted James to use his influence with the French king, that the Count de Tourville might be ordered to attack them before they should be joined by the Dutch squadron. Louis therefore commanded his admiral to attack the English fleet so soon as he could come up with them; and James repaired to La Hogue, that he might be in readiness to embark with his army, consisting of a body of French troops, together with some English and Scotch refugees, and the regiments which had been transported from Ireland by virtue of the capitulation of Limeric.

The English ministry, however, were informed of all the particulars relative to the machinations of the French court in favour of James; and William, upon his arrival in Holland, hastened the naval preparations of the Dutch, so that their fleet was ready for sea much sooner than was expected. General Ptolemache was sent from Holland with three English regiments: a camp was formed in the vicinity of Portsmouth: papists were ordered to depart from the metropolis: the parliament was summoned to meet on the 24th of May: warrants were issued for apprehending divers disaffected persons: admiral Russel was ordered to put to sea with all expedition; and Carter, with a squadron of eighteen sail, continued to cruise along the French coast, to observe the motions of the enemy.

On the 11th of May, Russel sailed from Rye in Sussex to St. Helen's, where he was joined by the squadron under Delaval and Carter. There he received a letter from the earl of Nottingham, intimating, that a report having been spread of the queen's suspecting the fidelity of the sea-officers, her majesty had ordered him to declare in her name, that she reposed the most entire confidence in their attachment; and believed the report was raised by the enemies of the government. The flag-officers and captains forthwith drew up an address, which was graciously received by the queen, and published for the satisfaction of the nation. Russel, being re-enforced by the Dutch squadrons, commanded by Allemonde, Callembergh, and Vandergoes, set sail for the coast of France on the 18th, with a fleet of ninety-nine ships of the line, besides frigates and fire-ships. Next day, about three o'clock in the morning, he discovered the enemy, under the Count de Tourville, and threw out the signal for the line of battle, which by eight o'clock was formed in good order, the Dutch in the van, the blue squadron in the rear, and the red in the centre. The French fleet did not exceed sixty-three ships of the line, and, as they were to windward, Tourville might have avoided an engagement: but he had received positive orders to fight, on the supposition that the Dutch and English squadrons had not joined. Louis, indeed, was apprised of their junction before they were descried by his admiral, to whom he dispatched a countermanding order by two several vessels; but one of them was taken by the English, and the other did not arrive till the day after the engagement.

Tourville, therefore in obedience to the first mandate, bore down alongside Russel's own ship, which he engaged at a very small distance. He fought with great fury till one o'clock, when his rigging and sails being considerably damaged, his ship, the Soliel Royal, of one hundred and four guns was towed out of the line in great disorder. Nevertheless, the engagement continued till three, when the fleets were parted by a thick fog. When this abated, the enemy were descried flying to the northward; and Russel made the signal for chasing. Part of the blue squadron came up with the enemy about eight in the evening, and engaged them half an hour, during which admiral Carter was mortally wounded. Finding himself in extremity, he exhorted his captain to fight as long as the ship could swim; and expired with great composure. At length, the French bore away for Conquêt Road, having lost four ships in this day's action. Next day, about eight in the morning, they were discovered crowding away to the westward, and the combined fleet chased with all the sail they could carry, until Russel's foretop-mast came by the board. Though he was retarded by this accident, the fleet still continued the pursuit, and anchored near Cape La Hogue. On the 22nd of the month, about seven in the morning, part of the French fleet was perceived near the Race of Alderney, some at anchor, and some driving to the eastward with the tide of flood. Russel, and the ships nearest him, immediately slipped their cabels, and chased. The Soleil Royal, having lost her masts, ran ashore near Cherbourg, where she was burned by sir Ralph Delaval, together with the Admirable, another first-rate, and the Conquerant of eighty guns. Eighteen other ships of their fleet ran into La Hogue, where they were attacked by sir George Rooke, who destroyed them, and a great number of transports laden with ammunition, in the midst of a terrible fire from the enemy, and in sight of the Irish camp. Sir John Ashby, with his own squadron, and some Dutch ships, pursued the rest of the French fleet, which escaped through the Race of Alderney, by such a dangerous passage as the English could not attempt, without exposing their ships to the most imminent hazard. This was a very mortifying defeat to the French king, who had been so long flattered with an uninterrupted series of victories: it reduced James to the lowest ebb of despondency, as it frustrated the whole scheme of his embarkation, and overwhelmed his friends in England with grief and despair. So decisive was the blow, that from that time the French seemed to relinquish all claims to the ocean.

Russel having ordered sir John Ashby, and the Dutch Admiral Callemberg, to steer towards Havre de Grace, and endeavour to destroy the remainder of the French fleet, sailed back to St. Helen's, that the damaged ships might be refitted, and the fleet furnished with fresh supplies of provision and ammunition: but his principal motive was, to take on board a number of troops provided for a descent upon France, with a view to alarm and distract the enemy in their own dominions (e). In the latter end of July, seven thousand men, commanded by the duke of Leinster, embarked on board transports, to be landed at St. Maloes, Brest, or Rochefort; but in a council of war it was agreed that the season was too far advanced to put it in execution. Nevertheless, the admiral having detached sir John Ashby with a squadron, to intercept the remains of the French fleet, in their passage from St. Maloes to Brest, set sail for La Hogue with the rest of the fleet and transports: but, in a few days, the wind shifting, he was obliged to return to St. Helen's. The design of effecting a landing in France was, therefore, laid aside; and the forces were transported to Flanders. The French king having nothing further to apprehend from the English armament, withdrew his troops from the coast of Normandy; and James returned in despair to St. Germain's, where his queen had been in his absence delivered of a daughter, who was born in the presence of the archbishop of Paris, the keeper of the seals, and other persons of distinction.

Louis had taken the field in the latter end of May. On the 20th of that month he arrived at his camp in Flanders.

(e) The queen was so pleased with the victory, that she ordered thirty thousand pounds to be distributed among the sailors. She caused medals to be struck in honour of the action; and the bodies of admiral Carter and captain Hastings, who had been killed in the battle, to be interred with great funeral pomp.

Having

Having reviewed his army, which amounted to about one hundred and twenty thousand men, he undertook the siege of Namur, which he invested on both sides of the Sombre, with about one half of his army, while the other covered the siege, under the command of Luxembourg. The citadel was deemed one of the strongest forts in Flanders, strengthened with a new work contrived by the famous engineer Coehorn, who now defended it in person. The prince de Barbason commanded the garrison, consisting of nine thousand men. The place was well supplied; and the governor knew that king William would make strong efforts for its relief: so that the besieged were animated with many concurring considerations. The assailants, however, carried on their attacks with such vigour, that in seven days after the trenches were opened the town capitulated, and the garrison retired into the citadel. King William, being joined by the troops of Brandenburgh and Liege, advanced to the Mehaigne, at the head of one hundred thousand men, and encamped within cannon shot of Luxembourg's army, which lay on the other side of the river. That general, however, had taken such precautions, that William could not interrupt the siege, nor attack the French lines without great disadvantage. The besiegers, encouraged by the presence of their monarch, and assisted by the superior abilities of Vauban, their engineer, repeated their attacks with such impetuosity, that the fort of Coehorn was surrendered, after a very obstinate defence, in which he himself had been dangerously wounded. The citadel being thus left exposed to the approaches of the enemy, could not long withstand the violence of their operations. The two covered ways were taken by assault; and the governor capitulated, to the unspeakable mortification of king William, who saw himself obliged to lie inactive at the head of a powerful army, and be an eye witness to the loss of the most important fortress in the Netherlands. Louis, having taken possession of the place, returned in triumph to Versailles, where he was flattered with all the arts of adulation: while William's reputation suffered a little from his miscarriage, and the prince of Barbason incurred the suspicion of treachery. The allies were likewise defeated at Steenkirke, which occasioned extravagant rejoicings in France.

By the defeat of the French fleet at La Hogue, which James was an eye-witness of, he was reduced to the lowest ebb of despondency: his designs upon England were entirely frustrated, so that no hopes were left to his friends but what might arise from the base act of assassinating William. One Dumont, engaged for the purpose by colonel Parker, undertook to effect his destruction. The conspirators are said to have had an audience with James, who approved of their undertaking, and assured them of his protection. Dumont enlisted in the allied army, that he might have the better opportunity of shooting the king when he should ride out to visit the lines, while the chevalier de Grandval and colonel Parker repaired to the French camp, with orders for a party of horse to rescue Dumont as soon as the blow should be struck. After staying some weeks in the camp of the allies, Dumont retired to Hanover, without effecting his purpose. Grandval was inveigled to Eyndhoven by one Leefdale, who had been made acquainted with the secret, but who was a spy employed by king William: Grandval was apprehended, and understanding that Dumont had discovered the design to the duke of Zell, and that he himself had been betrayed by Leefdale, he freely confessed all the particulars, without enduring the torture; and being tried by a court-martial, and found guilty, he was executed as a traitor. Thus every scheme which was set on foot to favour the interest of James was brought to nought, and only ended in the destruction of those who undertook to be the perpetrators (f).

Though the parliament, amidst the dread of an invasion, had been required to meet for the dispatch of business, that measure had been countermanded by the queen when the public alarm had subsided. Soon after the king's arrival in England, a thanksgiving was ordered for his naval success at La Hogue, for the failure of the conspiracy against his life, and for the disappointments of his enemies. He opened the session on the 4th of November, 1692. The exorbitant power of France, and the necessity of opposing that power, formed the principal features of his speech.

In this session both houses exhibited an uncourtly spirit. William's partiality to the Dutch and other foreigners, his repulsive manners, and his occasional exertions of high prerogative, gave general disgust; and the little advantage which had been gained during the war furnished another ground of dissatisfaction. The first debate concerned the freedom of the subject, which had been violated in the case of the earls of Marlborough, Huntingdon, and Scarsdale, who had not only been detained in prison after they had applied for the benefit of the habeas corpus act, but, when they were released, had been obliged to continue their bail. The house of lords debated the mode of procuring the discharge of their securities, and would not proceed to business till the king had granted their request.

The commons, though they had honoured Russel with a vote of thanks for his late maritime exploits, ordered him, as well as the lords of the admiralty, to give an account of the affairs of the fleet, that they might judge who were deserving of blame for not prosecuting the victory, and other matters. The admiral assured the house, that there had been no deficiency of endeavours on his part, and that his conduct had been directed by the advice of a council of war. The house was satisfied with his defence, and unanimously resolved, that he had "behaved with fidelity, courage, and conduct."

The encouragement which William gave to foreigners, particularly in the army, occasioned severe reflections in both houses. Various motions were made with a view to check that partiality; and, though some of these were defeated by the efforts of the court, the peers at length voted an address, in the beginning of 1693, desiring that English soldiers might be commanded only by their own countrymen: the king, however, paid no attention to this advice.

To restrain the influence which the court had over the parliament, the commons passed a bill for securing the freedom and impartiality of their proceedings, by ordaining that such individuals as should accept any office under government, after being chosen members of a future parliament should be expelled. In the other house the friends of this bill carried it through several stages; but it was ultimately thrown out by a majority of two peers (g). On the failure of this bill against placemen, those who had supported it in the upper house patronized, with equal warmth, a bill which was introduced by the earl of Shrewsbury, for abridging the power of the crown with regard to parliaments. Besides providing for an annual session, the earl's bill directed that a new parliament should be triennially summoned, after the close of the present, which (it was stipulated) should not be protracted beyond the beginning of the following year. The lords, having agreed to this bill, sent it to the commons, among whom it was strongly contested; and it passed the ordeal of the house with difficulty. When it was presented to the king, he refused his sanction to it, regardless of the murmurs which such conduct might produce.

The members of opposition, in the two houses, endeavoured to procure the appointment of a joint committee, which should be authorized to consider the state of the nation, and propose various points of counsel to be given to the king. Though this scheme was reprobated by the peers, as an encroachment upon the executive power, (f) From the time of the battle of La Hogue, and the miscarriage of all the plans for re-establishing him on the throne of England, it seems that James laid aside all thoughts of worldly grandeur, and devoted the whole of his attention to the concerns of his soul. Immediately after that battle he retired to St. Germains, where he continued to reside, (a pensioner on the bounties of Louis, and assisted by occasional liberalities from his daughter and friends in England,) till his death, which happened on the 16th of September, 1700, after a tedious indisposition. Though he could not prevent the busy genius of his queen from planning new schemes of restoration, he was always best pleased when wholly detached from such chimerical projects. Hunting was his chief diversion; but religion was his constant care. Nothing could be more harmless than the life he now led; and, in the course of it, he subjected himself to uncommon penance and mortification. He frequently visited the poor monks of La Trappe, who were much edified by his humble and pious deportment. His pride and arbitrary temper seem to have vanished with his greatness. He became affable, kind, and easy to all his dependents; and in his last illness he conjured his son to prefer his religion to every worldly advantage, and even to renounce all thoughts of a crown, if he could not enjoy it without offering violence to his faith. He recommended to him the practice of justice and Christian forgiveness; he himself declaring that he heartily forgave the prince of Orange, the emperor, and all his enemies. He died with great marks of devotion, and was interred, at his own request, in the church of the English Benedictines at Paris, without any funeral pomp.

(g) The rejection of this bill was followed by a protest, which was signed, among other names, by the duke of Cumberland (George of Denmark), whose princess (Anne) was now in disgrace, and had been deprived of her guards by order of the queen—for refusing to dismiss the countess of Marlborough from her service.

they ventured to give occasional advice; for, besides their remonstrance against foreigners, they voted an address on the mal-administration of Ireland. In their address they complained of many acts of tyranny and oppression, and William promised to apply speedy remedies to the objects of complaint; but he did not gratify the public wish by a strict performance of his promise.

Though the two houses were, in many respects, adverse to the court, they granted ample supplies for the continuance of the war. For the navy, one million nine hundred and twenty-six thousand five hundred and sixteen pounds were voted; and for the army, two million ninety thousand five hundred and sixty-three pounds; and, as the poll-tax of the last session had produced less than the estimated sum, seven hundred and fifty thousand pounds were now appropriated to the compensation of that deficiency.

The most important acts passed this session were, an act for the examination of the national accounts, one for preventing malicious informations in the court of King's Bench, several others for the partial reform of legal process, one for the recovery of the Greenland trade, and another for continuing the office of licenser to the press (h). When the two houses had finished that business which was most agreeable to the king, he dismissed them by another prorogation on the 14th of March.

Notwithstanding the liberality with which the parliament had provided for the exigencies of the war, the naval preparations were not prosecuted with the requisite diligence. The delay, indeed, partly arose from the want of men; but the negligence of the commissioners of the admiralty merited some degree of censure. When at length an ill-manned and ill-furnished fleet put to sea, the three commanders of it received particular instructions to provide for the security of near four hundred sail of merchant vessels, principally English and Dutch, bound for Spain, Portugal, and the Levant; some of which had been waiting above a year for a convoy. With this squadron, the grand fleets of England and Holland, amounting to above sixty ships of the line, sailed through the Channel, and proceeded fifty leagues to the south-west of Ushant. No intelligence being then received of the enemy, sir George Rooke was ordered, with twenty-three ships of war, to convoy the commercial fleet; and the main fleet returned to the mouth of the Channel on the 6th of June. Sir George, steering towards the straits of Gibraltar, left by the way, under a small escort, those vessels which were bound to the nearest ports. When he arrived off Cape St. Vincent, he discovered a part of the principal navy of France, which, under the command of the count de Tourville, had sailed from Brest before the combined armaments had left St. Helen's. On the 17th of June part of the French fleet was discovered under Cape St. Vincent; and the next day the whole navy appeared, to the amount of eighty sail. Sixteen of these made towards the English squadron, while the vice-admiral of the white stood off to sea, with a view to intercept the ships under convoy. Sir George Rooke called a council of war, and by the advice of the Dutch vice-admiral Vandergoes, resolved, if possible, to avoid an engagement, which could only tend to their absolute ruin. Sir George therefore sent orders to the small ships that were near the land, to put into the neighbouring ports of Faro, St. Lucar, and Cadiz, while he himself stood off with an easy sail for the protection of the rest. About six in the evening, ten sail of the enemy came up with two Dutch ships of war, commanded by the captains Schrijver and Vander-Poel, who seeing no possibility of escaping, tacked in shore; and thus drawing the French after them, helped to save the rest of the fleet. When attacked they made a most desperate defence, but at last were overpowered by numbers, and taken. An English ship of war and a rich pinnace were burned; nine-and-twenty merchant vessels were taken, and about fifty destroyed by the counts de Tourville and D'Etrées. Seven of the largest Smyrna ships fell into the hands of M. de Coetlogon, and four he sunk in the bay of Gibraltar. The value of the loss sustained on this occasion amounted to one million sterling. Meanwhile Rooke stood off with a fresh gale, and on the 19th sent home the Lark ship of war with the news of his misfortune; then he bore away for the Madeiras, where having taken in wood and water, he set sail for Ireland, and on the 3rd of August arrived at Cork, with fifty sail, including ships of war and trading vessels. He detached captain Fairborne to Kinsale, with all his squadron, except six ships of the line, with which, in pursuance of orders, he joined the great fleet then cruising in the chops of the Channel. On the 25th they returned to St. Helen's. On the 19th of September, fifteen Dutch ships of the line, and two frigates, set sail for Holland; and twenty-six sail, with seven fire ships, were assigned as guard-ships during the winter. The French admirals, instead of pursuing Rooke to Madeira, made an unsuccessful attempt upon Cadiz, and bombarded Gibraltar, where the merchants sunk their ships, that they might not fall into the hands of the enemy. After which they sailed along the coast of Spain, destroyed some English and Dutch vessels at Malaga, Alicant, and other places; and returned in triumph to Toulon.

About this period, sir Francis Wheeler returned to England with his squadron, from an unfortunate expedition in the West-Indies. In conjunction with colonel Codrington, governor of the Leeward Islands, he made unsuccessful attempts upon the islands of Martinique and Dominique. Then he sailed to Boston in New-England, with a view to concert an expedition against Quebec, which was judged impracticable. He afterwards steered for Placentia in Newfoundland, which he would have attacked without hesitation; but the design was rejected by a majority of voices in the council of war. Thus disappointed, he set sail for England; and arrived at Portsmouth in a very shattered condition, the greatest part of his men having died in the course of his voyage.

In November another effort was made to annoy the enemy. Commodore Benbow sailed with a squadron of twelve capital ships, four bomb-ketches, and ten brigantines, to the coast of St. Maloes, and anchoring within half a mile of the town, cannonaded and bombarded it for three days successively. Then his men landed on an island, where they burned a convent. On the 19th, they took the advantage of a dark night, a fresh gale, and a strong tide, to send in a fireship of a particular contrivance, stiled the Infernal, in order to burn the town: but she struck upon a rock before she arrived at the place, and the engineer was obliged to set her on fire, and retreat. She continued burning for some time, and at last blew up, with such an explosion as shook the whole town like an earthquake, unroofed three hundred houses, and broke all the glass and earthen ware for three leagues around. A capstan, that weighed two hundred pounds, was transported into the place, and falling upon a house, levelled it to the ground: the greatest part of the wall towards the sea tumbled down; and the inhabitants were overwhelmed with consternation: so that a small number of troops might have taken possession without resistance; but there was not a soldier on board. Nevertheless, the sailors took and demolished Quince-fort, and did considerable damage to the town of St. Malo, which had been a nest of privateers that infested the English commerce (i).

Notwithstanding the successes of the French, that people laboured under a dreadful famine, and Louis was willing to come to terms. He therefore tampered with the allies apart, in hopes of dividing and detaching them from the grand confederacy: he solicited the northern crowns to engage as mediators for a general peace. A memorial was presented by the Danish minister to king William, by which it appears, that the French king would have been

(h) In this session, the peers held a court in Westminster Hall for the trial of lord Mohun, who had been accused of the murder of Montfort, a popular theatrical performer. As it appeared that one Hill was the author of the deed, his lordship, though he in some measure abetted the violence of the assassin, was acquitted by a majority of fifty-five voices.

About the same time, the commons took cognizance of a complaint respecting a publication entitled, "King William and Queen Mary Conquerors," and condemned it to the flames as a work of dangerous consequence to the liberties of the subject. A pastoral letter, in which bishop Burnet had insinuated a similar doctrine, was also publicly burned.

(i) Though this attempt was executed with great spirit, and some success, the clamours of the people became extremely bold. They scrupled not to say, that the councils of the nation were betrayed; and their suspicions rose even to the secretary's office. They observed, that the French were previously acquainted with all the motions of the English, and took their measures accordingly for their destruction. They collected and compared a good number of particulars, that seemed to justify their suspicion of treachery. But the misfortunes of the nation, in all probability, arose from a motley ministry, divided among themselves, who, instead of acting in concert for the public good, employed all their influence to thwart the views, and blacken the reputation of each other. The people in general exclaimed against the marquis of Caermarthen, the earls of Nottingham and Rochester, who had acquired great credit with the queen, and, from their hatred to the Whigs, betrayed the interests of the nation.

contented to purchase a peace with some considerable concessions; but the terms were rejected by the king of England, whose ambition and revenge were not yet gratified; and whose subjects, though heavily laden, could still bear additional burthens.

In the mean time the Jacobites had been attentive to the progress of dissatisfaction in England, which they fomented with assiduity. The late declaration of James had been couched in such imperious terms as gave offence to some of those who favoured his interest. The earl of Middleton, therefore, in the beginning of the year, repaired to St. Germain's and obtained another, which contained the promise of a general pardon without exception, and every other concession that a British subject could demand of his sovereign. About the latter end of May, two men, named Canning and Dormer, were apprehended for dispersing copies of this paper, tried at the Old Bailey, found guilty of not only dispersing, but also of composing a false and seditious libel, sentenced to pay five hundred marks a-piece, to stand three times in the pillory, and find sureties for their good behaviour. But no circumstance reflected more disgrace on this reign, than the fate of Anderson, the supposed printer of some tracts against the government. He was brought to trial for high treason: he made a vigorous defence, in spite of the insults and discouragements he sustained from a partial bench. As nothing but presumptive evidence appeared against him, the jury scrupled to bring in a verdict that would affect his life, until they were reviled and reprimanded by judge Treby; then they found him guilty. In vain, recourse was had to the queen's mercy: he suffered death at Tyburn; and left a paper, protesting solemnly against the proceedings of the court, which he affirmed was appointed, not to try, but to convict him; and petitioning Heaven to forgive his penitent jury. The severity of the government was likewise exemplified in the case of some adventurers, who, having equipped privateers to cruise upon the English, under joint commissions from James and Louis XIV. happened to be taken by the English ships of war. Dr. Oldys, the king's advocate, being commanded to proceed against them as guilty of treason and piracy, refused to commence the prosecution; and gave his opinion in writing, that they were neither traitors nor pirates. He supported this opinion by arguments before the council: these were answered by Dr. Littleton, who succeeded him in the office from which he was dismissed; and the prisoners were executed as traitors. The Jacobites did not fail to retort those arts upon the government, which their adversaries had so successfully practised in the late reign. They inveighed against the vindictive spirit of the administration, and taxed it with encouraging informers and false witnesses; a charge for which there was too much foundation.

The friends of James in Scotland still continued to concert designs in his favour; but their correspondence was detected, and their aims defeated. Secretary Johnstone not only kept a watchful eye over their transactions, but by a dexterous management of court liberality and favour, appeased the discontents of the Presbyterians so effectually, that the king ran no risque in assembling the parliament. Some offices were bestowed upon the leaders of the Kirk party; and the duke of Hamilton, being reconciled to the government, was appointed commissioner. On the 18th of April, the session was opened, and the king's letter, replete with the most cajoling expressions, being read, the parliament proceeded to exhibit undeniable specimens of their good humour. They drew up a very affectionate answer to his majesty's letter: they voted an addition of six new regiments to the standing forces of the kingdom: they granted a supply of above one hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling to his majesty: they enacted a law for levying men to serve on board the royal navy: they fined all absentees, whether lords or commons; and vacated the seats of all those commissioners who refused to take the oath of assurance, which was equivalent to an abjuration of king James: they set on foot an enquiry about an intended invasion: they published some intercepted letters, supposed to be written to king James by Nevil Payne, whom they committed to prison, and threatened with a trial for high treason; but he eluded the danger, by threatening in his turn to impeach those who had made their peace with the government: they passed an act for the comprehension of such of the episcopal clergy as should condescend to take the oaths by the 10th of July. All that the general assembly required of them, was, an offer to subscribe the confession of faith and to acknowledge presbytery as the only government of the Scottish church: but they neither submitted to these terms, nor took the oaths within the limited time, so that they forfeited all legal right to their benefices. Nevertheless, they continued in possession, and even received private assurances of the king's protection. It was one of William's political maxims, to court his domestic enemies; but it was never attended with any good effect. This indulgence gave offence to the presbyterians, and former distractions began to revive.

The king having prevailed upon the states-general to augment their land forces and navy for the service of the ensuing campaign, embarked for England, and arrived at Kensington on the 30th of October; and on the 7th of November, he met the parliament, which assembled on that day, pursuant to the last prorogation. The king in his speech expressed his hope, that the experience of the preceding summer, for the affairs of the confederates had suffered greatly by the arms of France, had convinced his subjects of the necessity of increasing the forces of the realm both by sea and land. In the same harangue, he intimated his deep resentment of that naval miscarriage which had "brought so great a disgrace upon the nation;" and declared that he would punish those who had failed in their duty, and provide more effectually for the proper management of the navy.

The commons were eager to enquire into the affairs of the fleet; they examined the three joint admirals, sir George Rooke, and other individuals: the peers also took the business into consideration: the blame was laid on the ministers; and as the two houses were inclined to favour the admirals, the king did not think proper to subject them to a court martial; and Russel was immediately appointed first commissioner of the admiralty.

The influence of the court produced an unprecedented grant of supplies. Besides five hundred thousand pounds towards the payment of the wages due to the seamen, the commons voted two millions for the general charge of the navy. With regard to the army, they did not agree to so great an augmentation of it as the king desired; but voted for the whole expences of that department two millions five hundred and twenty thousand five hundred and eighty-one pounds. They also voted, for supplying the deficiencies of former imposts, above four hundred thousand pounds. To provide for these grants, they extended the annuity act of the last session, continued the land-tax, and saddled the nation with new burdens. Two millions and a half of the supply were raised by two novel schemes; that of a lottery, and the establishment of a national bank.

The project of a national bank was devised by one William Peterson, an ingenious North Briton, and warmly promoted by many eminent merchants. It seems to have recommended itself to the ministry more by the opportunity which it afforded of present supply, than by the prospect of its tending to the security of the government, the support of public credit, and the increase of trade. The bill provided, that the subscribers of a million and a half should be incorporated under the title of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England; that the lenders of four-fifths of that sum should receive eight and one-third per cent. and the contributors of the remainder thirteen and one-third per cent.; and that they should not trade, except in bullion, bills of exchange, or goods pledged to them and unredeemed. The new society soon acquired the good opinion of the public; and the beneficial effects of the establishment were generally acknowledged.

Three popular bills were again brought forward this session; namely, the bill respecting trials for treason, that which related to triennial parliaments, and that which was directed against members who accepted offices from the crown. The first was suppressed by tacit consent; the second was rejected by a small majority in the lower house; the third passed both houses, but the king refused his assent. Great debates took place among the commons by the introduction of a bill for the naturalization of protestant foreigners. Though intended for the increase of population, the improvement of manufactures, and other purposes of public benefit, it awakened the jealousy of the English, and filled them with apprehensions of the continued prevalence of foreign interest. Sir John Knight vehemently opposed it; and his speech, which was immediately published, was highly acceptable to the populace, who extolled him as an illustrious patriot. Complaint being made of the printed harangue, he disavowed it, and it was ordered by the house to be publicly burned. The bill, however, was sacrificed.

The grievances of Ireland were again brought forward, and articles of impeachment were prepared against the chief authors of them. The earl of Bellamont took the lead in this business, and accused lord Coningsby and sir Charles Porter, with acts of tyranny and injustice in their administration of that realm. When witnesses were examined against them, the house rejected the articles; not because they thought them innocent, but because Ireland was in a disordered state at the time. The earl was removed from office for an interference which displeased the court; and those whom he wished to bring to justice received a full pardon for every enormity of which they had been guilty.

The commissioners appointed for the examination of the public accounts, having found that various sums had been paid to members by the king's order—for secret service—imparted the discovery to the house. No motion of censure, however, arose from this communication, except in the case of lord Falkland, who, for having requested and received two thousand pounds from his sovereign, "contrary to the ordinary method of issuing and bestowing the king's money," was pronounced guilty of a high misdemeanor and breach of trust, and was committed to the Tower; but, upon his petition, was soon discharged from confinement. The practice of corruption had become one of the established rules of ministerial process; but it was not then carried to that inordinate extent which has since prevailed.

On the 25th of April, 1694, after a session of nearly six months, the king prorogued the parliament till the 18th of September. The principal acts passed this session, besides those of supply, were, one for the encouragement of ship-building; another for the better disciplining the navy; and one which enabled the city of London to levy particular taxes for paying interest to a great number of orphans, whose fortunes, by a gross breach of trust, had been diverted to the use of the corporation.

The parliamentary business being settled, the king shortly after prepared to return to the continent; but, before his embarkation, he gratified a good number of his friends with promotions. Lord Charles Butler, brother to the duke of Ormond, was created lord Butler, of Weston in England, and earl of Arran in Ireland. The earl of Shrewsbury was honoured with the title of duke. The earl of Mulgrave, being reconciled to the court measures, was gratified with a pension of three thousand pounds, and the title of marquis of Normandy. Henry Herbert was ennobled by the title of baron Herbert of Cherbury. The earls of Bedford, Devonshire, and Clare, were promoted to the rank of dukes. The marquis of Caermarthen was made duke of Leeds: lord viscount Sidney, created earl of Romney; and viscount Newport, earl of Bedford. Russel was advanced to the head of the Admiralty-board. Sir George Rooke and sir John Houblon were appointed joint-commissioners, in the room of Killegrew and Delaval: Charles Montague was made chancellor of the Exchequer; and sir William Trumbal and John Smith commissioners of the Treasury, in the room of sir Edward Seymour and Mr. Hampden.

Through the channel of James's friends, particularly lord Godolphin and the earl of Marlborough, the French gained information of a projected expedition against Brest. Admiral Russel sailed, on the 3rd of May, towards the French coast with a part of the English and Dutch fleets, to obtain information of the naval operations of the enemy. Finding that the count de Tourville had left Brest, and had steered towards the Mediterranean, he returned to England, after having taken measures for the destruction of the French ships in Berthaume Bay. Captain Peckard was employed in this attempt, and he so far succeeded as to burn or sink thirty-five merchant vessels out of a fleet of about sixty. When the preparations for the attack of Brest were completed, the aggregate navy of the two nations, amounting to ninety ships of the line, besides frigates fire-ships, and tenders, accompanied with a large body of transports, in which were about six thousand men, sailed from St. Helen's; and while the major part proceeded to Gibraltar, lord Berkeley of Stratton, with twenty-nine sail of the line, beside frigates, fire-ships, and bomb vessels, steered for Camaret Bay. The French had strengthened the fortifications of Brest and its vicinity; and the skill of Vauban had been exerted for that purpose. The marquis of Caermarthen endeavoured to force a passage into the bay, on the 8th of June; but he met with a series of difficulties. Lieutenant-general Ptolemache, however, who had the command of the land forces, ventured to make a descent: the British forces were quickly thrown into disorder, and others, who successively advanced in their boats were driven back with considerable loss. Though the marquis used every effort to cover the retreat of the forces, by a near approach to the shore, many lives were lost on the occasion. As it was the tide of ebb, some of the boats were left on the sands; and their occupants were slaughtered or made prisoners. In this unfortunate expedition the English lost seven hundred men in killed, wounded, and prisoners; and in the ships which entered the bay about four hundred men were lost. One of these vessels (a Dutch frigate) received so much damage, that she sunk, after she had lost most of her crew. The gallant Ptolemache was shot in the thigh, and the wound proved mortal. The purposes of the expedition being frustrated by the treachery of those who betrayed the counsels of their sovereign, lord Berkeley returned to England with his squadron.

Lord Berkeley again set sail towards Dieppe in Normandy, and bombarded the town with such fury, on the 12th of July, that it was thought the English might easily have become masters of the place during the confusion which prevailed. The fleet then proceeded to Havre de Grace, where captain Benbow, who directed the bombardment of Dieppe, prosecuted a similar plan. The town was burnt in several parts, and some small ships were destroyed in the harbour. Berkeley attempted to treat Cherburg in a similar way, but the wind obstructed his efforts, and he returned to St. Helen's. Sir Cloudesley Shovel was afterwards employed in an expedition against other French ports: he made an attack upon Dunkirk, but it proved fruitless. He then sailed towards Calais, and some bombs were thrown into the town; but the French were so well prepared, that it was judged expedient to relinquish the enterprize. Shovel then sailed to the eastward, to check the career of John du Bart, who, with a squadron of small vessels, had committed great depredations in the British seas, and had lately defeated eight Dutch ships of war, taken some of them, and rescued about thirty Swedish and Danish merchant ships which had been captured. Admiral Russel having sailed to the Mediterranean, raised the siege of Barcelona, and Tourville retired into the harbour of Toulon.

The military operations of this campaign require no length of detail. When William had joined the army, it was expected, that, as his force exceeded that of the French, he would have distinguished the campaign by some great achievement. But the skill and vigilance of the duke of Luxemburg disappointed the hopes of the allies: but that the season might not pass altogether fruitless, the allies sent a strong detachment to invest Huy, which soon capitulated. Both armies then retired into winter quarters.

On the Rhine, the summer was occupied in marches, skirmishes, ravages, and depredations. The campaign on the Italian frontier was equally languid. The greatest exertions were made in Spain, where the French army almost doubled that of the natives. The viceroy of Catalonia disputed the passage of the Ter with the mareschal de Noailles; but he found himself unable to hinder that general from passing the river, and defeating his troops. The victor, proceeding to Palamos, took that sea-port by storm; and some other towns were also captured by him.

During these hostilities, queen Mary conducted, with her usual prudence, the affairs of England, where the only remarkable occurrence, in that interval, was the discovery of a Jacobite plot. Lunt, an unprincipled Irishman, deposed before secretary Trenchard, that he had delivered, to several gentlemen of Lancashire and Cheshire, commissions from James to levy war against William; that these persons had furnished him with money for the purchase of arms and the enlistment of soldiers; and that they had twice sent him to France to receive instructions preparatory to the proposed insurrection. This information being corroborated by the testimony of Wilson and others, some of the accused individuals were apprehended, and tried at Manchester in October; but in consequence of the declaration of one Taaffe, importing that it was a fabricated plot, the jury were induced to acquit the prisoners.

We

We have here to record the death of Dr. John Tillotson, archbishop of Canterbury, who was seized with a fit of the dead palsy, in the chapel of Whitehall, and died on the 22nd day of September, deeply regretted by the king and queen, who shed tears of sorrow at his decease; and sincerely lamented by the public, as a pattern of elegance, ingenuity, meekness, charity, and moderation. These qualities he must be allowed to have possessed, notwithstanding the invectives of his enemies, who accused him of puritanism, flattery, and ambition; and charged him with having conduced to a dangerous schism in the church, by accepting the archbishopric during the life of the deprived Sancroft. He was succeeded in the metropolitan see by Dr. Tennison, bishop of Lincoln, recommended by the Whig-party, which now predominated in the cabinet.

On the king's return to England, the parliament reassembled. When he harangued the two houses on the 12th of November, he expressed his joy that affairs were "in a better posture," than at the time of their last separation; that the designs of the French had been disappointed by sea, and the progress of their arms had been checked by land. He again requested ample supplies; and as a part of his revenue would soon expire, he hoped that it might be continued. That the maritime strength and commerce of the realm might be augmented, he recommended a bill for the encouragement of seamen.

The first business entered upon by the commons was the revival of the bill for triennial parliaments, which William had rejected. They resolved to insist on his enactment of this bill, as the price of the supply which he solicited. They voted two millions three hundred and eighty-two thousand seven hundred and twelve pounds for the navy, and two millions three hundred and eighty-two thousand pounds for the army; and they gratified him with a continuance of the expiring revenue (that of tonnage and poundage) for five years. The bill which comprehended the last grant was offered for his assent at the same time with the triennial bill. Influenced by the known views of the commons, and the probability of the death of his consort, whose loss might perhaps expose him to such a diminution of his popularity, as would subject him to much odium for a second refusal of a bill which the public desired, he confirmed it by his solemn sanction.

At this time the small pox was very prevalent, and the queen had contracted that disorder (k). The malignity of it soon increased; and, though an interval of hope arose, it was short and fallacious. When she found that her dissolution was approaching, she betrayed no symptoms of alarm or discomposure, but waited that aweful event with the most tranquil intrepidity. She died on the 28th of December, 1694, after a week's indisposition, in the thirty-third year of her age, and sixth of her reign (l). Although this princess had been married seventeen years to William, she had no issue.

As to the person of Mary, she was tall of stature, and was not deficient in justness of proportion. Her features were regular; her eyes brilliant and expressive; and the contour of her visage pleasing. Her talents were respectable; her understanding sound and judicious. She was lively in her conversation; graceful and engaging in her address. Her literary attainments were not despicable for a female. She reinforced her acquaintance with her native tongue by a knowledge of the languages of France and Holland; she was conversant in history and other branches of the belles lettres; she studied theology and ethics with zeal and proficiency.—Her government of the realm was distinguished by a constant display of prudence and judgement, and the occasional exercise of spirit and vigour. Though such an office was not congenial with her inclinations, her patriotism and philanthropy supplied the place of ambitious desires; and while the king was engaged in those military enterprizes which were calculated for the maintenance of the liberties of Europe, she employed herself, with indefatigable assiduity, in securing to the British dominions the blessings of order, harmony, and freedom. She tempered justice with clemency; and was only severe to those who had no claim to mercy. Uninfluenced by the pride of power and superiority, she moderated the awe of majesty by the most affable and benign complacency; she was easy of access, studious of obliging, and eager to gratify those who sought a redress of grievance or an alleviation of misfortune. She was liberal to the indigent; not only to those of her own country, but to those numerous foreigners who fled to this island from persecution. She rewarded merit in various departments; and promoted useful institutions, whether destined for the purposes of learning, of religion, or of benevolence. She paid particular attention to the affairs of the church, and was circumspect in the choice of those who presided over it; to whom, as well as to the public in general, her pious and virtuous demeanour furnished an admirable example. With respect to the propriety of her conduct towards James, the opinions of mankind will always differ. Those who place the greatest merit in filial piety and submission, will severely censure the concern which she had in the expulsion of her father from his throne; and such as entertain a high idea of hereditary right, will be disposed, with regard to the ties of consanguinity, to reprobate her violation of the claims of sovereignty. Many, on the other hand, will more justly consider obedience to a parent as limited to reasonable demands, and as ceasing to be obligatory when incompatible with the religious, moral, or patriotic principles, which the offspring may have deliberately imbibed. But these considerations would not have urged Mary to a concurrence in the deposition of James, had not they been effectually corroborated by that implicit devotion to the will of her husband which she constantly cultivated. It is supposed that, if this strong tie had been removed, during her life, by the death of William, she would have promoted the re-establishment of her father. This strictness of conjugal obedience she appears to have carried to an excess, particularly in the case of her sister Anne, whom she treated in an illiberal and ungenerous manner, in compliance with William's animosity against that princess.

(k) The princess Anne being informed of the queen's dangerous indisposition, sent a lady of her bed-chamber, to desire she might be admitted to her majesty; but this request was not granted. She was thanked for her expression of concern; and given to understand that the physicians had directed that the queen should be kept as quiet as possible. Before her death, however, she sent a forgiving letter to her sister; and, after her decease, the earl of Sunderland effected a reconciliation between the king and the princess, who visited him at Kensington, where she was received with uncommon civility. He appointed the palace of St. James's for her residence, and presented her with the greater part of the queen's jewels. But a mutual jealousy and disgust subsisted under these exteriors of friendship and esteem. The two houses of parliament waited on the king at Kensington, with consolatory addresses on the death of his consort: their example was followed by the regency of Scotland, the city and clergy of London, the dissenting ministers, and almost all the great corporations in England.

(l) Her obsequies were performed with great magnificence. The body was attended from Whitehall to Westminster Abbey by all the judges, serjeants at law, the lord mayor and aldermen of the city of London, and both houses of parliament; and the funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Tennison, archbishop of Canterbury. Dr. Kenn, the deprived bishop of Bath and Wells, reproached him in a letter, for not having called upon her majesty on her death-bed to repent of the share she had in the revolution. This was answered by another pamphlet. One of the Jacobite clergy insulted the queen's memory, by preaching on the following text. "Go now, see this cursed woman, and bury her, for she is a king's daughter." On the other hand, the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of London came to a resolution to erect her statue, with that of the king, in the Royal Exchange.

CHAP. II.

WILLIAM THE THIRD (Alone.)

THE decease of the patriotic queen Mary was deeply lamented by the public in general; and the king, in particular, sincerely regretted the loss of an affectionate, amiable, and virtuous consort. When Dr. Tenison, who succeeded archbishop Tillotson, condoled with him on his misfortune, he replied, that he could not but grieve, since he had lost a wife whom, in the course of seventeen years, he had never known to have been guilty of an indiscretion. Besides the consideration of her merit and virtue, he had a political ground of uneasiness. He knew that Mary had always been a favourite of the people, and that this circumstance, added to the priority of her claim to the crown, had given her a degree of weight and importance, the want of which might prove prejudicial to his power and influence. He reflected, that her pretensions, as the first protestant heir of James, were now vested in the princess Anne of Denmark, though the parliament had settled the crown on him for his life; and that the spirit of faction might take advantage of that point, to embroil his government, and undermine his authority. He was therefore reconciled to that princess.

It was apprehended by the friends of the government, that the Jacobites might be encouraged, by the death of the queen, to make some efforts for the restoration of her father. They certainly hoped to profit by that event, but their hopes were fallacious. Compliments, condolence, and promises of support, were voted to the king by both houses; and similar addresses were presented to him from the principal corporations throughout his dominions, in the beginning of 1695.

Those persons who had been tried in Lancashire on a charge of treason, complained to the commons of the injustice they had suffered; but the house voted, on the 6th of February, 1695, that sufficient grounds had existed for the trial of those individuals, and that a dangerous plot had been carried on against the king and government. The peers likewise justified the process which had been instituted against them. They, however, prosecuted the king's witnesses; who, being tried at the Lancaster assizes, were found guilty of perjury.

In this session several scenes of infamous corruption were exposed to public view. Upon an enquiry into the abuses of the army, colonel Hastings was dismissed from his regiment, and several agents and contractors were imprisoned. After which the commons investigated the delinquency of the commissioners for licensing hackney-coaches, who were accused of having betrayed their trust by the acceptance of bribes: three of them were removed from their office by the king. Suspecting the corporation of London of the guilt of corruption, the house appointed a committee to examine the chamberlain's books; and from this inspection it appeared, that sir John Trevor, speaker of the house, and master of the rolls, had received a thousand guineas for his encouragement of the bill for the relief of the orphans and other creditors of the city. He was therefore declared guilty of a high crime and misdemeanour. When sir John (who had been employed by the court in the dishonourable practice of corrupting members) had put the mortifying question relating to his own guilt, and which was readily decided against him, he absented himself from the house; and the office of speaker was conferred on Paul Foley, one of the leaders of opposition. By a subsequent resolution, on the 16th of March, Trevor was deprived of his seat; as was also a member named Hungerford, who had accepted a small present for the same service. Many other instances of bribery and corruption were likewise brought to light by the committees, particularly with regard to the East India Company; and many individuals of the house were implicated in the corrupt practices which had been investigated.

The enormous burthens which England had sustained during the war, and the inadequate share which her confederates had borne in the charges of it, drew an address from the commons, desiring that this kingdom might, in future, only be put upon an equal footing and proportion with the allies. A debate likewise took place with respect to the navy; during which, however, the interests of the mariners were neglected, though the king had recommended to the attention of parliament the circumstances of that useful body of men, whose grievances, occasioned by official fraud, rapacity, and tyranny, called loudly for redress.

The silver coin had been greatly debased, and was become so generally prejudicial, that both houses took into their consideration this alarming evil, which had proceeded to such an extent, that a hundred nominal shillings were not worth above half that sum. A law was therefore enacted for enforcing, with additional rigour, the punishment of all those who should clip or counterfeit the coin of the realm.

On the 3rd of May, the king prorogued the parliament, when he promised to commit the administration of the kingdom to persons "on whose care and fidelity he could entirely depend," and desired that every member of both houses would concur with them, and be "more than ordinarily vigilant" in preserving the public peace. The individuals whom he selected for the task of government, under the title of lords justices, were, Dr. Tenison, archbishop of Canterbury, the lord keeper Somers, the lord privy seal Pembroke, the lord steward Devonshire, the secretary Shrewsbury, the chamberlain Dorset, and the first lord of the treasury Godolphin. Sir John Trenchard having lately died, sir William Trumbal, an eminent civilian, was appointed to succeed him as secretary of state. Two earldoms were conferred about the same time; that of Rochford on Zuylestein, one of the Dutch favourites, and that of Tankerville on lord Grey of Werke.

The lords justices, however, though they had been appointed to the government of the nation during the absence of the king, had little real authority, but were obliged to regulate their conduct by the instructions which they received from him. The exclusion of the princess Anne from acting in the regency gave rise to some murmurs; and it was considered as a strong argument of the insincerity of the king's reconciliation with her. She herself, indeed, was equally insincere; for, while she professed an attachment to William's interests, she maintained a correspondence with her father; and engaged to second his efforts for the recovery of his throne. The earl of Marlborough had, some years before, undertaken to bring her back to a sense of filial duty; and his suggestions had so far prevailed over a mind tinctured with Tory principles, and disgusted with the behaviour of the reigning prince, that she had implored the forgiveness of James, and promised to atone for her former desertion of him by her future zeal in his service.

Lord Sydney's administration in Ireland not being popular, the king recalled him to England, and appointed him master general of the ordnance; and conferred the government of that kingdom on three lords justices, namely, lord Capel, sir Cyril Wyche, and William Duncombe. The first of these courted the protestants, and discountenanced the catholics; and acted as the leader of a party, rather than as a just and unbiassed ruler. His associates were more upright and impartial in their proceedings; but they were at length removed from the helm by his influence; and he became the sole governor, by the style of lord-deputy. He procured supplies from the parliament, and gave the royal assent to a variety of bills, for securing the government against the machinations of papists, and for other purposes of expediency.

In the Netherlands this year the allies out-numbered their enemies; on which account, as well as in consideration of the death of the duke of Luxemburg, the French resolved on defensive measures. William had fixed his thoughts on the re-capture of Namur, and accordingly made the necessary preparations for the siege of that place; which was partly invested by the allies when the mareschal de Bouffleurs entered it with a body of troops, which encreased the garrison to fourteen thousand men. The extraordinary strength of Namur, the fortifications of which had been greatly improved since it had fallen under the dominion of France, gave such confidence to the defenders, that the efforts of the besiegers were long considered as nugatory. The allies, however, were not discouraged; but, being inspired by the courage of their royal commander, persevered in their gallant exertions. The garrison behaved with the greatest valour, and it was not till almost every part had been taken by storm, that they offered to capitulate: this was on the 25th of July, the twenty-fourth day after the opening of the trenches. When the numerous batteries of the besiegers, by an incessant emission of bullets and bombs, had effected various breaches, an assault was made on all the works which composed the citadel. Though about two thousand of the allies were killed or wounded in this service, they failed in their grand object, and only extended their quarters. They therefore made preparations for another assault; but the mareschal de Bouffleurs prevented it by a seasonable surrender. When the vanquished, reduced to a less number than six thousand, marched out of the place, Bouffleurs was arrested by order of William, as a hostage for the release of the garrisons of Dixmuyde and Deynse (m). The king's spirit, in this instance, was applauded by all who resented the perfidy of his opponents; and his conduct of the siege increased his military reputation. He retired from the camp after the recovery of Namur; and the campaign closed with that important achievement.

(m) The French had taken Dixmuyde and Deynse. The governors of these towns had surrendered them without making any vigorous defence; and one of them (Ellenbeger) was beheaded by the allies for misconduct, and the other (O'Farrel) was cashiered. By a cartel which had been adjusted between the hostile powers, prisoners of war were entitled to their liberty, on the offer of a certain ransom; but the men who had garrisoned these towns, being in this predicament, had been detained by the French: they were now sent back, however, in exchange for the mareschal de Bouffleurs.

On the Rhine, nothing worthy of mention occurred. On the Italian frontier, the French surrendered the strong town of Casal, but Louis was secretly negociating with the duke of Savoy. In Catalonia, admiral Russel furnished the Spaniards with a body of land forces, that they might attack the French near Palamos; but perceiving they would not engage the enemy, he re-embarked his men, bombarded the town, and sailed towards Toulon, where the French fleet still remained. He then sailed to Cadiz, from whence he returned to England with a part of the combined fleets.

Several French ports were again bombarded this year. Lord Berkeley and admiral Allemonde sailed to St. Malo's with an English and Dutch fleet; and damaged that town by a furious discharge of bombs and carcasses. Granville sustained a similar visitation. The fleet then returned to the Downs, and having received some land forces on board, steered to Dunkirk, where the precautions of the French again obstructed the approach of the bomb vessels and fire ships. Calais was the next object; but the bombardment of that town was ineffectual.

In 1694 the French had made a descent on Jamaica, and, having committed great devastations and barbarities, were obliged to retire with loss. To revenge this insult, Wilmot was detached with a squadron this year to Hispaniola, where he destroyed the French towns at Port de Paix and Cape François, ravaged the adjacent country, and acquired considerable spoils: but his arbitrary conduct and rapacity occasioned a disunion which prevented the complete success of the expedition. An epidemical disorder raging, vast numbers of the English were carried off by it; and Wilmot himself, in his way to Europe, fell a victim to its ravages.

The numerous French vessels which infested the seas did no small injury to the English commerce, by the capture of several valuable ships returning from India, as well as from other quarters. To protect the trade, however, two squadrons had been sent out under Hopson and the marquis of Caermarthen, besides a multitude of particular convoys and cruisers. The marquis indeed was not very useful in his station; for, on the sight of a fleet of merchantment, which he took for French ships of war, he precipitately retired into Milford Haven. The prizes gained by the English were inconsiderable, except the capture of two ships of the line; a service in which captain Killigrew was slain.

When William returned from the continent, he held a council, in which it was debated whether a new parliament should be summoned, or the present be continued for another session, which was allowed by a clause in the triennial act. The former was adopted, and with a view of courting popular favour, the king made a progress, during the elections, through some of the midland and eastern counties, and endeavoured to soften his repulsive manners into ease and complacency. The close of his tour was remarkable. A sumptuous entertainment was provided for him by the university of Oxford; but a suspicion of a design of poisoning him having arisen from an anonymous letter addressed to the duke of Ormond, he abruptly departed without partaking of the banquet, and hastened to the palace of Windsor.

The new parliament assembled on the 22nd of November, and Foley was again chosen speaker. The following day the king harangued the two houses, observing, that as the advice of his first parliament had engaged him in the war, and the second had cheerfully assisted him in the prosecution of it, a concern for the common safety would undoubtedly oblige the new assembly to be unanimous in the same cause. He affirmed, that, "without the concurrence of the valour and power of England, it was impossible to put a stop to the ambition and greatness of France." Though he lamented the necessity of "asking so many and such large aids of his people," he could not but demand supplies at least equal to those which had been lately granted; and it even appeared that an augmentation of the navy was requisite. After adverting to some other particulars, he hoped that all possible dispatch would be made in the national business, and that all "heats and divisions" would be carefully avoided.

The promoters of the bill intended to favour persons tried for treason, resolved to make the king's assent to it the price of the expected supply. It provided, that all individuals accused of high treason, or misprision of treason, should have a copy of the whole indictment five days previous to their trial, and the pannel of the jurors two days before it; that they might be assisted by two counsellors at law; that none should be indicted for those crimes, except by the oaths of two lawful witnesses to the same overt act, or one to each of two overt acts of the same species of treason; and that prosecutions for those offences should not be commenced after the expiration of three years, with an exception of the case of those who should design or attempt to murder the king. William thought proper to give his sanction to this bill; and thus the people were at length gratified with a statute which mitigated such severities as had been the objects of frequent and just complaint.

The business of the coin produced warm debates; for the debasement of the silver had given rise to another evil, namely, the rise of the gold coin far beyond its value. Since a guinea had advanced to thirty shillings, it was asserted, the Dutch and other foreigners had deluged us with their gold, to the great loss of the public. It was therefore resolved by the commons, on the 10th of December, that the clipped silver money should be re-coined, according to the old standard; and that the deficiency of that coin (in order that the people might sustain no loss by its being called in) should be supplied by the sum of one million two hundred thousand pounds, which should be levied by a tax (for seven years) on the windows of all dwelling houses, except cottages. The diminished crowns and half crowns were first stopped by proclamation; and, on a subsequent day, all irregular currency was prohibited. As the exorbitant advance of the gold coin likewise called for redress, the reduction of it was strongly recommended by the ministerial party; and it was resolved that the currency of guineas should be settled at twenty-two shillings.

The new parliament had testified rather an uncourtly inclination, and the multiplication of the burthens on the people, co-operating with the interruption of trade and the decline of credit, had occasioned great discontent. The Jacobites now revived their hopes, and thought this a favourable opportunity of restoring their fallen monarch. While one part proceeded against William in the bolder manner, by attempting to excite an insurrection, another, consisting of the most desperate conspirators, formed a scheme of assassination. Sir George Barclay, a native of Scotland, who had served as an officer in James's army, and a bigot to the catholic faith, undertook the bold task of assassinating the king. This design he imparted to Harrison, Charnock, Porter, and sir William Perkins, by whom it was approved; and, after various consultations, it was resolved to attack the king on his return from Richmond, where he commonly hunted on Saturdays; and the scene of their ambuscade was a lane between Brentford and Turnham Green. To secure success, it was agreed that their number should be increased to forty horsemen, and each conspirator began to engage proper persons to assist in this dangerous enterprize. When their number was complete, they waited with impatience for the hour of action; but some of the under actors, seized with fear or remorse, resolved to prevent the execution by a timely discovery. One Prendergast, an Irish officer of the catholic persuasion, gave information of the plot, but refused to mention the persons who were concerned as associates in the undertaking. His information was at first disregarded; but it was soon confirmed by one De la Rue, a Frenchman, and still more by the flight of sir George Barclay, who began to perceive that the whole was discovered. The night previous to the intended day of assassination, a large number of the conspirators were apprehended, and the whole scheme was communicated to the privy council. Prendergast became an evidence for the crown, and the conspirators were brought to their trial. On the 11th of March, 1696, some of the delinquents were brought to trial: these were Robert Charnock, one of the two fellows of Magdalen College, who in the reign of James had renounced the Protestant faith; lieutenant King, and Thomas Keys. They were found guilty of high treason, and executed at Tyburn. Sir John Friend, an opulent citizen of London, was tried and condemned, on the 18th, for having promoted the intended insurrection. Sir William Perkins, (one of the six clerks in chancery,) who had encouraged the design upon the king's person, being tried and found guilty, was executed with Friend, on the 3rd of April. Rookwood, Cranborne, Lowick, and Cook, were next brought to their trials, and being all found guilty, the three former were executed, but the sentence of the latter was converted into an order for his banishment.

banishment. Knightley, who pleaded guilty to the indictment, was gratified with a pardon (n).

This conspiracy gave rise to a bill which provided "for the better security of his majesty's person and government;" it enacted, that such as should persist in their refusal to take the oaths, should be subject to the forfeitures of popish recusants; that all who should deny William's right to the crown, or impugn the act of settlement, should be liable to a penalty; that those who should decline to enter into the general association should be excluded from all offices of profit or trust; and that, after the dissolution of the present parliament, all who should be elected members should lose their seats for a refusal to sign that engagement. The session produced many other acts, among which were, one for annulling the election of those candidates who should be guilty of corruption; another for preventing false and double returns; a third for the further regulation of elections (o); others for continuing the parliament in case of the death of the king or his successors, for the encrease and encouragement of seamen, and for the improvement of several branches of commerce.

The grant of supplies was very considerable: for the navy, two millions and a half were granted, besides sixteen thousand nine hundred and seventy-two pounds for two regiments of marines; and for the army, two million, five hundred and seven thousand, eight hundred and eighty-one pounds. These subsidies, added to the sum raised on account of the re-coinage, oppressed the people beyond the burthens of every former year. The session was closed on the 27th of April, with a complimentary speech from the king, who, having again nominated the former lords-justices of the kingdom, created two peers, and constituted a board of trade, made another voyage to the continent.

Early in the spring, some of his general officers had formed a scheme for the destruction of a considerable French magazine at Givet, which completely succeeded. After William had joined the army, the season elapsed without any battle or enterprize; which inactivity has been attributed to the suspence arising from the prevalence of negociations. None of the allies acceded to the pacific overtures made by France, except the duke of Savoy, who concluded an advantageous treaty with the mareschal de Catinat. Not content with deserting his late associates, he turned his arms against them, by commencing the siege of Valenza, which held out till a convention was signed for the termination of the war in Italy.

While the French army were preparing for a descent upon England, they had recalled the greater part of their fleet from the Mediterranean. Orders were also sent for the return of the English and Dutch ships which Russel had left in the Bay of Cadiz: when he had reached the Channel, sir George Rooke succeeded him in the command. Sir George was directed to intercept the returning fleet of France, but the latter had arrived at Brest about the time of his sailing from St. Helen's. He proposed to make an attempt for the destruction of the French fleet in Brest harbour, but it was over ruled as impracticable. Sir George Rooke was succeeded in the command by lord Berkeley, who sailed towards the coast of France, and sent detachments on several petty enterprizes. Some small islands near Belle Isle (Grouais, Houat, and Hedic,) were plundered and ravaged in July. St. Martin's in the Isle of Rhé was considerably injured by bombardment; and hostilities of the same kind were prosecuted, though with less effect, against Olone in Poictou.

Du Bart was very active against the commerce of the maritime powers, and Benbow (now promoted to the rank of rear-admiral) was sent with a small squadron in quest of him. After attempting, without success, to block him up at Dunkirk, Benbow sailed towards Yarmouth. He was informed that Du Bart had fell in with a large fleet of Dutch traders on the 8th of June, and had captured about thirty of them, as well as five men of war by which they were escorted, but that on the approach of another convoy, he burnt all his prizes, except one (which was retaken), and effected his escape from the enemy.

The principal transaction of this year in North America, was a descent upon Newfoundland, where the English had a flourishing colony. Eight French privateers landed a strong body of men on that island, where they reduced most of the settlements, and occasioned the loss of a ship of war, which was burned by the crew, that it might not fall into the hands of the enemy.

When the parliament assembled, on the 20th of October, after his return, William informed the houses that overtures for peace had been made, and said, "the only way of treating with France is with swords in our hands; and we can have no reason to expect a safe and honourable peace, but by shewing ourselves prepared to make a vigorous and effectual war." He therefore requested that sufficient sums might be granted for the service of the following year, as well as for the supply of deficiencies. The two houses prefaced their deliberations with a loyal address. The commons proceeded to the business of supply; and assigned for the navy two million three hundred and seventy two thousand one hundred and ninety seven pounds; and for the army two million five hundred and seven thousand eight hundred and eighty-one pounds. They were alarmed at the great amount of the deficiencies, and at the decline of public credit, which had sunk so low, that the notes issued by the bank were discounted at twenty per cent. and the tallies of the exchequer at forty and even sixty. The inconveniences arising from the scarcity of coin were, at the same time generally felt. Under the auspices of Montague, the chancellor of the exchequer, a bill was prepared, in the beginning of 1697, for the establishment of a general fund for the supply of former failures, which were estimated at five millions, one hundred and sixty thousand, four hundred and fifty-nine pounds. This bill provided for the continuance of various duties to the 1st of August, 1706. It was likewise enacted, to support the tottering credit of the bank, that the stock of the corporation should be augmented by new subscriptions; that the bank should be exempt from all taxes; and that the forgery of bank notes should be a capital offence. Another bill was brought forward for removing, by fresh taxation, a deficiency of eight hundred and forty thousand pounds.

The progress of the re-coinage being unequal to the constant demands of trade, it was directed, by two statutes, that bills should be issued from the exchequer, to the amount of two million, seven hundred thousand pounds. In consequence of the provisions with respect to the exchequer bills, trade again began to rear its languishing head.

The case of sir John Fenwick was considered as one of the greatest stretches of power exhibited during this reign. This gentleman, whose name had been mentioned among the rest of the conspirators, was apprehended in his way to France. There was little evidence against him, except an intercepted letter which he wrote to his wife. It is true, he offered to discover all he knew of a conspiracy against the king; but when he came to enter into the detail, he so managed his information, that it could affect no individual concerned. King William, therefore, sent over word from Holland, where he then was, that unless the prisoner could make more material discoveries, he should be brought to his trial. The only material evidences against him were one Porter and Goodman, but of these lady Fenwick had the good fortune to secrete one, so that only Porter, a single witness, remained; and his unsupported evidence, by the late law, was insufficient to affect the life of the prisoner. However, the house of commons were resolved to inflict that punishment upon him which the laws were unable to execute. As he had, in his discoveries, made very free with the names of many persons in that house, admiral Russel insisted that he might have an opportunity of vindicating his own character in particular. Sir John Fenwick was ordered to the bar of the house, and there exhorted by the speaker to make an ample discovery. He refused, and a bill of attainder was preferred against him, which was passed by a large majority. He was furnished with a copy of the indictment, allowed counsel at the bar of the house, and the counsel of the crown was called upon to open the evidence. After much disputation, where passion and revenge were rather attended to than reason, the (n) Jeremy Collier, (the antagonist of the licentious dramatic writers) and two other clerical non-jurors, attended Friend and Perkins at Tyburn, and gave them a solemn absolution. For this interference, which was considered as an encouragement of the treason for which these persons suffered, two of the ecclesiastics were imprisoned; and Collier, having absconded, was outlawed.

(o) One bill with this title was rejected by the king, though we are not informed of the noxious clauses it contained. A motion was made in the lower house, for censuring his adviser; but such was the loyal spirit which then prevailed, that, on a division, the adversaries of this proposal exceed, in more than a threefold degree, the number of its friends.

bill was committed and sent up to the house of lords, where sir John Fenwick was found guilty, by a majority of only seven voices. The prisoner solicited the mediation of the lords in his behalf, while his friends implored the royal mercy. The lords, however, gave him to understand, that the success of his suit would depend upon the fulness of his discoveries. He would have previously stipulated for pardon, and they insisted on his trusting to their favour. He hesitated some time between the fears of infamy and the terrors of death. At last he chose death as the least terrible, and he suffered beheading on Tower Hill with great composure. His death proved the insufficiency of any laws to protect the subject, when a majority of the powerful shall think proper to dispense with them!

While the parliament were employed in various deliberations, the earl of Pembroke, the viscount Villiers, and sir Joseph Williamson, had been appointed to treat with the representatives of the French king on the subject of a general peace, in concert with the plenipotentiaries of the allied powers; and, after some dispute, it was agreed, that the negociators should meet in a palace which belonged to William, near the village of Ryswick, between Delft and the Hague. Here the conferences began in the spring, and were continued during the whole summer.

On the 16th of April, 1697, William prorogued the parliament; after which he made various promotions, and constituted a new regency. He conferred the office of lord chamberlain on the earl of Sunderland, and elevated the lord keeper Somers to the dignity of chancellor, and the honours of the peerage. He ennobled admiral Russel by the title of earl of Oxford; and promoted the viscount Galway to an earldom, besides granting him a participation in the government of Ireland, with the marquis of Winchester and lord Villiers. The regents of England were more numerous than in the two preceding years; for, only Godolphin was omitted, and the earls of Romney, Oxford, and Sunderland, were added.

The French took the strong town of Aeth; but on the Rhine they made no important exertions. The opposite armies seemed to remain inactive, in expectation of the event of the conferences at Ryswick. In Spain, the French laid siege to Barcelona, which they took after it had been defended nearly two months. In South America, Carthagena surrendered to the French arms. The combined fleets of England and Holland were long inactive, but while they were cruising near the coast of France, they captured many Swedish merchantmen, which, being freighted with French goods, and also with the spoils of several English and Dutch ships which had been taken, were condemned as lawful prizes.

At length these hostilities were terminated by the congress of Ryswick; and the conduct of William accelerated the completion of the treaty. The plenipotentiaries of the states general signed the treaty of peace on the 10th of September, on the footing of mutual restitution of conquests in all parts of the world. A treaty of commerce followed between France and that republic. William's representatives concluded a pacification on the same day. A restitution of the conquered places was to be reciprocally made within six months. At last all parties agreed to similar terms, and a general pacification ensued.

The peace of Ryswick was by no means beneficial to the allies, nor yet might it be said to be detrimental to France; for, notwithstanding so many potentates were engaged against her, she was able to renew the contest whenever she saw a fit opportunity. England, her most active enemy, reaped no other fruit from the war, than a rapid accumulation of debt, and a precedent for an unnecessary interference in the politics and turmoils of the continent. Though the peace secured this country from the attempts of James, by depriving him of the assistance of the only court which had been inclined to patronize him, that advantage was an inadequate compensation for the mischievous consequences of the war. From the æra of this war may be reckoned the miseries of this country, in the accumulation of a debt which the people of the present day are scarcely able to pay the interest of.

The return of William from the continent was attended with strong demonstrations of public joy and satisfaction, derived from the restoration of peace. He went to the house on the 3rd of December, and congratulated the parliament on the termination of the war, which, he said, "by the zealous and affectionate assistance of his people," had given way to an honourable peace (p). They would not, however, (he continued,) immediately find that full relief which he could wish, or they might expect; for it was necessary to provide for considerable deficiencies, which had arisen in the funds assigned for the service of the year; and there existed a debt to the fleet and army. He requested that a regular provision might be made for him during his life. He recommended the constant maintenance of a great naval force, and that the army might remain without much diminution.

It was, however, not believed by the generality of the nation, that there was the least necessity for keeping a large standing army on foot. The king's ambitious ideas were easily seen through: it was expected that the king of Spain would not long survive, and William intended to contend for the crown of that kingdom. Notwithstanding the people's murmurs about his wishing to keep so large an army, William intimated his confidence that the parliament would contribute to maintatn the peace with as much zeal as they had testified for the support of the war. Unwilling to adopt this hint in the sense in which William wished it to be taken, they resolved, nemine contradicente, "that all the land forces of this kingdom, which had been raised since the 29th of September, 1680, should be paid and disbanded." It was maintained against the king and his ministers, that the English were enabled, by their fleet and militia, to provide for the safety of the realm; that a standing army had almost invariably proved destructive of liberty; that the alledged impracticability of the introduction of despotism, by the aid of the force now desired, was a mere pretence, as the scheme might be carried on with a degree of artifice and secrecy which might preclude all apprehensions of immediate danger, so that the people, who, in case of an invasion, would have time to prepare for resistance, would be unprovided for withstanding the insidious purposes of an internal foe; that in this case, the boasted power of the purse being in the hands of the commons would be of little utility, and would quickly be transferred into new hands; and that for these reasons it would be highly imprudent to consent to an establishment so pregnant with peril. In consequence of this the earl of Sunderland resigned his office, and retired from court, notwithstanding the king's earnest desire of his continuance: some other changes likewise took place.

The king was highly disgusted at the resolute opposition of the commons to his favourite scheme; but they voted, that, in acknowledgement of his great services to the nation, seven hundred thousand pounds per annum should be granted to him during his life, for the different branches of the civil list. It was intended, indeed, that the additional hundred thousand pounds should be appropriated to the payment of the jointure of James's queen, (as if she were were really a widow,) and the establishment of a household for the duke of Gloucester, son of the princess Anne. But it appears that William declined the payment of the stipulated allowance to the exiled princess (q); and, it is said, that his largest annual grant to the duke did not exceed fifteen thousand pounds.

The military establishment was circumscribed by vote,

(p) An honourable peace!—While the opposite armies of France and the Allies were encamped in the vicinity of Brussels, the earl of Portland demanded an interview with the mareschal de Boufflers. They immediately met between the camps, and conferred for some time in the open field. Four others conferences followed between these military negociators; and in the two last, which were held at a house near Halle, they reduced their terms to writing, and signed an agreement. The earl was then deputed to inform the plenipotentiaries, that all affairs which concerned William and his kingdoms were adjusted with the court of France; and request, that as no delay of the general pacification would arise on his part, the emperor and the other allies would zealously unite their efforts for the speedy conclusion of a work so important and desirable. But the chief object of the conferences between Portland and Boufflers long remained a secret to the public. From the Memoirs of James himself, however, it appears, that a proposal had been made by the French monarch for securing the son of the deposed prince the reversion of the crown of England; and that William, by the medium of the earl, acceded to this proposition, solemnly promising to use his endeavours for the abrogation of the act of settlement, and the enactment of a new law, by which the son of his rival should be appointed his successor, on condition of his adoption of the Protestant faith. Another point of less moment, to which he agreed, was the settlement of fifty-thousand pounds per annum, as a jointure, on the wife of James. Upon such terms the peace must indeed have been very honourable to the English nation, who had driven away their arbitrary monarch to make way for William's accession!

(q) William alledged, on the aurhority of the earl of Portland, (which the mareschal de Boufflers controverted,) that the removal of James from St. Germain's was the condition of the payment; and that, as the former article was not executed, the performance of the latter could not be expected. Macpherson.

in the beginning of 1698, within the expence of three hundred and fifty thousand pounds, which, it was computed, would only suffice for the maintenance of about ten thousand horse and foot. A small gratuity was allowed to the disbanded soldiers; and the native officers were indulged with half-pay till they should obtain some other support. For the navy ten thousand men were voted. As the arrears for the different services formed too heavy a demand for immediate payment (r), the commons only provided a part of them in the present year, and engaged for the gradual discharge of the remainder. Some deficiencies having arisen in the produce of the imposts of the last session, a vote passed for supplying them. Provision was also made for answering all the exchequer bills. As these bills bore interest when they were re-issued, after they had been received in lieu of taxes, some of the officers of the exchequer, customs, and excise, put false indorsements upon a great number of them, before they were entitled to any allowance. For this fraud Duncombe and Knight were expelled from the house of commons, and imprisoned in the Tower; and a bill was introduced for punishing the former by the forfeiture of nearly half of his ample fortune; but the peers rejected it by a majority of one voice (which is said to have been the casting vote of the dvke of Leeds), and ordered the release of the delinquent. The other house, offended at this interference, remanded him to prison, where he continued till the close of the session. It was conjectured, that the fury of the storm had been averted by the arts of corruption.

After a session of above seven months, the king, in the beginning of July, prorogued the parliament, and he soon after dissolved it. He took the opportunity of the recess to re-visit Holland, appointing the lords justices to govern this country in his absence. The English, disgusted at his preference of his native country to one in which he had acquired a splendid and powerful establishment, complained of his partiality in acrimonious terms, and affirmed, that he only resided in this kingdom for the convenience of parliamentary business, while he made choice of Holland from motives of inclination, and seemed to be out of his element when he was not in the bosom of that republic.

A new parliament having been called to succeed that which had been dissolved, the king returned to England in the beginning of December to open it. When the commons had elected a speaker, he confirmed their choice, which had fallen on sir Thomas Littleton, one of the lords of the treasury; and then he addressed both houses. Two points, he said, seemed principally to require their consideration. One related to the force necessary for the naval and military service; the other to the expediency of making further progress in the discharge of the debts contracted during the war. As William had not strictly adhered to the act for the reduction of the army, but had kept up more troops than it allowed, and still persisted in recommending to the two houses the maintenance of a considerable force, the commons were highly displeased; and voted, that all the land forces of England, exceeding seven thousand men, should be paid and disbanded without delay, and that the whole of the retained number should consist of the king's native subjects. When the bill for the reduction of the army was offered to the king for his assent, he yielded to the force of the torrent. He was extremely disgusted at these proceedings of the parliament, and complained to his friends of the "ignorance and malice" of his opponents, even threatening to abandon a kingdom which the people would not enable him to protect as he thought fit." When he passed the bill, on the 1st of February, 1699, he could not refrain from expressing his disapprobation of it. Both houses thanked him in warm terms for his confirmation of the bill; and he completely gratified them by proceeding to put it in execution. But his reluctance to the dismission of the Dutch guards continued to operate on his mind; and he sent a message to the commons by the earl of Ranelagh, on the 18th of March, intimating that, though he had made the necessary preparations for the return of those troops to their own country, yet, if the house would permit them to remain in his service, he should consider himself as highly obliged by such an act of kindness. His humble application, however, did not soften the majority into compliance; and the king, finding it useless to persevere in the contest, gave orders for the speedy transportation of the noxious foreigners. While the commons reduced the army to a small though sufficient number, they added five thousand men to the establishment of the preceding year. They complained of various instances of mismanagement in that department, and the earl of Oxford was dismissed from his seat at the board of admiralty, as well as from his office of treasurer of the navy. The supplies of this session amounted to one million, four hundred and eighty-four thousand, fifteen pounds, towards the payment of the disbanded soldiers, the charges of the navy, and other purposes. In the bill which provided for this grant, a clause was inserted for the appointment of commissioners to take an account of the estates which had been forfeited in Ireland, that they might be applied to the use of the public. The royal assent being given to this bill, and some others of less importance, the king prorogued the parliament with hints of dissatisfaction on the 4th of May (s).

Before the king renewed his annual visit to the continent, he made some changes in the ministry; he then again delegated the chief officers of state to the government of the kingdom, and embarking for Holland, re-entered on the sea of foreign politics, which principally related to the partition of the Spanish monarchy, and the case of the duke of Holstein Gottorp, who was menaced with an invasion from the Danes, in violation of the peace of Altena. But an object of a more personal nature claimed the interposition of William: this was a contest between the prince of Conti and the duchess of Nemours for the county of Neufchatel; but an English envoy asserted the right of his master to the disputed territory, which William consented to wave during the lifetime of the duchess, and it was agreed that she should remain in quiet possession.

The spirited conduct of the majority, in the last session, had so displeased the king, that he was inclined to make another appeal to the sense of the nation, by convoking a new parliament; but he was dissuaded from this measure, and the late legislative body again met by his order. He opened the session, on the 16th of November, 1699, with a recommendation of a further provision for the safety of the kingdom by sea and land, of a compleat compensation of the deficiencies of the funds, and other matters of less importance. The commons, recollecting his former hints of displeasure, and thinking that some of the expressions in his present speech bore a tincture of the same dissatisfaction, voted a remonstance in lieu of a courtly address. They considered it, they said, as their greatest misfortune, that, after having so amply provided for the security of his majesty and the government, any suspicions had been raised of their zeal and affection for him and his people. The king, perceiving they were offended, sought to allay their discontent by a plausible and conciliatory answer, but he sought in vain.

The commissioners, who had been appointed to enquire into the value of the forfeited estates in Ireland, and the grants which had been made of any of them, did not perfectly agree in the report which was intended for the parliament; for it was only signed by four out of seven; and the minority presented a memorial to each house, signifying their dissent to particular articles. It was stated in this report, that the number of persons outlawed in Ireland on account of the rebellion, since William ascended the throne, amounted to three thousand, nine hundred and twenty-one; that the forfeited lands might be computed at one million, sixty thousand, seven hundred and ninety-two acres, the annual produce of which might be estimated at two hundred and eleven thousand six hundred and twenty-three pounds, and the full value at two million six hundred and eighty-five thousand one hundred and thirty-eight pounds, that is, little more than twelve years and a half purchase. When the report had been perused by the commons on the 15th of December, they unanimously resolved, that a bill should be brought in for applying all the forfeitures in Ireland, and all grants of them, or of the rents and revenues of the crown in that kingdom, to the use of the public; and they also declared, that they would not receive any petition relative to these forfeitures or grants, but that all disputes should be determined by a particular court of judicature. When this affair was agitated nine years before, William had engaged not to make any grant of those lands, till the whole business should be settled by parliament; but as he had repeatedly violated this promise, the enquiry gave him great uneasiness. Having taken into consideration the disputes which had divided the commissioners, the house justified the four who had signed the report, and declared that they had acquitted themselves in the execution of their trust, "with understanding, courage, and integrity;" while one of their associates (sir Richard Leving) suffered imprisonment, for having thrown out "groundless and scandalous aspersions" on their proceedings. The courtiers endeavoured to qualify the odious bill, by moving for the reservation of a part of the forfeitures to the king's disposal; but the motion was over-ruled; and the house, on the 18th of January, 1700, adopted one of a different tendency, which represented the grants as highly dishonourable to William and his advisers. On the 21st of February, the king vindicated the propriety of the grant which he had made; and observed, in a tone of displeasure, that the prosecution of "just and effectual" means of lessening the national debt, and supporting public credit, would "best contribute to the honour, interest, and safety of the kingdom." This reply so irritated the commons, that they animadverted on the adviser as one who studiously sought to create a misunderstanding and jealousy between the sovereign and his people. The bill being at length completed, and the grant of the land-tax interwoven with it, that the king might not have an opportunity of rejecting one without the other, it was, on the 2nd of April, sent to the upper house. The lords having made some alterations on the bill, a conference took place between the houses, which ended in a peremptory refusal of the amendments. Other conferences were equally unproductive of an agreement; and the commons were inflamed with indignation. William was long doubtful whether he should confirm or reject a bill which invalidated so many of his grants, and debarred him from disposing of the remainder of the forfeitures; but the dread of a convulsive ferment so far prevailed over his feelings of reluctance and resentment, that he privately requested his friends in the upper house to accede to the wishes of the commons. The peers being thus influenced, a majority agreed to the bill in the state in which they had received it; and the king gave his assent to it, but testified his displeasure by proroguing the parliament, without the compliment of a speech, on the 11th of April.—With regard to the establishments of the year, it may be necessary to mention, that the army was left unaltered, while the navy was reduced to seven thousand.

(r) Those of the army, to the end of September, 1697, amounted to two million, three hundred and forty-eight thousand, one hundred and two pounds; towards the payment of which, the paymaster (the earl of Ranelagh) had only eight hundred and fifty-five thousand five hundred and two pounds in his hands on the 1st of January, 1698. The general debt of the navy was one million, three hundred and ninety-two thousand, seven hundred and forty-two pounds, exclusive of the arrears of the transport service. The arrears of subsidies for military aid amounted to nine hundred and seventy-six thousand, two hundred and twenty rix dollars, due to the king of Denmark, the elector of Brandenburg, the landgrave of Hesse Cassel, the dukes of Holstein, Zell, and Wolfenbuttle, the duke (created, in 1692, elector) of Hanover, and the bishop of Munster. Journals of the Commons.

(s) Previous to the close of this session, lord Mohun was again tried for murder by the peers, and met with another acquittal. The earl of Warwick was tried for a concern in the same murder (that of an officer named Coote;) and being found guilty of manslaughter, was discharged on claiming the benefit of the peerage.

During this session a rigorous law was enacted, which promised a reward to any person who should apprehend a popish priest in the exercise of his function, condemned to perpetual imprisonment all who should discharge any part of that priesthood, as well as all catholic instructors of youth, and disabled the professors of that religion from inheriting or purchasing any estate, unless they should take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and deny the doctrine of transubstantiation.

Soon after the prorogation of parliament, William resolved to gratify the Tories, who had so violently opposed him, by the dismission of lord Somers from the post of chancellor; and, after a temporary commission, he presented the great seal, with the title of lord-keeper, to sir Nathan Wright, a zealous Tory, whose talents and attainments were inadequate to the trust. Other changes of importance he deferred till his return from the continent. Thither, having appointed a regency, he repaired in the summer.

While at Loo, the king received intelligence of an event which rendered a new settlement of the crown necessary. This was the decease of the duke of Gloucester, the only remaining child of the princess of Denmark, who expired of a fever on the 29th of July in the twelfth year of his age (t). His death revived the hopes of the Jacobite faction; while it turned the attention of the friends of the Revolution to the next protestant heir, Sophia, electress dowager of Hanover, who, in a visit to William, concurred with him on the prospect of the English succession.

King William returned to England on the 18th of October; the parliament met on the 6th of November, and was prorogued till the 11th of February, 1701. In the mean time the king made such ministerial alterations as, he thought, would subdue the opposition of the Tories. He caressed their leader, the earl of Rochester, whom he elevated to the viceroyalty of Ireland. He appointed sir Charles Hedges secretary of state, in the room of the earl of Jersey, who had succeeded the duke of Shrewsbury as lord chamberlain. He restored lord Godolphin to the office of first commissioner of the treasury, on the removal of the earl of Tankerville to the post of lord privy seal. By the advice of these ministers, who, though their party had prevailed in the last parliament, were doubtful of retaining the support of the majority, he issued a proclamation on the 19th of December, for the dissolution of that assembly, and the speedy meeting of a new national council.

The state of affairs, both at home and abroad, perplexed the mind of William. The frequent and strong opposition which he met with from his parliamentary subjects, and the difficulty of tempering the factious heats of two incensed parties, rendered his situation unpleasant and irksome. The new parliament met on the 11th of February, 1701; and the commons having filled their chair with Robert Harley, who was recommended by the new ministry, William sent for them to the house of peers, and opened the session with observing, that the national misfortune, in the loss of the duke of Gloucester, rendered it absolutely necessary to make a further provision for the succession to the crown in the protestant line; that the death of the king of Spain, and the appointment of Philip, grandson to Louis XIV. for his successor, had made so great an alteration in the affairs of Europe, as to suggest the expediency of deliberating on the consequences of those incidents; and that the public debts, the condition of the navy, and the regulation of trade, also demanded the attention of the house.

In answer to this speech, the commons declared, that they would support the king and his government, and take such measures as would "best conduce to the interest and safety of England, the preservation of the protestant religion, and the peace of Europe." Pleased with the king's desire of counsel, the commons advised, on the 20th of February, to enter into such negociations, in concert with the states general and other powers, as might contribute to their mutual safety, and the maintenance of general peace; and held out a prospect of support, and of that aid which had been promised to the states by treaty. A letter having been intercepted, which seemed likely to diffuse an alarm, as it spoke of the restoration of James, and might therefore incline the two houses to hostile measures against France, William communicated it to them. The commons treated it with contempt; but the peers thanked him for the communication, and advised him to seize the horses and arms of disaffected persons: and that a fleet might be got in readiness, the commons voted thirty thousand seamen for the service of the year.

The new adjustment of the succession furnished an opportunity for insisting on some popular provisions which had been neglected in the Bill of Rights; and the Tories, though they have been censured for their encouragement of the high claims of prerogative, were the first who resolved to seize this favourable occasion for securing, by farther stipulations, the rights and liberties of the people. The regulations for which they moved, on the 12th of March, 1701, were these: That all affairs, cognizable in the privy council, should be transacted in that assembly, and the resolutions should be signed by the assenting members; that no foreigner, though naturalized, should be appointed a privy counsellor, become a member of either house, enjoy any office of trust, whether civil or military, or receive any grant of lands from the crown; that no pardon should be deemed valid, when pleaded to a parliamentary impeachment; that no placeman or pensioner should serve as a member of the house of commons; and that the judges should have fixed salaries, and should retain their commissions during their good behaviour, but might be removed at the desire of both houses. It was also resolved, at the motion of the same party, that future sovereigns should not embark this nation, without the consent of parliament, in any war for the defence of foreign territories not belonging to the crown; that they should not leave the British dominions without the same consent, and that they should join in communion with the church of England (u).

(t) The preceptor of this prince (bishop Burnet) informs us, that he possessed a good understanding, an extraordinary memory, and a judgement which exceeded his years; and another prelate (Kennet) speaks of the vivacity of his genius, his fondness for manly exercises, his early knowledge, and his spirit of devotion.

These improvements of the Bill of Rights were followed by a vote, which declared Sophia (the electress dowager of Hanover), and her posterity, the next Protestant heirs of the crown, after the king and the princess Anne, on the failure of issue from either (v). Till that time the new provisions were not to take effect. The bill which comprehended these important particulars passed through both houses with little opposition, and received the royal assent. The friends of the Protestant faith were pleased with a settlement which secured the throne to persons of their persuasion; and the advocates of liberty rejoiced at the additional restrictions that were imposed upon the power of the crown.

Both houses having desired the production of copies of all the treaties which William had concluded since the peace of Ryswick, the scheme for the division of the Spanish monarchy caused a great warmth of debate and severity of animadversion. In the commons, some of the members reprobated the king's conduct in aiming at the division of the dominions of another prince, as equivalent to a flagrant robbery; and one of the speakers (Howe) stigmatized the treaty as felonious.

The Tories were now prompted, by the zeal of party, to proceed to an impeachment of the Whig leaders who had retired from office: but, before they attacked their countrymen, they resolved to assail a foreigner; and therefore began their career of accusation against the earl of Portland, with a vote, on the 1st of April, declaring him highly criminal for his concern in the negociations which they condemned. This vote was succeeded by an impeachment of the earl at the bar of the upper house. Lord Somers was impeached, on the 15th of the same month, as an adviser of the first treaty; and similar resolutions were adopted against the earl of Orford, and Charles Montague, who had been created baron of Halifax (w). An address was then voted for the perpetual removal of these four noblemen from the royal presence; and William replied, that he should employ none in his service, but such as were most likely to establish a good correspondence between him and his people.

While the commons were preparing to carry the impeachments into effect, William, on the 8th of May, made another attempt to bring them over to his warlike purposes, by telling them that the safety of England, as well as the very existence of Holland, depended on their immediate interposition. After a debate, they unanimously resolved, that they would effectually contribute to the support of his allies, and to the maintenance of the liberty of Europe, and would immediately provide the desired succours for the states.

After a delay of several weeks, the commons completed their articles of charge against the earl of Orford. Besides the affair of the partition, they accused him of having procured exorbitant grants from his sovereign, embezzled the public money, obtained a commission for Kidd the pirate, and neglected the duties of his naval command. They received a plausible reply from the earl before they had finished their charge against lord Somers, whom they represented as not only having advised the king to conclude the first treaty of partition, but prepared commissions for that purpose without a lawful warrant; as having confirmed the second under the great seal, committed various illegalities in his office, encouraged Kidd, and received enormous grants from the crown. This nobleman asserted his innocence; but his vindication was not so effectual as to remove either the imputation of rapacity, or of courtly complaisance in measures which he disapproved. The delay of the production of articles against the two other peers induced the upper house to censure the tardy progress of the accusers, as injurious to the persons concerned, and not agreeable to the usual course of impeachment. The commons complained, that this reprimand was unparliamentary and unprecedented, and had a tendency to the creation of discord. The lords having fixed a day for the trial of the earl of Orford, the prosecutors refused to agree to it. The latter, in a conference with the peers, on the 6th of June, proposed a joint committee to adjust all the particulars of the process; but this expedient was rejected as unusual and unnecessary. Further disputes and altercations, of which a detail would be tedious, arose from the prevalence of the Whigs in one house, and of the Tories in the other. At length, when the lords had appointed a time for the trial of Somers, the commons refused to honour it with their presence; alledging, as reasons for their non-attendance, the rejection of their reasonable requests, and the denial of reparation for the indignity offered to them, at one of the conferences, by lord Haversham, who had charged them with partiality, in avoiding an impeachment of some individuals who were involved in the same guilt with the accused peers. The court being assembled in Westminster Hall, on the 17th of June, the lord keeper called for evidence against Somers; but none being adduced, the lords adjourned to their own house, and had a long debate, which terminated in a vote for his acquittal. The commons not only controverted, in strong terms, the legality of this procedure, but imputed the ill consequences which might attend the delay of the supplies to the conduct of those who, to procure an indemnity for enormous crimes, had promoted a rupture between the houses. The peers, on the other hand, censured these reflections as highly unjust, accused their opponents of aiming at the subversion of the constitution, and attributed the protraction of the necessary business of the year to the "fatal counsel" which had so long postponed the meeting of parliament, as well as to the unnecessary delays of the commons. After these vehement resolutions, the lords proceeded to the trial of the earl of Orford, whom they acquitted in default of evidence. For the same reason they dismissed the articles which had been brought against lord Halifax, as well as the charge against Haversham. The earl of Portland, against whom no articles had been exhibited, was also released from his impeachment. Thus ended an affair which had filled the nation, as well as both houses, with clamour and confusion.

The grants of the session, for the current service, and the payment of arrears, exceeded two millions and a half. In providing for these demands, the commons appropriated, to the payment of interest upon loans, the weekly sum of three thousand seven hundred pounds out of the funds of the civil list, in consideration not only of the excess of that revenue above the estimate, but also of the non-payment of the proposed annuity of the royal disbursements which arose from the death of the duke of Gloucester. It was resolved by the house, in order to assist the Dutch, that twelve battalions should be brought from Ireland, and be augmented to the number of ten thousand men; and William's high opinion of the martial abilities of the earl of Marlborough induced him to confer on that nobleman the command of those troops. A considerable fleet being likewise equipped, sir George Rooke was appointed to the direction of it; and, in conjunction with a Dutch armament, he prepared to resist all aggression. When William had prorogued this turbulent parliament, on the 24th of June, he made preparations for his journey to the continent (x).

While the king was abroad, the zealots of the opposite factions had appealed to the public in a variety of fugitive

(u) Vid. Stat. 13 Gul. III. cap. 2.

(v) Elizabeth, the daughter of James I. having espoused the elector Palatine, who was, for a short time, king of Bohemia, had several children. Sophia, on whom the crown of England was now settled, was one of these. She was married, in 1658, to Earnest Augustus, a prince of the house of Brunswick, who afterwards became the first elector of Hanover. As the duchess of Savoy was grand-daughter of Charles I. and had therefore a better claim, in point of blood, than one who derived her pretensions from a sister of that monarch, she made a formal protestation against all the proceedings of the parliament to her prejudice; but her claim, and that of all other papists had been annulled by the act of settlement in 1689; and as the new bill was founded on the same basis, it could not be supposed that her allegation of an exploded demand would meet with the smallest regard.

(w) These proceedings were so strongly contested by the Whigs, that the vote which pronounced the delinquency of Somers was carried by a majority of only ten voices, and that against lord Halifax by twenty-three; but the earl of Orford had a majority of forty-five against him.

pieces, full of rancorous invectives. The majority of the people being inclined to a war, the Whigs, who were the grand promoters of it, prevailed in the contest. Their views were aided by the conduct of the French king, whose acknowledgement of the son of James had kindled a general flame in the nation. The hope of procuring a majority of the Whig party in the house of commons induced William to determine on a dissolution of the parliament; and on November the 11th, soon after his return from the continent, he issued a proclamation for that purpose, and for new elections. The contests for parliamentary seats were carried on with great eagerness and animosity; but the Tories prevailed, and a majority of that party obtained the advantage of election.

On the 31st of December, the new parliament assembled, and the lower house was divided about the choice of a speaker. The Tories having proposed Harley, he was re-chosen by a majority of four only, in preference to sir Thomas Littleton, who was favoured by the king and the Whigs. William declared his acquiescence; and then made a speech to the two houses. The acknowledgement of the pretended prince of Wales for king of England, he said, was the highest indignity to him and the nation, and so nearly concerned all true protestants and patriots, that they would necessarily reflect on the most effectual means of securing the succession in the protestant line, and "extinguishing the hopes of all pretenders, and their open or secret abettors." He intimated, that the French king, having become, by the medium of his grandson, the real master of the whole Spanish monarchy, had enabled himself to oppress the rest of Europe, unless speedy and energetic measures should be adopted; and that the advantage which that monarch was taking of his augmented power, would sensibly affect England with regard to her trade, her domestic peace and safety, and her concern in the preservation of general liberty. The eyes of all Europe, he added, were directed to this parliament; and all affairs were at a stand, till the resolution of this assembly should be known. There was yet an opportunity of securing the national religion and liberties, by an exertion of hereditary courage and vigour; but it was his opinion, that, if this occasion should be neglected, there was no reason to expect another. A great naval strength would be required, and a land force proportional to that of his allies. It was always with regret, he continued, that he requested pecuniary aids; but they were particularly necessary at this crisis; and he would take care that they should not be misapplied. He conjured both houses to lay aside those animosities by which they were unfortunately divided and weakened: and he hoped that no other distinction would prevail for the future, but of those who were attached to the protestant religion and the present establishment, and of those who wished for a popish prince and a French government.

In their addresses, in answer to the king's speech, presented in the beginning of January, 1702, both houses engaged to support their sovereign, and those whom the parliament had pronounced his heirs against all pretenders whatsoever. The parliament soon after proceeded to the consideration of supply. They voted forty thousand soldiers for the purpose of fulfilling the royal stipulations. For the naval service they voted an equal number of men. They authorized the lords of the treasury to borrow six hundred and fifty thousand pounds at the rate six per cent. and proceeded to the adjustment of other points of finance. They prepared a bill of attainder against the pretended prince of Wales; to which the lords added a clause for attainting the widow of James, who affected to exercise the authority of regent in the name of her son. The commons rejected the amendment, and the peers consented to the bill in its original state; and, though they passed a separate bill against the nominal regent, they could not obtain the assent of the lower house to it.

Several resolutions were likewise adopted, in support of the privileges of the commons; and the Whigs carried two others, in justification of the right of the people to petition the king with regard to parliaments, or for the redress of grievances, as well as of their claim to a speedy trial, whether under an impeachment or any other mode of accusation. The proceedings of the trustees for the Irish forfeitures also underwent some investigation; and the commons justified the behaviour of the trustees, who had been charged with an abuse of their power. In addition to the bill of attainder against the new head of the Jacobite party, the two houses prepared separate bills for the abjuration of that prince. That which the lords brought forward was suppressed by the commons; while that which originated among the latter was carried into effect; but it was not till after warm debates on some of the clauses that it was finally adopted.

The concurrence of both houses in the intended war gave great pleasure to the king, but his joy was soon terminated. For some months he had been in an ill state of health, though it did not disable him from hunting. In one of his excursions, on the 21st of February, he fell from his horse, and his right collar bone was broken by the fall. In the course of a week his recovery from this accident was announced, but in other respects he was still indisposed. Being incapable of a personal attendance in parliament, he commissioned some of the officers of state to signify his assent to the bills that were ready. Though a defluxion in one of his knees, a fever, and other complaints, successively assailed him, he still listened to the calls of public business, and ordered another commission. His indisposition becoming highly dangerous, he prepared for death with the same fortitude with which he had braved it in the field. Having received the sacrament from archbishop Tenison, and faintly conversed with his friends for the last time, he resigned his breath in the arms of one of his domestics, on the 8th of March, 1702. He was then in the fifty-second year of his age, and the fourteenth of his reign.

In his person, William was of a middle stature, a thin body, and a delicate constitution. He had an aquiline nose, sparkling eyes, a high forehead, and a grave solemn aspect. He was very sparing of speech; his conversation was dry, and his manner disgusting, except in battle, when his deportment was free, spirited, and animating. In courage, fortitude, and equanimity, he rivalled the most eminent warriors of antiquity; and his natural sagacity made amends for the defects in his education, which had not been properly superintended. He was religious, temperate, generally just and sincere, a stranger to violent transports of passion, and might have passed for one of the best princes of the age in which he lived, had he never ascended the throne of Great Britain. But the distinguishing criterion of his character was ambition. To this he sacrificed the punctilios of honour and decorum, in deposing his own father-in-law and uncle; and this he gratified at the expence of the nation that raised him to sovereign authority. He aspired to the honour of acting as umpire in all the contests of Europe; and the second object of his attention was, the prosperity of that country to which he owed his birth and extraction. Whether he really thought the interests of the Continent and Great Britain were inseparable, or sought only to drag England into the confederacy as a convenient ally, certain it is he involved these kingdoms in foreign connections, which in all probability, will be productive of their ruin. In order to establish this favourite point, he scrupled not to employ all the engines of corruption, by which the morals of the nation were totally debauched. He procured a parliamentary sanction for a standing army, which now seems to be interwoven in the constitution. He introduced the pernicious practice of borrowing upon remote funds; an expedient that necessarily hatched a brood of usurers, brokers, contractors, and stock jobbers, to prey upon the vitals of their country. He entailed upon the nation a growing debt, and a system of politics big with misery, despair, and destruction. To sum up his character in a few words, William was a predestinarian in religion; indefatigable in war, enterprizing in politics, dead to all the warm and generous emotions of the human heart, a cold relation, an indifferent husband, a disagreeable man, an ungracious prince, and an imperious sovereign. He, however, deserves our praise for his zealous encouragement of the liberal act of toleration (y).

(y) King William died without issue. By his will he bequeathed the principality of Orange, and his other possessions, to prince Friso of Nassau.

BOOK XI.

COMPRIZING THE REIGN OF QUEEN ANNE.

CHAPTER I.

THE exclusion of the catholic branch of the house of Stuart made way for the accession of the protestant heir of the family. This was Anne, the second daughter of the late king James, and the wife of George, the brother of Christian V. king of Denmark. She was now in the thirty-eighth year of her age; a princess of a mild disposition, and a virtuous deportment. Her ascension to the throne gave general satisfaction to all parties. Even the Jacobites seemed pleased with her elevation, on the supposition, that as in all probability she would leave no heirs of her own body, the dictates of natural affection would induce her to alter the succession in favour of her own brother. She had been taught to cherish warm sentiments of the Tories, whom she considered as the friends of monarchy, and the true sons of the church; and they had always professed an inviolable attachment to her person and interest; but her conduct was wholly influenced by the countess of Marlborough, a woman of an imperious temper, and intriguing genius, who had been intimate with the princess from her tender years, and gained a surprizing ascendency over her. Anne had undergone some strange vicissitudes of fortune in consequence of her father's expulsion, and sustained a variety of mortifications in the late reign, during which she conducted herself with discretion. She was zealously devoted to the church of England, from which her father had used some endeavours to detach her before the Revolution; and she lived in great harmony with her husband, to whom she bore six children, all of whom she had already survived. William had no sooner yielded up his breath, than the privy-council in a body waited on the new queen, who assured them, that no pains nor diligence should be wanting on her part, to preserve and support the religion, laws, and liberties of her country, to maintain the succession in the protestant line, and the government in church and state, as by law established. She declared her resolution to carry on the preparations for opposing the exorbitant power of France, and to assure the allies, that she would pursue the true interest of England, together with theirs, for the support of the common cause. The members of the privy-council having taken the oaths, she ordered a proclamation to be published, signifying her pleasure, that all persons in office of authority or government, at the decease of the late king, should so continue till further direction. By virtue of an act passed in the late reign, the parliament continued sitting even after the king's death. Both houses met immediately, and unanimously voted an address of condolence and congratulation; and, in the afternoon, the queen was proclaimed. Next day, the lords and commons severally attended her with an address, congratulating her majesty's accession to the throne; and assuring her of their resolution to support her against all her enemies whatsoever. The commons declared, they would maintain the succession of the crown in the protestant line, and effectually provide for the public credit of the nation. The addresses were graciously received by the queen, who, on the 11th of March, 1702, went to the house of peers with the usual solemnity, where, in a speech to both houses, she expressed her satisfaction at their unanimous concurrence with her opinion, that too much could not be done for the encouragement of their allies in humbling the power of France; and desired they would consider of proper methods towards obtaining an union between England and Scotland. She observed to the commons, that the revenue for defraying the expences of civil government was expired; and she relied entirely on their affection for its being supplied in such a manner as should be most suitable to the honour and dignity of the crown. She declared it should be her constant endeavour to make them the best return for their duty and affection, by a careful and diligent administration for the good of all her subjects. "And as I know my own heart to be entirely English (continued she) I can very sincerely assure you, there is not any thing you can expect or desire from me, which I shall not be ready to do for the happiness and prosperity of England; and you shall always find me a strict and religious observer of my word (a)." She received the thanks of both houses. Addresses of congratulation were presented by the bishop and clergy of London; by the dissenters in and about that city; and, by all the counties, cities, towns, and corporations of England, she declared her attachment to the church; she promised her protection to the dissenters, and received the compliments of all her subjects.

The house of commons gratified the queen by an unanimous vote, by which the revenues assigned for the civil list were secured to her for life. When the bill received the royal assent, she assured them, that one hundred thousand pounds of this revenue should be applied to the public service of the current year: at the same time, she passed another bill, for receiving and examining the public accounts. On the 24th of March, the oath of abjuration was taken by the speaker and members, according to an act for the further security of her majesty's person, and the succession of the crown in the protestant line, and for extinguishing the hopes of the pretended prince of Wales. The queen's inclination to the Tories plainly appeared in her choice of ministers. Doctor John Sharp, archbishop of York, became her director and counsellor in all ecclesiastical affairs. The earl of Rochester was continued lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and enjoyed a great share of her majesty's confidence: the privy-seal was entrusted to the marquis of Normanby: the earl of Nottingham and sir Charles Hedges were appointed secretaries of state: the earl of Abingdon, viscount Weymouth, lord Dartmouth, sir Christopher Musgrave, Grenville, Howe, Gower, and Harcourt, were admitted as members of the privy-council, together with sir Edward Seymour, now declared comptroller of the household. The lord Godolphin declined accepting the office of lord high treasurer, until he was over-ruled by the persuasions of Marlborough, to whose eldest daughter his son was married. This nobleman refused to command the forces abroad, unless the treasury should be put into the hands of Godolphin, on whose punctuality in point of remittances he knew he could depend. George prince of Denmark, was invested with the title of generalissimo of all the queen's forces by sea and land; and afterwards created lord high admiral, the earl of Pembroke having been dismissed from this office with the offer of a large pension, which he generously refused. Prince George, as admiral, was assisted by a council, of his own nominating, consisting of sir George Rooke, sir David Michel, George Churchill, and Richard Hill. Though the legality of this board was doubted, the parliament had such respect and veneration for the queen, that it was suffered to act without question.

The earl of Marlborough directed the queen in all her resolutions. Rochester proposed in council, that the English should avoid a declaration of war with France, and act as auxiliaries only. He was seconded by some other members: but the opinion of Marlborough preponderated. He observed, that the honour of the nation was concerned to fulfil the late king's engagements; and affirmed that France could never be reduced within due bounds, unless the English would enter as principals in the quarrel. The queen being resolved to declare war, communicated her intention to the commons, by whom it was approved; and on the 4th of May the declaration was solemnly proclaimed. The king of France did not, however, produce his declaration of war till the 3rd of July.

The commons, in compliance with the queen's desire, brought in a bill, empowering her majesty to name commissioners to treat with the Scots for an union of the two kingdoms. It met with warm opposition from sir Edward Seymour, and other Tory members; but the measure seemed so necessary at that juncture, that the majority espoused the bill, which passed through both houses, and on the 6th of May received the royal assent, together with some bills of less importance. On the 21st of May, the commons advised her majesty to engage the emperor, the states-general, and her other allies, to join with her in prohibiting all intercourse with France and Spain; and to concert such measures with the states-general as might most effectually secure the trade of her subjects and allies. The lords presented another address, desiring the queen would encourage her subjects to equip privateers, as the preparations of the enemy seemed to be made for a piratical war, to the interruption of commerce: they likewise exhorted her majesty to grant commissions or charters to all persons who should make such acquisitions in the Indies, as she in her great wisdom should judge most expedient for the good of her kingdoms. On the 25th, the queen having passed several public and private bills, dismissed the parliament by prorogation, after having thanked them for their zeal, recommended unanimity, and declared she would carefully preserve and maintain the act of toleration.

A warm contest arose in Scotland, between the revolutioners and those in the opposition, concerning the existence of the present parliament. The queen had signified her accession to the throne, in a letter to her privy-council for Scotland, desiring they would continue to act in that office, until she should send a new commission. In the mean time she authorized them to publish a proclamation, ordering all officers of state, counsellors, and magistrates, to act in all things conformably to the commissions and instructions of his late majesty, until new commissions should be prepared. She likewise assured them of her firm resolution to protect them in their religion, laws, and liberties, and in the established government of the church. The queen had already taken the coronation oath for that kingdom in the presence of twelve Scottish counsellors; but this was objected to, as an irregular way of proceeding, and it was affirmed that the oath ought to have been tendered by persons deputed for that purpose, either by the parliament, or by the privy-council of that kingdom. A late act declared that the parliament then in being should continue six months after the death of the king, and that it should assemble in twenty days after that event; but the queen had, by several adjournments, deferred the meeting almost three months after the king's decease; which made the anti-revolutioners affirm that it was dissolved. According to the queen's last adjournment, the parliament met at Edinburgh on the 9th of June, the duke of Queensberry having been appointed high-commissioner. Before the queen's commission was read, the duke of Hamilton, for himself and his adherents, declared their satisfaction at her majesty's accession to the throne, not only on account of her undoubted right by descent, but likewise because of her many personal virtues and royal qualities. He said they were resolved to sacrifice their lives and fortunes in defence of her majesty's right against all her enemies whatever; but at the same time, they thought themselves bound in duty to give their opinion, that they were not warranted by law to sit and act as a parliament. The duke of Hamilton having read a paper shewing their dissent from the present proceedings of the parliament, withdrew with seventy-nine members, amidst the acclamations of the people. But the commissioners, who retained a much greater number, produced the queen's letter, signifying her resolution to maintain and protect her subjects in the full possession of their religion, laws, liberties, and the presbyterian discipline. She informed them of her having declared war against France; she exhorted them to provide competent supplies for maintaining such a number of forces as might be necessary to disappoint the designs of France; and earnestly recommended to their consideration an union of the two kingdoms. The lord advocate prosecuted the faculty of advocates before the parliament, for having passed a vote among themselves in favour of the protestation and address of the dissenting members. The faculty was severely reprimanded; but the whole nation seemed to resent the prosecution. The parliament passed an act for recognizing her majesty's royal authority; another for adjourning the court of judicature called the session; a third declaring this meeting of parliament legal, and forbidding any person to disown, quarrel, or impugn the dignity and authority thereof, under the penalty of high-treason; a fourth for securing the true protestant religion and presbyterian church government; a fifth for a land-tax; and a sixth enabling her majesty to appoint commissioners for an union between the two kingdoms.

The earl of Marchmont, of his own accord, and even contrary to the advice of the high-commissioner brought in a bill for abjuring the pretended prince of Wales; but this was not supported by the court party, as the commissioner had no instructions how to act on the occasion. On the 30th of June, the commissioner adjourned the parliament, after having thanked them for their chearfulness and unanimity in their proceedings; and the chiefs of the opposite parties hastened to London to make their different representations to the queen and her ministry. In the mean time, she appointed commissioners for treating about the union; and they met at the Cockpit on the 22nd of October. On the 20th of the next month, they adjusted preliminaries, importing, That nothing agreed on among themselves should be binding, except ratified by her majesty and the respective parliaments of both nations; and that, unless all the heads proposed for the treaty were agreed to, no particular thing agreed on should be binding. The queen visited them in December, in order to quicken their mutual endeavours. They agreed, that the two kingdoms should be inseparably united into one monarchy under her majesty, her heirs, and successors, and under the same limitations, according to the acts of settlement: but, when the Scottish commissioners proposed that the rights and privileges of their company trading to Africa and the Indies should be preserved and maintained, such a difficulty arose as could not be surmounted, and no further progress was made in this commission. The tranquillity of Ireland was not interrupted by any new commotion. That kingdom was ruled by justices whom the earl of Rochester had appointed; and the Trustees for the forfeited estates maintained their authority.

While Britain was engaged in these civil transactions, her allies were not idle on the continent. The old duke of Zell, and his nephew, the elector of Brunswick, surprized the dukes of Wolfenbuttle and Saxe-Gotha, whom they compelled to renounce their attachments to France, and concur in the common-councils of the empire. Thus the North of Germany was re-united to the interest of the confederates; and the princes would have been in a condition to assist them effectually, had not the neighbourhood of the war in Poland deterred them from parting with their forces. England and the States-General endeavoured in vain to mediate a peace between the kings of Sweden and Poland. Charles was become enamoured of war, and ambitious of conquest. He threatened to invade Saxony through the dominions of Prussia. Augustus retired to Cracow, while Charles penetrated to Warsaw, and even ordered the cardinal-primate to summon a diet for choosing a new king. The situation of affairs, at this juncture, was far from being favourable to the allies. The court of Vienna had tampered in vain with the elector of Bavaria, who made use of this negociation to raise his terms with Louis. His brother, the elector of Cologn, admitted French garrisons into Liege, and all his places on the Rhine. The elector of Saxony was too hard pressed by the king of Sweden, to spare his full proportion of troops to the allies: the king of Prussia was over-awed by the vicinity of the Swedish conqueror: the duke of Savoy had joined his forces to those of France, and over-run the whole state of Milan; and the pope, though he professed a neutrality, evinced himself strongly biassed to the French interests.

The war was begun in the name of the elector Palatine with the siege of Keiserswaert, which was invested in April by the prince of Nassau-Saarburgh, mareschal-du-camp to the emperor: under this officer the Dutch troops served as auxiliaries, because war had not yet been declared by the States General. The French garrison made a desperate defence. They worsted the besiegers in divers sallies, and maintained the place until it was reduced to a heap of ashes. At lengh the allies made a general attack upon the counterscrap and ravelin, which they carried after a very obstinate engagement, with the loss of two thousand men. Then the garrison capitulated on honourable terms, and the fortifications were razed. During this siege, which lasted from the 18th of April to the middle of June, count Tallard posted himself on the opposite side of the Rhine, from whence he supplied the town with fresh troops and ammunition, and annoyed the besiegers with his artillery: but finding it impossible to save the place, he joined the grand army, commanded by the duke of Burgundy in the Netherlands. The siege of Keiserswaert was covered by a body of Dutch troops under the earl of Athlone, who lay encamped in the duchy of Cleve. Meanwhile general Coehorn, at the head of another detachment, entered Flanders, demolished the French lines between the forts of Donat and Isabella, and laid the chatellaine of Bruges under contribution; but a considerable body of French troops advancing under the marquis de Bedmar, and the count de la Motte, he overflowed the country, and retired under the walls of Sluys. The duke of Burgundy, who had taken the command of the French army under Boufflers, encamped at Zanten, near Cleve, and laid a scheme for surprising Nimeguen; in which, however, he was baffled by the vigilance and activity of Athlone, who, guessing his design, marched thither, and encamped under the cannon of the town. In the beginning of June, Landau was invested by prince Louis of Baden; in July, the king of the Romans arrived in the camp of the besiegers, with such pomp and magnificence as exhausted his father's treasury. On the 9th of September, the citadel was taken by assault; and then the town surrendered.

When the earl of Marlborough arrived in Holland, the earl of Athlone in quality of veldt-mareschal, insisted upon an equal command with the English general: but the States obliged him to yield this point in favour of Marlborough, whom they declared generalissimo of all their forces. In the beginning of July he repaired to the camp at Nimeguen, where he assembled an army of sixty thousand men. On the 16th he passed the Maese, and encamped at Over-asselt, within two leagues and a half of the enemy, who had entrenched themselves between Goch and Gedap. He was afterwards joined by the British train of artillery from Holland. On the 2nd of August, he advanced to Petit-Brugel, and the French retired before him, leaving Spanish Guelderland to his discretion. The duke of Burgundy finding himself obliged to retreat before the allied army, returned to Versailles, leaving the command to Boufflers, who lost the confidence of Louis by the ill success of this campaign. The earl of Marlborough detached General Scultz with a body of troops to reduce the town and castle of Werk, which were surrendered after a slight resistance. In the beginning of September he undertook the siege of Venlo, which capitulated on the 25th of the month, after fort St. Michael had been stormed and taken by lord Cutts, and the English volunteers, among whom the young earl of Huntingdon distinguished himself by very extraordinary acts of valour. Then the general invested Ruremonde, which he reduced after a very obstinite defence, together, with the fort of Stevenswaert, situated on the same river. Boufflers, confounded at the rapidity of Marlborough's success, retired towards Liege, in order to cover that city; but at the approach of the confederates, he retired with precipitation. When the earl of Marlborough arrived at Liege, he found the suburbs of St. Walburgh had been set on fire by the French garrison, who had retired into the citadel and the chartreux. The allies took immediate possession of the city; and in a few days opened the trenches against the citadel, which was taken by assault. Three hundred thousand florins in gold and silver were found in the citadel, besides notes for above one million, drawn upon substantial merchants in Liege, who paid the money. Immediately after this exploit, the garrison of the Chartreux capitulated on honourable terms, and were conducted to Antwerp. By the success of this campaign, the earl of Marlborough raised his military character above all censure, and confirmed himself in the entire confidence of the States-general, who, in the beginning of the season, had trembled for Nimeguen, and now saw the enemy driven back into their own dominions.

The army breaking up in November, the general repaired to Maestricht, from whence he proposed to return to the Hague by water. Accordingly, he embarked in a large boat, with five-and-twenty soldiers, under the command of a lieutenant. The boat was seized by a small French party on its passage, and the crew made prisoners. The earl of Marlborough was accompanied by general Opdam, and Mynheer Gueldermalsel, one of the deputies, who were provided with passports. The earl had neglected this precaution; but recollecting he had an old passport for his brother general Churchill, he produced it without emotion; and the French partizan was in such confusion that he never examined the date. Nevertheless, he rifled their baggage, carried off the guard as prisoners, and allowed the boat to proceed. An imperfect account of this affair was sent to Holland; and the States forthwith assembling, resolved that all their forces should march immediately to Gueldres, and threaten the garrison of the place with the utmost extremities, unless they would deliver the general. But, before these orders could be dispatched, the earl arrived at the Hague.

The French arms were not quite so unfortunate on the Rhine as in Flanders. The elector of Bavaria surprized the city of Ulm in Suabia, by a stratagem, and then declared for France, which had by this time complied with all his demands. The diet of the empire assembled at Ratisbon resolved to declare war in the name of the empire, against the French king and the duke of Anjou, for having invaded several fiefs of the empire in Italy, the archbishopric of Cologn, and the diocese of Liege: and they forbad the ministers of Bavaria and Cologn to appear in the general diet. In vain did these powers protest against their proceedings. The empire's declaration of war was published and notified, in the name of the diet, to the cardinal of Limberg, the emperor's commissioner. Meanwhile the French made themselves masters of Neuburgh, in the circle of Suabia, while Louis, prince of Baden, being weakened by sending off detachments, was obliged to lie inactive in his camp near Fridlinguen. The French army was divided into two bodies, commanded by the marquis de Villars and the count de Guiscard; and the prince, thinking himself in danger of being enclosed by the enemy, resolved to decamp. Villars immediately passed the Rhine, to fall upon him in his retreat; and an obstinate engagement ensuing, the Imperialists were overpowered by numbers. The prince, having lost two thousand men, abandoned the field of battle to the enemy, together with his baggage, artillery, and ammunition, and retired towards Stauffen, without being pursued. The next day the town of Fridlinguen surrendered. The prince being joined by some troops under general Thugen, and other reinforcements, resolved to give battle to the enemy: but Villars declined an engagement, and repassed the Rhine. Towards the latter end of October, count Tallard, and the marquis de Lomaire, with a body of eighteen thousand men, reduced Triers and Traerbach: on the other hand, the prince of Hesse Cassel, with a detachment from the allied army at Liege, retook from the French the towns of Zinch, Lintz, Brisac, and Andernach.

In Italy, prince Eugene laboured under a total neglect of the Imperial court, where his enemies, on pretence of supporting the king of the Romans in his first campaign, weaned the emperor's attention entirely from his affairs on the other side of the Alps; so that he left his best army to moulder away for want of recruits and reinforcements. The Prince, thus abandoned, could not prevent the duke de Vendome from relieving Mantua, and was obliged to relinquish some other places he had taken. Philip king of Spain, being inspired with the ambition of putting an end to the war in this country, sailed in person for Naples, where he was visited by the cardinal-legate, with a compliment from the pope; yet he could not obtain the investiture of the kingdom from his holiness. Philip proceeded from Naples to Final, under convoy of the French fleet, which had brought him to Italy: here he had an interview with the duke of Savoy, who began to be alarmed at the prospect of the king's being master of the Milanese; and in a letter to the duke de Vendome, he forbade him to engage prince Eugene until he himself should arrive in the camp. Prince Eugene understanding that the French army intended to attack Luzzara and Guastalla, passed the Po, with an army of about half the number of the enemy, and posted himself behind the dyke of Zero, in such a manner that the French were ignorant of his situation. The prince attacked them with great vivacity, in hopes of disordering their line, which gave way in several places: but night interposing, he was obliged to desist; and in a few days the French reduced Luzzara and Guastalla. The prince, however, maintained his post, and Philip returned to Spain, without having obtained any considerable advantage.

The French king employed all his artifice and intrigues in raising up new enemies against the confederates. He is said to have bribed count Mansfield, president of the council of war at Vienna, to withhold the supplies from prince Eugene in Italy. At the Ottoman Porte he had actually gained over the Visir who engaged to renew the war with the emperor. But the Mufti and all the other great officers were averse to this design, and the Visir fell a sacrifice to their resentment. Louis continued to embroil the kingdom of Poland by means of the cardinal primate. The young king of Sweden advanced to Lissau, where he defeated Augustus. Then he took possession of Cracow, and raised contributions; nor could he be persuaded to retreat, although the Muscovites and Lithuanians had ravaged Liconia, and even made an irruption into Sweden.

The operations of the combined squadrons at sea did not fully answer the expectations of the public. On the 12th of May, sir John Munden sailed with twelve ships, to intercept a French squadron, which he chased on the 28th into the harbour of Corunna. The French fleet consisted of fourteen sail. Sir John was tried by a court-martial, and acquitted; but was shortly after dismissed from the service by prince George. An attempt was also made upon Cadiz, by sea and land, sir George Rooke commanding the navy, and the duke of Ormond the land forces; but this likewise miscarried. The combined fleet under sir George Rooke consisted of fifty ships of the line, beside frigates, fire-ships, and smaller vessels: the land forces amounted to fourteen thousand men. But the English arms were crowned with success at Vigo, where the duke of Ormond landed with about two thousand five hundred men, at the distance of six miles from the city; while the fleet forced its way into the harbour. After a very vigorous engagement, the French resolved to destroy their ships and galleons, that they might not fall into the hands of the English. They accordingly burned and run ashore eight ships and as many advice boats; but ten ships of war were taken, and eleven galleons. Though they had secured the best part of their plate and merchandize before the English fleet arrived, the value of fourteen millions of pieces of eight, in plate and rich commodities, was destroyed in six galleons that perished; and about half that value was brought off by the conquerors. This was a dreadful blow to the enemy, and a noble acquisition to the allies. Immediately after this exploit, sir George Rooke was joined by sir Cloudesley Shovel, who had been sent out with a squadron to intercept the galleons. This officer was left to bring home the prizes and dismantle the fortifications, while Rooke returned in triumph to England.

But the advantage which was acquired by this expedition was tarnished by the base conduct of some officers in the West Indies. Admiral Benbow, a bold rough seaman, had been stationed in that part of the world with a fleet of ten ships, that he might distress the trade of the enemy. Being informed that Mons. Du Casse, the French admiral, was in those seas with a force equal to his own, he resolved to attack him, and on the 19th of August he discovered the enemy's squadron near St. Martha. He quickly gave orders to his captains, formed the line of battle, and the engagement began. He found, however, that the rest of the fleet had taken some disgust at his conduct, and that they permitted him, almost alone, to sustain the whole fire of the enemy. Nevertheless the engagement continued till night, and he determined to renew it the next morning; but he had the mortification to perceive that all the rest of the ships had fallen back, except one, the Ruby, which joined with him in urging the pursuit of the enemy. For four days did this intrepid seaman, assisted only by one ship, pursue and engage the enemy, while his cowardly officers, at a distance behind, remained spectators of his activity. His last day's battle, that of the 24th, was more furious than all the former: alone, and unsustained by the rest, he engaged the whole French squadron, when his leg was shattered by a chain-shot. He then ordered that he should be placed in a cradle upon the quarter deck; and there he continued to give orders as before, till at last his ship became quite disabled, and was unfit to continue the chase any longer (b). He soon after died of his wounds; and his cowardly associates, Kirby and Wade, were tried by a court-martial, and sentenced to be shot. Hudson of the Pendennis died before his trial. Constable, Vincent, and Fogg, (the admiral's own captain,) came off with slighter punishment. Kirby and Wade were sent home in the Bristol man of war; and on their arrival at Plymouth, were shot on board that ship, by virtue of a warrant for their immediate execution, which had lain there for some time.

The next parliament which was convened by the queen, was highly pleased with the glare of success which attended the English arms on the continent. The house of commons was mostly made up of the Tories, and consequently much more liberal in their supplies than a Whig parliament would have been. They voted forty thousand seamen, and the like number of land-forces, to act in conjunction with those of the allies. It was never considered how little necessary these great efforts were either to the happiness, or the protection of the people; they were exerted against the French, and that was an answer to every demand. A short time after, the queen gave the commons to understand, that the allies pressed her to augment her forces. The commons were as ready to grant as she to demand, and it was resolved that ten thousand men more should be added to the army on the continent, but upon condition that the Dutch should break off all commerce with France and Spain. The Dutch complied without hesitation; sensible that while England fought their battles, they might a little relax in their commercial concerns.

In the beginning of April, 1704, the duke of Marlborough crossed the sea, and assembling the allied army, resolved to shew that his former successes only spurred him on to new triumphs. He opened the campaign with the siege of Bonne, the residence of the elector of Cologne. This place held out but a short time against the repeated attacks of the prince of Hesse Cassel, the celebrated Coehorn, and general Fagel. He next retook Huy; the garrison of which, after a vigorous defence, surrendered prisoners of war. The siege of Limburg being then undertaken, the place surrendered in two days; and, by the surrender of this place, the allies secured the country of Liege, and the electorate of Cologne, from the designs of the enemy. Such was the result of the campaign in the Netherlands, which, in all probability, would have produced events of greater importance, if the duke of Marlborough had not been restrained by the Dutch, who began to be influenced by the Lovestein faction, ever averse to a war with France.

In the next campaign the duke was resolved to act more offensively; and, being furnished with proper powers from the queen, he informed the Dutch that it was his intention to march to the relief of the empire, which had been for some time oppressed by the French forces. The states general, either willing to second his efforts, or fearing to weaken the alliance by distrust, gave him full powers to march as he thought proper, with assurances of their assistance in all his endeavours.

The French king, perceiving the motions of the allies, appointed marshal Villeroi (c) to head the army of opposition; for Boufflers was no longer thought an equal to the enterprizing Marlborough, who was peculiarly circumspect in studying the disposition and abilities of the general he was to oppose. Having no very great fears from his present antagonist, instead of going forward to meet him, he flew to the succour of the emperor, as had been already agreed at the commencement of the campaign. The English general, who was resolved to strike a vigorous blow for his relief, took with him abont thirteen thousand English troops, traversed extensive countries by hasty marches, arrived at the banks of the Danube, defeated a body of French and Bavarians, stationed at Donavert to oppose him, then passed the Danube with his triumphant army, and laid the dukedom of Bavaria, that had sided with the enemy, under contribution. Villeroi, who at first attempted to follow his motions, seemed all at once to have lost sight of his enemy; nor was he apprized of his route, till informed of his successes. Marshal Tallard prepared by a different route to obstruct the duke of Marlborough's retreat with an army of thirty thousand men. He was soon after joined by the duke of Bavaria's forces;

(b) When one of his lieutenants expressed his sorrow for the loss of the admiral's leg, "I am sorry for it too, (replied the gallant Benbow,) but I had rather have lost them both than have seen this dishonour brought upon the English nation. But, do you hear? if another shot should take me off, behave like brave men, and fight it out." When Du Casse arrived at Carthagena, he wrote a letter to Benbow to this effect:

"SIR,

"I had little hope on Monday last but to have supped in your cabin; but it pleased God to order it otherwise. I am thankful for it. As for those cowardly captains, who deserted you, hang them up; for, by God, they deserve it,

Your's, DU CASSE."

(c) Marshal Villeroi was son to the king of France's governor, and had been educated with that monarch. He had always been the favourite of Louis, and had long been a sharer in his amusements, his campaigns, and his glory. He was brave, generous, and polite, but unequal to the great task of commanding an army; and still more so, when opposed to so great a rival as the duke of Marlborough.

so that the French army in that part of the continent amounted to sixty thousand veterans, and commanded by two of the best reputed generals then in France.

Marshal Tallard had established his reputation by many former victories; he was active and penetrating, and had risen by his merits alone to the first station in the army: but his ardour often rose to impetuosity; and he was so extremely short-sighted, as to be altogether incapable of distinguishing objects at a very small distance. The duke of Bavaria was equally experienced in the field, and had still stronger motives for his activity. His country was ravaged and pillaged before his eyes, and nothing remained of his possessions but the army which he commanded. It was in vain that he sent entreaties to the enemy to stop the fury of their incursions, and to spare his people; the only answer he received was, that it lay in his own power to make his enemies friends, by alliance or submission. To oppose these powerful generals, Marlborough was now joined by a body of thirty thousand men, under the conduct of prince Eugene, whose troops were well disciplined, but they were still more formidable by the fame and conduct of their generals. Prince Eugene had been bred up from his infancy in camps; he was almost equal to Marlborough in intrigue, and his superior in the art of war. Their talents were of a similar kind; and instead of any mean rivalship or jealousy between such eminent persons, they concurred in the same designs; for the same good sense determined them always to the same object.

This allied army, with Eugene and Marlborough at their head, amounted to about fifty-five thousand men. The French amounted to sixty thousand. Both armies after many marchings and counter marchings, approached each other. The French were posted on a hill near the town of Hochstadt: their right covered by the Danube, and the village Blenheim; their left by the village of Lutzengen; and their front by a rivulet, the banks of which were steep, and the bottom marshy. Notwithstanding these difficulties, the generals resolved to attack them immediately, rather than lie inactive until their forage and provision should be consumed. They were moreover stipulated to this hazardous enterprize, by an intercepted letter to the elector of Bavaria from mareschal Villeroi, giving him to understand, that he had received orders to ravage the country of Wirtemberg, and intercept all communication between the Rhine and the allied army. The disposition being made for the attack, and the orders communicated to the general officers, the forces advanced into the plain on the 13th of August, 1704, and were ranged in order of battle. The cannonading began about nine in the morning, and continued on both sides till one in the afternoon. Mareschal Tallard commanded on the right, and posted seven-and-twenty battalions, with twelve squadrons, in the village of Blenheim, supposing that there the allies would make their chief effort: their left was conducted by the elector of Bavaria, assisted by Marsin, a French general of experience and capacity. The number of the confederates did not exceed fifty-five thousand: their right was under the direction of prince Eugene, and their left commanded by the duke of Marlborough. At noon the action was begun by a body of English and Hessians, under major-general Dilkes, who, having passed the rivulet with difficulty, and filed off to the left in the face of the enemy, attacked the village of Blenheim with great vigour; but were repulsed after three successive attempts. Meanwhile the troops in the centre, and part of the right wing, passed the rivulet on planks in different places; and formed on the other side without any molestation from the enemy. At length, however, they were charged by the French horse with such impetuosity, and so terribly galled in flank by the troops posted at Blenheim, that they fell in disorder, and part of them repassed the rivulet: but a reinforcement of dragoons coming up, the French cavalry were broke in their turn, and driven to the very hedges of the village of Blenheim. The left wing of the confederates being now completely formed, ascended the hill in a firm, compact body, charging the enemy's horse, which could no longer stand their ground, but rallied several times as they gave way. Tallard, in order to make a vigorous effort, ordered ten battalions to fill up the intervals of his cavalry. The duke perceiving his design, sent three battalions of the troops of Zell to sustain his horse. Nevertheless the line was a little disordered by the prodigious fire from the French infantry, and even obliged to recoil about sixty paces: but the confederates advancing to the charge with redoubled ardour, routed the French horse; and their battalions being thus abandoned, were cut in pieces. Tallard having rallied his broken cavalry behind some tents that were still standing, resolved to draw off the troops he had posted in the village of Blenheim, and sent an aide-du-camp to Marsin, who was with the elector of Bavaria on the left, to desire he would face the confederates with some troops to the right of the village of Oberklau, so as to keep them in play, and favour the retreat of the forces from Blenheim. That officer assured him, he was so far from being in a condition to spare troops, that he could hardly maintain his ground. The fate of the day was now more than half decided. The French cavalry being vigorously attacked in flank were totally defeated. Part of them endeavoured to gain the bridge which they had drawn over the Danube between Hochstadt and Blenheim; but they were so closely pursued, that those who escaped the slaughter threw themselves into the river, where they perished. Tallard, being surrounded was taken near a mill, behind the village of Sonderen, together with the marquis de Montperouz, general of horse, the major-generals de Seppeville, de Silly, de la Valiere, and many other officers of distinction. Whilst these occurrences passed on the left wing, Marsin's quarters, at the village of Oberklau, in the centre, were attacked by ten battalions, under the prince of Holsteinbeck, who passed the rivulet with undaunted resolution: but, before he could form his men on the other side, he was overpowered by numbers, mortally wounded, and taken prisoner. His battalions being supported by some Danish and Hanoverian cavalry, renewed the charge, and were again repulsed: at length the duke of Marlborough, in person, brought up some fresh squadrons from the body of reserve, and compelled the enemy to retire. By this time prince Eugene had obliged the left wing of the enemy to give ground, after having surmounted a great number of difficulties, sustained a very obstinate opposition, and seen his cavalry, in which his chief strength seemed to lie, three times repulsed. The duke of Marlborough had no sooner defeated the right wing, than he made a disposition to reinforce the prince, when he understood from an aide-du-camp, that his highness had no occasion for assistance; and that the elector with Monsieur de Marsin had abandoned Oberklau and Luteingen. They were pursued as far as the villages of Morselingen and Teissenhoven, from whence they retreated to Dillengen and Lawingen. The confederates being now masters of the field of battle, surrounded the village of Blenheim, in which, as we have already observed, seven-and-twenty battalions and twelve squadrons were posted. These troops, seeing themselves cut off from all communication with the rest of their army, and despairing of being able to force their way through the allies, capitulated about eight in the evening, laid down their arms, delivered their colours and standards, and surrendered themselves prisoners of war, on condition that the officers should not be rifled. This was one of the most glorious and complete victories that ever was obtained. Ten thousand French and Bavarians were left dead on the field of battle: the greater part of thirty squadrons of horse and dragoons perished in the river Danube: thirteen thousand were made prisoners: one hundred pieces of cannon were taken, and twenty-four mortars, one hundred and twenty-nine colours, one hundred and seventy-one standards, seventeen pair of kettle-drums, three thousand six hundred tents, four and thirty coaches, three hundred laden mules, two bridges of boats, fifteen pontoons, fifteen barrels and eight casks filled with silver. Of the allies, about four thousand five hundred men were killed, and about eight thousand wounded or taken. The loss of the battle was imputed to two capital errors committed by mareschal Tallard; namely, his weakening the centre, by detaching such a number of troops to the village of Blenheim, and his suffering the confederates to pass the rivulet, and form unmolested. Certain it is, these circumstances contributed to the success of the duke of Marlborough, who rode through the hottest of the fire with the calmest intrepidity, giving his orders with that presence of mind and deliberation which were so peculiar to his character. When he next day visited Tallard, he told that general, he was sorry such a misfortune should happen personally to one, for whom he had a profound esteem. The mareschal congratulated him on having vanquished the best troops in the world; a compliment to which the duke replied, plied, that he thought his own the best troops in the world, seeing they had conquered those upon whom the mareschal had bestowed such an encomium.

The victorious generals having by this decisive stroke saved the house of Austria from entire ruin, and entirely changed the face of affairs in the empire, signified their opinion to prince Louis of Baden, that it would be for the advantage of the common cause to join all their forces, and drive the French out of Germany, rather than lose time at the siege of Ingoldstadt, which would surrender of course. The opinion was confirmed by the conduct of the French garrison at Augsburg, who quitted that place on the 16th of August. The magistrates sent a deputation, craving the protection of the duke of Marlborough, who forthwith ordered a detachment to take possession of that important city. The duke having sent mareschal de Tallard under a guard of dragoons to Frankfort, and disposed of the other prisoners of distinction in the adjacent places, encamped at Sefillingen, within half a league of Ulm. Here he held a conference with the princes Eugene and Louis of Baden, in which they agreed that, as the enemy retreated towards the Rhine the confederate army should take the same route, excepting three-and-twenty battalions and some squadrons, to be left for the siege of Ulm, under general Thungen. They began their march on the 26th of August, by different routes, to the general rendezvous at Bruschal, near Philipsburg. Then they resolved, that prince Louis of Baden should undertake the siege of Landau, in order to secure the circle of Suabia from the incursions of that garrison. Considering the consternation that prevailed all over France, nothing could be more impolitic than this measure, which gave the enemy time for recollection, and recruiting their forces. It was a proposal on which the prince of Baden insisted with uncommon obstinacy. He was even suspected of corruption. He was jealous of the glory which the duke of Marlborough had acquired, and such a bigoted papist, that he repined at the success of an heretical general. On the 12th of September he marched towards Landau with the troops destined for the siege, and the duke of Marlborough, with prince Eugene, encamped at Croon Weissenburg, to cover the enterprize. By this time Ulm had surrendered to Thungen, even before the trenches were opened. Villeroi advanced with his army towards Landau, as if he had intended to attack the confederates; but retired without having made any attempt for the relief of the place, which was defended with the most obstinate valour till the 23rd of November, when the besiegers having lodged themselves on the counterscarp, the breaches being practicable, and the dispositions made for a general assault, the garrison capitulated upon honourable conditions. The king of the Romans had arrived in the camp, that he might have the credit of taking the place, the command of which he bestowed on the count de Frize, who had before defended it with equal courage and ability.

The next enterprize which the confederates undertook, was the siege of Traerbach. The hereditary prince of Hesse-Cassel being entrusted with the directions of the attacks, invested the castle in the beginning of November. Though it was strongly fortified, and well defended, he carried on his operations with such spirit and assiduity, that in about six weeks the garrison surrendered the place on honourable terms. In the mean time the duke of Marlborough repaired to Berlin, where he negociated for a reinforcement of eight thousand Prussians, to serve under prince Eugene in Italy during the next campaign. Thence he proceeded to the court of Hanover, where, as in all other places, he was received with particular marks of distinction. When he arrived at the Hague, he was congratulated by the states general on his victories at Schellenberg and Blenheim, and as much considered in Holland as if he had been actually stadtholder. He had received a second letter from the emperor, couched in the warmest terms of acknowledgment, and was declared prince of the empire. In December he embarked for England, where he found the people in a transport of joy, and was welcomed as a hero who had retrieved the glory of the nation.

Nothing of consequence was executed in Flanders, except the bombardment of the towns of Bruges and Namur. In Italy the French met with no opposition, and the duke of Savoy was compelled in some measure to lie inactive. By a revolution which took place at the Ottoman Porte, the emperor of Germany was considerably alarmed; but his fears were removed by a chiaus being dispatched to Vienna, in which the new sultan declared he would not give any assistance to the malcontents of Hungary. In Poland, the diet being assembled by the cardinal primate, Stanislaus Lezinski, palatine of Posnania, was elected and proclaimed king, and recognized by Charles of Sweden, who was more intent upon the ruin of Augustus than upon the preservation of his own dominions. The protestants of the Cevennois, deriving courage from despair, became so troublesome to the French government, that Louis was obliged to treat them with lenity. The marshal Villars commenced a negociation with them by order of the French king, and a formal treaty was concluded, in which they were indulged with liberty of conscience; but the articles were ill observed on the part of the king.

The arms of England were not less fortunate by sea, than they had been on the Danube. Sir George Rooke having landed king Charles at Lisbon, sent a squadron to cruise off Cape Spartell, under the command of rear admiral Dilkes, who, on the 12th of March, engaged and took three Spanish ships of war, bound from St. Sebastian to Cadiz. Rooke received orders from the queen to sail to the relief of Nice and Villa Franca, which were threatened with a siege by the duke de Vendome. The ministry of England understanding also that the French were equipping a strong squadron at Brest, and judging it destined to act in the Mediterranean, sent sir Cloudesley Shovel with a considerable fleet, to watch the motions of that squadron; and he was provided with instructions how to act, in case it should be sailed to the Mediterranean. On the 16th of June, sir George Rooke, being joined by sir Cloudesley Shovel, resolved to proceed up the Mediterranean in quest of the French fleet, which had sailed thither from Brest, and which Rooke had actually discovered, in the preceding month, on their voyage to Toulon. On the 17th of July the admiral called a council of war in the road of Tetuan, when they resolved to make an attempt upon Gibraltar, which was but slenderly provided with a garrison. Thither they sailed, and on the 21st of the month the prince of Hesse landed on the isthmus with eighteen hundred marines: then he summoned the governor to surrender, and was answered, that the place would be defended to the last extremity. Next day the admiral gave orders for cannonading the town: perceiving that the enemy were driven from their fortifications at the south mole head, he commanded captain Whitaker to arm all the boats and assault that quarter. The captains Hicks and Jumper, who happened to be nearest the mole, immediately manned their pinnaces, and entered the fortifications sword in hand. The Spaniards sprung a mine, by which two lieutenants, and about a hundred men, were killed or wounded. Nevertheless, the two captains took possession of a platform, and kept their ground until they were sustained by captain Whitaker, and the rest of the seamen, who took by storm a redoubt between the mole and the town. The governor then capitulated; and the prince of Hesse entered the place, amazed at the success of this attempt, considering the strength of the fortifications, which might have been defended by fifty men against a numerous army.

The admiral having left a sufficient garrison with his highness, returned to Tetuan, to take in wood and water; and when he sailed, on the 9th of August, he descried the French fleet, to which he gave chase with all the sail he could spread. On the 13th he came up with it, as it lay in a line off Malaga ready to receive him, to the number of two-and-fifty great ships, and four-and-twenty galleys, under the command of the count de Thoulouse, high admiral of France, with the inferior flags of the white and blue divisions. The English fleet consisted of three-and-fifty ships of the line, exclusive of frigates; but they were inferior to the French in number of guns and men, as well as in weight of metal, and altogether unprovided with gallies, from which the enemy reaped great advantage during the engagement. A little after ten in the morning, the battle began, with equal fury on both sides, and continued to rage with doubtful success till two in the afternoon, when the van of the French gave way: nevertheless the fight was maintained till night, when the enemy bore away to leeward. The wind shifting before morning, the French gained the weather-gage: but they made no use of this advantage: for two successive days the English admiral endeavoured to renew the engagement, which the count de Thoulouse declined, and at last he disappeared. The loss was pretty equal on both sides, though not a single ship was taken or destroyed by either: but the honour of the day certainly remained with the English. The bottoms of the British fleet were foul, and several large ships had had expended all their shot long before the battle ceased: yet the enemy were so roughly handled, that they did not venture another engagement during the whole war. The French king also claimed the victory, and published an account of the action, which was full of false and partial representations. After the battle, sir George Rooke sailed to Gibraltar to refit, and leaving a squadron with sir John Leake, set sail for England on the 24th of August. He arrived in September, and was received by the ministry, and the people in general, with those marks of esteem and veneration which were due to his long services and signal success: but he was still persecuted with a spirit of envy and detraction. Philip king of Spain, alarmed at the reduction of Gibraltar, sent the marquis de Valladarias with an army to retake it. The siege lasted four months, during which the prince of Hesse exhibited many shining proofs of courage and ability. The place was supplied with men and provisions by convoys from Lisbon, until Monsieur de Pointis put a stop to that communication, by entering the bay with a strong squadron; but he was obliged to retire at the approach of sir John Leake and admiral Vanderdussen; and the marquis de Villadarias, having made little or no progress on land, thought proper to abandon the enterprize.

The parliament meeting on the 29th of October, the queen, in her speech, observed that the great and remarkable success with which God had blessed her arms produced unanimous joy and satisfaction through all parts of the kingdom; and that a timely improvement of the present advantages would enable her to procure a lasting foundation of security for England, as well as a firm support for the liberty of Europe. She declared her intention was to be kind and indulgent to all her subjects. She expressed her hope that they would do nothing to endanger the loss of this opportunity; and that there would be no contention among them, but an emulation to promote the public welfare. Congratulatory addresses were voted and presented by both houses. They were equal in their professions of duty and affection to the queen; but the addresses imbibed a very different colour from the different factions by which the two houses were influenced. The lords congratulated her on the great and glorious success of her arms under the command of the duke of Marlborough, without deigning to mention sir George Rooke, who had defeated the French navy at sea, and added the important fortress of Gibraltar to the British conquests. On the other hand, the commons affected to mention the battle of Blenheim, and Rooke's naval victory, as events of equal glory and importance. However they might be warped by prejudice against individuals, they did not suffer the war to languish for want of supplies. Having taken into consideration the services of the army and navy, they voted that the queen should be desired to bestow her bounty on the seamen and land-forces who had behaved themselves so gallantly. They then deliberated upon the different articles of national expence, and granted four millions six hundred and seventy thousand nine hundred and thirty-one pounds, for the service of the ensuing year, to be raised by a land-tax, by the sale of annuities, and other expedients. These measures were taken with such expedition, that the land tax received the royal assent on the 9th of December; when the queen, in a short speech, thanked the commons for their dispatch, which she considered as a sure pledge of their affection.

The duke of Marlborough, at his first appearance in the house, after his return to England, was honoured with a very extraordinary eulogium, pronounced by the lord-keeper, in the name of the peers of England; and a compliment of the same nature was presented to him by a committee of the house of commons. The lower house also presented an address to her majesty, beseeching her to consider some proper mean to perpetuate the memory of the duke's noble actions. In a few days she gave them to understand by a message, that she was inclined to grant the interest of the crown in the honour and manor of Woodstock, and hundred of Wooton, to the duke of Marlborough and his heirs; and that, as the lieutenancy and rangership of the parks, with the rents and profits of the manors and hundreds, were granted for two lives, she wished that incumbrance could be removed. A bill was immediately brought in, enabling the queen to bestow these honours and manors on the duke of Marlborough and his heirs; and the queen was desired to advance the money for clearing the incumbrances. She not only complied with the address, but likewise ordered the comptroller of her works, to build, in Woodstock park, a magnificent palace for the duke, upon a plan much more solid than beautiful. By this time sir George Rooke was laid aside, and the command of the fleet bestowed upon sir Cloudesley Shovel, now declared rear-admiral of England. Mareschal de Tallard, with the other French generals taken at Hochstadt, arrived on the 16th of December in the river Thames, and were immediately conveyed to Nottingham and Litchfield, attended by a detachment of the royal regiment of horse guards. They were treated with great respect, and allowed the privilege of riding ten miles around the places of their confinement.

The remainder of this session was principally taken up in quarrels between the two houses concerning the right of certain persons to vote at elections for members of parliament. In order to put a stop to their cavilling, the queen went to the house of lords on the 14th of March, and passed the bills that were ready for the royal assent. She then thanked the parliament for their dispatch of business; after which she warned them to avoid the fatal effects of animosity and dissension; and then ordered the lord keeper to prorogue them to the 1st of May; but on the 5th of April they were dissolved by proclamation, and another was published for calling a new parliament.

On the 13th of March, 1705, the duke of Marlborough embarked again for Holland, where he prevailed with the states general to contribute their troops for the execution of his projects. Having concerted with the deputies of the states and the Dutch generals the necessary measures for opening the campaign, he set out for Maestricht, in order to assemble his army. On the 5th of May, the emperor Leopold died at Vienna, and was succeeded on the imperial throne by his eldest son Joseph, king of the Romans, a prince who resembled his father in meekness of disposition, narrowness of intellect, and bigotry to the Romish religion. Towards the close of June, Marlborough sent general Scholten with a detachment to invest Huy, and in a few days the garrison surrendered at discretion. In July the duke had an action with the French between the villages of Heylesem and Golsteven, in which he took the marquis d'Alegre and the count de Horne, lieutenant-generals, one major general, two brigadier generals, with many officers, and a great number of soldiers; a large heap of standards, four colours, one pair of kettle drums, and ten pieces of cannon (b).

About the close of October, the duke set out for Vienna, in consequence of pressing letters from the emperor, in order to concert the operations of the ensuing campaign, and other measures of importance, in which the concerns of the allies were interested. On the 12th of November he arrived at Vienna, where he was treated with the highest marks of distinction and cordial friendship, by their imperial majesties. His son-in-law, the earl of Sunderland, had been sent thither as envoy extraordinary; and now they conferred together with the emperor and his ministers. They resolved to maintain the war with redoubled vigour. The treaties were renewed; and in consideration of the duke's signal service to the house of Austria, the emperor presented him with a grant of the lordship of Mindelheim in Suabia, which was now erected into a principality of the Roman empire. In his return with the earl of Sunderland, he visited the courts of Berlin and Hanover, where he was received with extraordinary respect: he arrived at the Hague on the 14th of December, and concerted measures with the states general for the conduct of the ensuing campaign.

By sea the allies were generally prosperous. Philip of Spain being bent upon retaking Gibraltar, sent mareschal de Thessé to undertake the siege, while De Pointis was ordered to block up the place by sea with his squadron. The activity of these French officers obliged the prince of Hesse to dispatch an express to Lisbon, desiring sir John Leake to sail immediately to his assistance. The admiral having been reinforced from England by sir Thomas Dilkes, with five ships of the line and a body of troops, set sail immediately; and on the 10th of March descried five ships of war hauling out of the bay of Gibraltar. These were commanded by De Pointis in person, to whom the English admiral gave chase. One of them struck, after having made a very slight resistance; and the rest ran ashore on the westward of Marbella, where they were destroyed. The remaining part of the French squadron had been blown from their anchors, and taken shelter in the bay of Malaga: but now they slipped their cables, and made the best of their way to Toulon. The mareschal de Thessé, in consequence of this disaster, turned the siege of Gibraltar into a blockade, and withdrew the greater part of his forces. While sir John Leake was employed in this expedition, sir George Byng, who had been ordered to cruize in soundings for the protection of trade, took a ship of forty guns from the enemy, together with twelve privateers, and seven vessels richly laden from the West Indies.

(b) In this action, as the duke of Marlborough advanced to the charge at the head of several squadrons, a Bavarian officer rode up to attack him sword in hand; but in raising himself on his stirrups to strike with the greater advantage, he fell from his horse, and was immediately slain.

The most eminent achievement of this summer, was the reduction of Barcelona, by the earl of Peterborough and sir Cloudesley Shovel, who sailed from St. Helen's in the latter end of May with the English fleet, having on board five thousand land forces; and on the 20th of June arrived at Lisbon, where they were joined by sir John Leake and the Dutch admiral Allemonde. In a council of war, they determined to put to sea with eight-and-forty ships of the line, which should be stationed between Cape Spartel and the bay of Cadiz, in order to prevent the junction of the Toulon and Brest squadrons. The prince of Hesse Darmstadt arriving from Gibraltar, assured king Charles, that the province of Catalonia and the kingdom of Valencia were attached to his interest; and his majesty being weary of Portugal, resolved to accompany the earl of Peterborough to Barcelona. He accordingly embarked with him on board the Ranelagh; and the fleet sailed on the 28th of July, the earl of Galway having reinforced them with two regiments of English dragoons. At Gibraltar they took on board the English guards, and three old regiments, in lieu of which they left two new-raised battalions. On the 11th of August they landed in the bay of Altea, where the earl of Peterborough published a manifesto in the Spanish language, which had such an effect, that all the inhabitants of the place, the neighbouring villages, and adjacent mountains, acknowledged Charles, son of the emperor of Germany for their lawful sovereign. They seized the town of Denia for his service; and he sent thither a garrison of four hundred men, under the command of major general Ramos. On the 22nd, they arrived in the bay of Barcelona, and were well received by the country people. Charles landed amidst the acclamations of an infinite multitude from the neighbouring towns and villages, who threw themselves at his feet; exclaiming, "Long live the king," and exhibiting all the marks of the most extravagant joy. The inhabitants of Barcelona were well affected to the house of Austria, but over-awed by a garrison of five thousand men, under the duke de Popoli, Velasco, and other officers devoted to the interest of Philip. Considering the strength of such a garrison, and the small number of Dutch and English troops, (not quite ten thousand men,) nothing could appear more desperate and dangerous than the design of besieging the place: yet this was proposed by the prince of Hesse Darmstadt, who served in the expedition as a volunteer, strongly urged by king Charles, and approved by the earl of Peterborough and sir Cloudesley Shovel. The city was accordingly invested on one side: but, as a previous step to the reduction of it, they resolved to attack the fort of Montjuic, strongly situated on a hill that commanded the city. The outworks were taken by storm, with the loss of the gallant prince of Hesse, who was shot through the body, and expired in a few hours: then the earl of Peterborough began to bombard the body of the fort; and a shell falling into the magazine of powder, blew it up, together with the governor and some of the best officers; which struck such a terror into the garrison, that they immediately surrendered.

This great point being gained, the English general erected his batteries against the town, with the help of the Miquelets and seamen: the bomb-ketches began to fire with such execution, that in a few days the governor capitulated (c), and on the 4th of October Charles entered in triumph. All the other places in Catalonia declared for him, except Roses; so that the largest and richest province of Spain was conquered with an army scarcely double the number of the garrison of Barcelona. King Charles wrote a letter with his own hand to the queen of England, containing a circumstantial detail of his affairs, the warmest expressions of acknowledgement, and the highest encomiums on her subjects, particularly the earl of Peterborough. In a council of war it was determined that the king and the earl should continue in Catalonia with the land forces: that sir Cloudesley Shovel should return to England: that five-and-twenty English and fifteen Dutch ships of war should winter at Lisbon, under the command of sir John Leake and the Dutch rear-admiral, Wassenear; and that four English and two Dutch frigates should remain at Barcelona. Don Francisco de Velasco was transported to Malaga with about a thousand men of his garrison: the rest voluntarily engaged in the service of king Charles, and six other regiments were raised by the states of Catalonia. The count de Cifuentes, at the head of the Miquelets and Catalans, attached to the house of Austria, secured Tarragona, Tortosa, Lerida, San-Mattheo, Gironne, and other places. Don Raphael Nevat, revolting from Philip with his whole regiment of horse, joined general Ramos at Denia, and made themselves masters of several places of importance in the kingdom of Valencia. Flushed with such unexpected success, they penetrated to the capital of the same name, which they surprized, together with the marquis de Villa Garcia, the viceroy, and the archbishop. These advantages, however, were not properly improved. The court of Charles was divided into factions and so much time lost in disputes, that the enemy sent a body of six thousand men into the kingdom of Valencia, under the command of the Conde de las Torres, who forthwith invested San-Mattheo, guarded by colonel Jones at the head of five hundred Miquelets. This being a place of great consequence, on account of its situation, the earl of Peterborough marched thither with one thousand infantry, and two hundred dragoons; and by means of feigned intelligence artfully conveyed to the Conde, induced that general to abandon the siege with precipitation, in the apprehension of being suddenly attacked by a considerable army. Peterborough afterwards took possession of Nules, and purchasing horses at Castillon de la Plan, began to form a body of cavalry, which did good service in the sequel. Having assembled a little army, consisting of ten squadrons of horse and dragoons, and four battalions of regular troops, with about three thousand militia, he marched to Molviedro, which was surrendered to him by the governor, brigadier Mahoni. Between this officer and the duke d'Arcos, the Spanish general, he excited such jealousies, by dint of artifices, not altogether justifiable even in war, that the duke was more intent upon avoiding the supposed treachery of Mahoni than upon interrupting the earl's march to Valencia, where the inhabitants expressed uncommon marks of joy at his arrival. About this period, a very obstinate action happened at St. Istevan de Litera, where the Chevalier D'Asfeldt, with nine squadrons of horse and dragoons, and as many battalions of French infantry, attacked colonel Wills at the head of a small detachment: but this last being supported by lieutenant-general Cunningham, who was mortally wounded in the engagement, repulsed the enemy, though three times his number, with the loss of four hundred men killed upon the spot. The troops on both sides fought with the most desperate valour, keeping up their fire until the muzzles of their pieces met, and charging each other at the point of the bayonet.

The only misfortune that attended the English arms in the course of this year was the capture of the Baltic fleet, homeward-bound, with their convoy of three ships of war, which were taken by the Dunkirk squadron under the command of count de St. Paul, though he himself was killed in the engagement. When an account of this advantage was communicated to the French king, he replied with a sigh, "Very well, I wish the ships were safe again in any English port, provided the count de St. Paul could be restored to life." After the death of the famous Du Bart, this officer was counted the best seaman in France.

On the 25th of October, the new parliament met, when a violent contest arose about the choice of a speaker. Mr.

(c) During the interval which was taken up in signing the necessary form upon these occasions, a body of Germans and Catalonians, belonging to the English army, entered the town, and were plundering all before them. The governor, who was treating then with the English general, thought himself betrayed, and upbraided that nobleman with treachery. Peterborough, struck with the suddenness of the transaction, left the writings unfinished, and flying among the plunderers, drove them from their prey, and then returned calmly back, and signed the capitulation. The Spaniards were equally amazed at the generosity of the English, and the baseness of their own countrymen, who had led on to the spoil.

Bromley was supported by the Tories, and the Whigs proposed Mr. John Smith, who was elected by a majority of forty-three. The queen, in her speech, represented the necessity of acting vigorously against France, as a common enemy to the liberties of Europe; and said, that her intention was to expedite commissions for treating of an Union with Scotland. The majority, being well disposed to support the queen in all her designs, assured her that they would, to the utmost of their power, assist her in bringing the treaty of Union to a happy conclusion. A great deal of debate took place relative to the successor to the throne, whom one party wished to invite to this country, that he might be resident therein, in case of the queen's demise; while the other saw no reason for the invitation, and the matter was at length dropped; and on the 15th of November, the queen gave the royal assent to an act for exhibiting a bill to naturalize the princess Sophia, and the issue of her body. Violent debates also took place on the subject of the church being in danger, and several pamphlets were published pro and con. The debate being at length finished, the question was put, Whether the church of England was in danger, and carried in the negative by a great majority. It was likewise resolved, that whoever should insinuate that the church is in danger, should be esteemed an enemy to the queen, the church, and the kingdom. The queen then issued a proclamation, containing the resolution of the two houses, and offering a reward for discovering the author of "The Memorial of the Church of England," and for apprehending David Edwards, a professed papist, who was charged upon oath with being the printer and publisher of that libel.

After a short adjournment, a committee of the commons presented the thanks of that house to the duke of Marlborough, for his great services performed to her majesty and the nation in the last campaign, and for his prudent negociation with her allies. This nobleman was in such credit with the people, that when he proposed a loan of five hundred thousand pounds to the emperor, upon a branch of his revenue in Silesia, the money was advanced immediately by the merchants of London. All the funds being established, one in particular for two millions and a half, by way of annuities for ninety-nine years, at six and a half per cent. and all the bills having received the royal assent, the queen went to the house of peers on the 19th of March, where, having thanked both houses for the repeated instances of their affection which she had received, she prorogued the parliament to the 21st of May following.

CHAP. II.

The Union of England and Scotland.

THE eyes of Great Britain were now turned upon a transaction of the utmost consequence to the whole island; namely, the Treaty for an Union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland. The queen having appointed commissioners on both sides, they met on the 16th of April, 1706, in the council-chamber of the Cock-pit, near White-hall, which was the place appointed for the conferences. Their commissions being opened and read by the respective secretaries, and introductory speeches being pronounced by the lord-keeper of England, and the lord-chancellor of Scotland, they agreed to certain preliminary articles, importing, that all the proposals should be made in writing, and every point, when agreed, reduced to writing: that no points should be obligatory, till all matters should be adjusted in such a manner as would be proper to be laid before the queen and the two parliaments for their approbation: that a committee should be appointed from each commission, to revise the minutes of what might pass, before they should be inserted in the books by the respective secretaries; and that all the proceedings during the treaty should be kept secret. The Scots were inclined to a fœdal union, like that of the United Provinces; but the English were bent upon an incorporation, so as that no Scottish parliament should ever have power to repeal the articles of the treaty. The lord-keeper proposed that the two kingdoms of England and Scotland should be for ever united into one realm, by the name of Great Britain: that it should be represented by one and the same parliament; and, that the succession of this monarchy, failing heirs of her majesty's body, should be according to the limitations mentioned in the act of parliament passed in the reign of king William, intitled, "An Act for the further limitation of the Crown, and the better securing the Rights and Liberties of the Subject." The Scottish commissioners, in order to comply in some measure with the popular clamour of their nation, presented a proposal, implying that the succession to the crown of Scotland should be established upon the same persons mentioned in the act of king William's reign; that the subjects of Scotland should for ever enjoy all the rights and privileges of the natives in England, and the dominions thereunto belonging; and, that the subjects of England should enjoy the like rights and privileges in Scotland: that there should be a free communication and intercourse of trade and navigation between the two kingdoms, and plantations thereunto belonging; and that all laws and statutes in either kingdom, contrary to the terms of this union, should be repealed. The English commissioners declined entering into any considerations upon these proposals, declaring themselves fully convinced that nothing but an entire union could settle a perfect and lasting friendship between the two kingdoms. The Scots acquiesced in this reply, and both sides proceeded in the treaty, without any other intervening dispute. They were twice visited by the queen, who exhorted them to accelerate the articles of a treaty that would prove so advantageous to both kingdoms. At length they were finished, arranged, and mutually signed, on the 22nd of July, and next day presented to her majesty, at the palace of St. James, by the lord keeper, in the name of the English commissioners: at the same time a sealed copy of the instrument was likewise delivered by the lord chancellor of Scotland; and each made a short oration on the subject, to which the queen returned a very gracious reply. That same day she dictated an order of council, that whoever should be concerned in any discourse or libel, or in laying wagers relating to the union, should be prosecuted with the utmost rigour of the law (d).

(d) In this famous treaty it was stipulated, That the succession to the united kingdom of Great Britain should be vested in the princess Sophia, and her heirs, according to the acts already passed in the parliament of England: that the united kingdom should be represented by one and the same parliament: that all the subjects of Great Britain should enjoy a communication of privileges and advantages: that they should have the same allowances, encouragements, and drawbacks; and be under the same prohibitions, restrictions, and regulations, with respect to commerce and customs: that Scotland should not be charged with the temporary duties on some certain commodities: that the sum of three hundred and ninety-eight thousand and eighty-five pounds, ten shillings, should be granted to the Scots, as an equivalent for such parts of the customs and excise charged upon that kingdom, in consequence of the union, as would be applicable to the payments of the debts of England, according to the proportion which the customs and excise of Scotland bore to those of England: that as the revenues of Scotland might increase, a further equivalent should be allowed for such proportion of the said increase, as should be applicable to the payment of the debts of England: that the sum to be paid at present, as well as the monies arising from the future equivalents, should be employed in reducing the coin of Scotland to the standard and value of the English coin; in paying off the capital stock and interest due to the proprietors of the African company, which should be immediately dissolved; in discharging all the public debts of the kingdom of Scotland; in promoting and encouraging manufactures and fisheries, under the direction of commissioners to be appointed by her majesty, and accountable to the parliament of Great Britain: that the laws concerning public right, policy, and civil government, should be the same throughout the whole united kingdom; but that no alteration should be made in laws which concerned private right, except for evident utility of the subjects within Scotland: that the Court of Session, and all other courts of judicature in Scotland, should remain as then constituted by the laws of that kingdom, with the same authority and privileges as before the union; subject, nevertheless, to such regulations as should be made by the parliament of Great Britain: that all heritable offices, superiorities, heritable jurisdictions, offices for life, and jurisdictions for life, should be reserved to the owners, as rights of property, in the same manner as then enjoyed by the laws of Scotland: that the rights and privileges of the Royal Boroughs in Scotland should be represented in the parliament of Great Britain by sixteen peers and forty-five commoners, to be elected in such a manner as should be settled by the present parliament of Scotland: that all peers of Scotland, and the successors to their honours and dignities, should, from and after the union, be peers of Great Britain, and should have rank and precedency next and immediately after the English peers of the like orders and degrees at the time of the union; and before all peers of Great Britain of the like orders and degrees, who might be created after the union: that they should be tried as peers of Great Britain, and enjoy all privileges of peers, as fully enjoyed by the peers of England, except the right and privilege of sitting in the House of Lords, and the privileges depending thereon, and particularly the right of sitting upon the trials of peers: that the crown, sceptre, and sword of state, the records of parliament, and all other records, rolls, and registers whatsoever, should still remain as they were, within that part of the united kingdom called Scotland: that all laws and statutes in either kingdom, so far as they might be consistent with the terms of these articles, should cease and be declared void by the respective parliaments of the two kingdoms.

THE ACT OF UNION READ BEFORE QUEEN ANNE.

While the treaty of union was carrying on, the duke of Marlborough repaired to Holland, at the close of April, and opened the campaign. He brought an army of eighty thousand men into the field, which was greater than what he had hitherto been able to muster; and still he expected reinforcements from Denmark and Prussia. The court of France was aware of this, and resolved to attack the duke before a junction could be formed by these troops. Villeroi, who commanded their army, consisting of eighty thousand men, near Tirlemont, had orders to act on the defensive; but, if compelled, to hazard an engagement. The duke, on the other hand, had received a slight repulse, by the defection of prince Louis of Baden; and he resolved to retrieve his credit by some signal action. Villeroi had drawn up his forces in a strong camp; his right was flanked by the river Mehaigne; his left was posted behind a marsh, and the village of Ramilies lay in the center. Marlborough, who perceived this disposition, drew up his army accordingly. He knew that the left wing of the enemy could not attack him but at a great disadvantage: he therefore weakened his troops in that quarter, and furiously fell on the centre with superior numbers. The enemy's centre was soon obliged to yield in consequence of this attack, and at length gave way on all sides. The horse, abandoning their foot, were so closely pursued, that almost the whole of them were cut to pieces. Six thousand men were taken prisoners, and about eight thousand were killed or wounded. The loss of the allies did not exceed three thousand men. Besides the six thousand privates, they took six hundred officers, the enemy's baggage and artillery, and about one hundred and twenty colours or standards. This victory was almost as signal as that of Blenheim: Bavaria and Cologne were the fruits of the one; all Brabant was gained by the other. The French troops were dispirited; the city of Paris was in confusion. Louis, who had been long flattered with conquest, was now humbled to such a degree, as almost to excite the compassion of his enemies. He entreated for peace, but in vain: the allies carried all before them; and his very capital began to dread the approach of the conquerors. What neither his power, his armies, nor his politics could affect, was brought about by a party in England. The dissension between the Whigs and the Tories in England saved France, now tottering on the very margin of destruction.

The councils of the queen had hitherto been governed by a Whig ministry; for though the duke of Marlborough had first started in the Tory interest, he soon joined the opposite faction; as he found them most sincere in their desires to humble the power of France. The Whigs still pursued the schemes of the late king; and impressed with a spirit of liberty, strove to humble despotism in every part of Europe. In a government where the reasoning of individuals, retired from power, generally leads those who command, the designs of the ministry must alter as the people happen to change. Such was the case in England. The queen's personal virtues, her successes, her deference for the clergy, and, in turn, their great veneration for her, began to have a prevailing influence over the whole nation. The people of every rank were not ashamed to defend the most servile tenets, when they tended to flatter or increase the power of the sovereign. They argued in favour of strict hereditary succession, divine right, and non-resistance to the regal power. The spirit of Toryism began to prevail; and the Whigs, who had raised the queen into greatness, were the first that were likely to fall by their own success. The Tories, though joining in vigorous measures against France, were, however, never ardently their enemies; they rather secretly hated the Dutch, as of principles very opposite to their own; and only longed for an opportunity of withdrawing from their friendship. They began to meditate schemes of opposition to the duke of Marlborough. They were taught to regard him as a self-interested man, who sacrificed the real advantages of the nation, in protracting a ruinous war for his own private emolument and glory. They saw their country oppressed with an increasing load of taxes, which, by a continuance of the war, must inevitably become an intolerable burthen. Their secret discontents therefore began to spread; and the Tories wanted only a few determined leaders to conduct them in removing the present ministry.

In the mean time, a succession of losses began to dissipate the conquering phrenzy which had seized the nation, and incline them to wish for peace. The army under Charles in Spain was then commanded by lord Galway. This nobleman having received intelligence that the enemy, under the command of the duke of Berwick, was posted near the town of Almanza, advanced to give him battle. The conflict began about two in the afternoon of the 14th of April, 1707, and the whole front of each army was fully engaged. The centers, consisting chiefly of battalions from Great Britain and Holland, seemed at first victorious; but the Portuguese horse, by whom they were to be supported, betaking themselves to flight on the first charge, the English troops were flanked and surrounded on every side. In this dreadful emergency they formed themselves into a square, and retired to an eminence, where, being ignorant of the country, and destitute of all supplies, they were obliged to surrender prisoners of war, to the number of ten thousand men. This victory was complete and decisive; and all Spain, except the province of Catalonia, returned to their duty to Philip.

An attempt was likewise made upon Toulon, by the duke of Savoy and prince Eugene by land, and the English fleet by sea, but with as little success as in the former instance. The prince, with a body of thirty thousand men, took possession of the eminences that commanded the city, on the 11th of July, while the fleet attacked and reduced two forts at the entrance of the mole; but the French king sending an army to the relief of the place, and the duke of Savoy perceiving no hopes of compelling the city to a speedy surrender, he resolved to abandon his enterprize; and having embarked his artillery, retreated by night without any molestation.

The fleet, under the command of sir Cloudesley Shovel, was still more unfortunate. Having set sail for England, and, being in soundings on the 22nd of October, about eight at night a violent storm arising, his ship was dashed upon the rocks of Scilly, and every soul on board perished. The like fate befel three ships more, while three or four others were saved with the utmost difficulty. The admiral's body being cast ashore, was stripped and buried in the sand; but this being thought too humble a funeral for so brave a commander, it was dug up again, and interred with proper solemnity in Westminster Abbey.

It is somewhat extraordinary, that through all the transactions relative to the Union, the Tories violently opposed it; for they considered the Scots in a body as Whigs, and supposed that their interest would become more powerful by this association. But never were men more agreeably disappointed than the Tories were in this particular. The majority of the Scottish nation, which was entirely against uniting with England, were so much dissatisfied with this measure, that they immediately joined in opposing the ministry, by whom they were thus compelled to unite. The members themselves were disaffected to the measure, and secretly strove to undermine those by whom their power had been thus established.

The body of English Tories were not less displeased with an union, of which they had not sagacity to distinguish the advantages. They were for some time become the majority of the kingdom, but found themselves opposed by a powerful coalition at court. The duchess of Marlborough had long been in possession of the queen's confidence and favour; and turned the easiness of her majesty's temper to her own advantage, as well as to that of her party. The duke of Marlborough, her husband, was at the head of the army, which was devoted to him. Lord Godolphin, his son-in-law, was at the head of the treasury, which he managed so as to co-operate with the ambition of the duke. An unexpected alteration, however, in the queen's affections was about to take place, and that was entirely owing to their own mismanagement. Among the number of those whom the duchess had introduced to the queen, to contribute to her private amusement, was one Mrs. Masham, her own kinswoman, whom she had raised from indigence and obscurity. The duchess having gained the ascendant over the queen, became petulant and insolent, and relaxed in those arts by which she had risen. Mrs. Masham, who had her fortune to make, was more humble and assiduous: she flattered the foibles of the queen, and assented to her prepossessions and prejudices. She soon saw the queen's inclination to the opinions of the Tories; and, instead of attempting to thwart her, as the duchess had done, she joined with her partiality, and even outwent her in her own way.

Mrs. Masham began to insinuate to the queen, that the Tories were by far the majority of the people; and that they were displeased with a ministry that attempted to rule their sovereign, and had lavished the treasures of the nation on wars which they chose to carry on in order to continue in power. But though this intriguing woman seemed to act from herself alone, she was in fact the tool of Mr. Harley, secretary of state, who also, some time before, had insinuated himself into the queen's good graces; and who had determined to sap the credit of Godolphin and Marlborough. His aim was to unite the Tory interest under his own shelter, and to expel the Whigs from the advantages which they had long enjoyed under the government. Harley, better known afterwards by the title of lord Oxford, was a man possessed of uncommon erudition, great knowledge of business, and as great ambition. He was close, phlegmatic, and cool; but at the same time fonder of the splendours of office than the drudgeries annexed to it.

In his career of ambition he chose for his associate Henry St. John, afterwards the famous viscount Bolingbroke, a man of great eloquence, and greater ambition, enterprizing, restless, active, and haughty, with some wit, but little principle. This statesman was at first contented to act in an inferior capacity, subservient to Oxford's designs; and it was not till afterwards, when he understood the full extent of his own parts and influence, that he was fired with the ambition of being first in the state, and aspired to depress his first promoters.

To this junto was added sir Simon Harcourt, a lawyer of great abilities. These united, endeavoured to rally and reconcile the scattered body of the Tories, and diffused assurances among their partizans, that the queen would no longer bear the tyranny of a Whig ministry. She had ever been, they said, a friend in her heart to the Tory and high-church party, by which appellation this faction now chose to be distinguished; and to convince them of the truth of their assertions, the queen herself shortly after bestowed two bishoprics on clergymen who had openly condemned the Revolution.

The Whig ministry, whom the people had formerly caressed, now began to decline. To them were imputed the burthens under which the nation groaned, burthens which the people had been hitherto animated to bear by the pomp of triumph; but the load of which they felt in a pause of success. No new advantage had of late been shewn them from the Netherlands; and France, instead of sinking under the weight of the confederacy, as they had been taught to expect, seemed to rise with fresh vigour from every overthrow. The English merchants too had lately sustained repeated losses, for want of proper convoys; the coin of the nation was visibly diminished, and the public credit began to decline.

The ministry were for a long time ignorant of these secret murmurings, or pretended to despise them. Instead therefore of attempting to mitigate the censures propagated against them, they continued to vex the queen with remonstrances against her conduct; and upbraided her with ingratitude for those services which had secured her glory. The murmurs of the nation first found vent in the house of lords, where the earl of Wharton, seconded by lord Somers, expatiated upon the scarcity of money, the decay of trade, and the mismanagement of the navy. This complaint was backed by a petition from the sheriffs and merchants of London, aggravating their losses by sea for want of convoys, and these complaints were proved by witnesses. The war with France was now canvassed and condemned. Lord Oxford was at the bottom of all these complaints; and though they did not produce an immediate effect, yet they did not fail of a growing and steady operation.

The Whig party of the ministry at length opened their eyes to the intrigues of their pretending associate. The duchess of Marlborough perceived, when it was too late, that she was supplanted by her kinswoman Mrs. Masham; and her husband found no other means of re-establishing his credit, but by openly opposing Oxford, whom he could not otherwise displace. The secretary had lately incurred some suspicions, from the secret correspondence which one Gregg, an under clerk in his office, kept up with the court of France. Gregg was brought to trial, condemned, and executed; and the duke of Marlborough took advantage of this opportunity to cause the removal of Oxford. He accordingly wrote to the queen, that himself and lord Godolphin could serve her no longer, should the present secretary be continued in his place. The queen, not regarding the secret intrigues of her ministers, endeavoured to appease the duke's resentment by every art of persuasion; but he was too confident of his own power, and continued obstinate in the refusal. The earl of Godolphin and the duke went so far as to retire from court, and the queen saw herself in danger of being deserted by her whole ministry. A sullen silence prevailed through the cabinet-council; and some were even heard to say, that no deliberations could be pursued in the absence of the duke and the lord treasurer.

The queen now, for the first time, perceived the power which these two ministers had assumed over her councils. She found that they were willing to place and displace the servants of the crown at pleasure; and that nothing was left to her but to approve such measures as they thought fit to press upon her choice. She secretly therefore resolved to remove a ministry that was thus grown odious to her, but in the present exigency was obliged to give way to their demands. She then sent for the duke of Marlborough, and told him that Harley should immediately resign his office, and it was accordingly conferred on Mr. Henry Boyle, chancellor of the exchequer.

Thus were the first efforts of the Tory party frustrated, and Bolingbroke was resolved to share in his friend Harley's disgrace, as were also sir Simon Harcourt, the attorney-general, and sir Thomas Mansell, comptroller of the household, who all voluntarily relinquished their offices. Bolingbroke's employment of secretary at war was conferred on Robert Walpole, a man who began to be considerable in the house of commons, and who afterwards made such a figure in the two succeeding reigns. The duke of Marlborough seemed to triumph in the success of his resentment, but he did not consider that, by this step, he entirely lost the confidence of the queen. He returned to prosecute his victories on the continent, where a new harvest of glory attended him, which, however, did not re-establish his power.

This violent measure, which seemed at first favourable to the Whig ministry, laid the foundation of its ruin. Harley was now enabled to throw off the mask of friendship, and to take more vigorous measures for the prosecution of his designs. In him the queen reposed all her trust, though he now had no visible concern in the administration. The first triumph of the Tories, in which the queen discovered a public partiality in their favour, was seen in a transaction of no great importance in itself, but from the consequences it produced. The parties of the nation were eager to engage, and they wanted but the watch-word to begin. This was given by a man neither of abilities, property, nor power; but who was accidentally brought forward on this occasion.

The person alluded to was Henry Sacheverel, a clergyman, who had been bred at Oxford, and possessed an overheated imagination. He had acquired some popularity among those who distinguished themselves by the name of high-church-men, and had taken all occasions to vent his spleen against the dissenters. At the summer assizes at Derby, he had held forth before the judges in that strain. On the 5th of November, 1709, in St. Paul's Church, he, in a violent declamation, defended the doctrine of non-resistance, inveighed against the toleration of dissenters, declared the church was dangerously attacked by its enemies, and slightly defended by its false friends. He sounded the trumpet for the zealots, and exhorted the people to "put on the whole armour of God." Sir Samuel Gerrard, lord mayor, countenanced this harangue, which, though very weak both in the matter and the style, was published under his protection, and extolled by the Tories as a master-piece of writing (e).

On the 13th of December, Mr. Dolben, son to the archbishop of York, laid a complaint before the house of commons against these rhapsodies, and thus gave force to what would have soon been forgotten. The most violent paragraphs were read, and the sermons voted scandalous and seditious libels. Sacheverel was brought to the bar of the house; and he, far from disowning the writing of them, gloried in what he had done, and mentioned the encouragement he had received to publish them from the lord mayor, who was then present. Being ordered to withdraw, it was resolved to impeach him of high crimes and misdemeanours at the bar of the house of lords: and Mr. Dolben was fixed upon to conduct the prosecution, in the name of the commons of all England. A committee was appointed to draw up articles of impeachment; Sacheverel was taken into custody, and a day appointed for his trial before the lords in Westminster Hall.

In the mean time, the Tories, who altogether approved his principles, were as violent in his defence as the commons had been in his prosecution. They affirmed that the Whigs had formed a design to pull down the church, and that this prosecution was intended to try their strength, before they would proceed openly to the execution of their project. The clergy did not fail to alarm and inflame their hearers; while emissaries were employed to raise a ferment among the populace, arising from a scarcity of provisions which at that time prevailed in almost every country of Europe. The dangers were multiplied to which the church was exposed from Dissenters, Whigs, and lukewarm prelates. These they represented as the authors of a ruinous war, which brought on that very dearth they were then deploring. Such an extensive party declaring in favour of Sacheverel, after the articles were exhibited against him, the lords thought fit to admit him to bail.

The eyes of the whole kingdom were turned upon this very extraordinary trial, which lasted three weeks, and excluded all other public business for the time. The queen herself was every day present as a private spectator, while vast multitudes attended the culprit each day as he went to the hall, shouting as he passed, or silently praying for his success. The managers for the commons were sir Joseph Jekyl; Mr. Eyre, solicitor-general; sir Peter King, recorder; general Stanhope; sir Thomas Parker; and Mr. Walpole. The doctor was defended by sir Simon Harcourt and Mr. Phipps, assisted by Dr. Atterbury, Dr. Smallridge, and Dr. Friend (f).

When the commons had gone through their charge, the managers for Sacheverel undertook his defence with great art and eloquence. He afterwards recited a speech himself, which, from the difference of style between it and his sermons, seems evidently the work of another. In this speech he solemnly justified his intentions towards the queen and her government. He spoke in the most respectful terms of the Revolution, and the Protestant succession. He maintained the doctrine of non-resistance as a tenet of the church, in which he was brought up; and in a pathetic conclusion endeavoured to excite the pity of his audience. He was surrounded by the queen's chaplains, who encouraged and extolled him as the champion of the church; and he was favoured by the queen herself, who could not but approve a doctrine that confirmed her authority and enlarged her power.

Those persons who are removed from the interests of that period may be apt to regard with wonder so great a contest from so slight a cause: but the spirit of contention had indeed been laid before in the nation, and this man only happened to set fire to the train. The lords, when they retired to consult upon his sentence, were divided, and continued undetermined for some time. At length, after much dispute, and virulent altercation, Sacheverel was found guilty by a majority of seventeen; but no less than four and thirty peers entered a protest against this decision. He was prohibited from preaching for three years; and his two sermons were ordered to be burned by the hands of the common hangman, in presence of the lord mayor and the two sheriffs (g).

Such was the complexion of the times, when the queen thought proper to remove the Whig ministers, and give their offices to others who were of the Tory party. That the triumph of the Tories might be complete, the queen dissolved the Whig parliament, after such precautions had been taken as would not fail to influence the new elections in favour of the other party. She then issued a proclamation for a new parliament.

We must, however, return to the affairs of the war on the continent. The duke of Marlborough had some time before gone back to Flanders, where he had led on the allied armies to great, but dear-bought victories. The French were dispirited indeed, and rather kept upon the defensive; but still, when forced to engage, they fought with great obstinacy, and seemed to gather courage as the frontiers of their own country became more nearly threatened.

Peace had been more than once offered, and treaties had been entered upon, and frustrated. After the battle of the Ramillies, the king of France had employed the elector of Bavaria to write letters in his name to the duke of Marlborough, containing proposals for opening a congress. He offered to give up either Spain and its dominions, or the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily to Charles of Austria, and to give a barrier to the Dutch in the Netherlands: but these terms were rejected. The Dutch were intoxicated with the success which had attended the allied armies; and the duke of Marlborough had every motive to continue the war, as it gratified not only his ambition but his avarice; a passion that obscured his shining talents.

The duke was resolved to push his good fortune. At the head of a numerous army he marched to the village of Oudenarde, where the French in equal numbers were posted. A furious engagement ensued, in which the French were obliged to retire, and took advantage of the night to secure their retreat. About three thousand men were slain on the field of battle; two thousand deserted; and about seven thousand were taken, including a great number of officers, together with ten pieces of cannon, above one hundred standards and colours, and four thousand horses. The allies lost about two thousand men.

The generals of the allies now undertook an enterprise, which, in the opinion of the French generals, indicated rashness and inconsiderate self-sufficiency. This was the siege of Lisle, the strongest town in Flanders, provided with all necessaries, store of ammunition, and a garrison reinforced with one-and-twenty battalions of the best troops in France, commanded by Mareschal de Boufflers in person. But these were not the principal difficulties which the allies encountered. The enemy had cut off the communication between them and their magazines at Antwerp and Sas-Fan Ghent; so that they were obliged to bring their convoys from Ostend along a narrow causeway, exposed to the attack of an army more numerous than that with which they sat down before Lisle. On the 13th of August, 1708, it was invested on one side by prince Eugene, and on the other by the prince of Orange-Nassau, stadtholder of Friesland; while the duke of Marlborough encamped at Helchin, to cover the siege. The trenches were opened on the 22d, and carried on with vigour. The dukes of Burgundy and Vendome being now joined by the duke of Berwick, resolved, if possible, to relieve the place; and made several marches and counter-marches for this purpose. Marlborough being apprised of their intention, marched out of his lines to give them battle, being reinforced by a considerable body of troops from the siege; but the enemy declined an engagement, and the allies returned to their camp, which they fortified with an entrenchment. On the 7th of September, the besiegers took by assault the counterscarp of Lisle, after an obstinate action, in which they lost a thousand men. The French generals continued to hover about the camp of the confederates, which they actually cannonaded; and the duke of Marlborough again formed his army in order of battle: but their design was only to harrass the allies with continual alarms, and interrupt the operations of the siege. They endeavoured to surprize the town of Aeth, by means of a secret correspondence with the inhabitants; but the conspiracy was discovered before it took effect. Then they cut off all communication between the besiegers and the Schelde, the banks of which they fortified with strong entrenchments, and a prodigious number of cannon; so that all the stores and necessaries were sent to the camp of the confederates from Ostend. On the 21st, prince Eugene, who was in the trenches, seeing the troops driven by the enemy from a lodgement they had made on the counterscarp of the Tenaille, rallied and led them back to the charge: but being wounded over the left eye with a musket shot, he was obliged to retire, and for some days the duke of Marlborough sustained the whole command, both in the siege and of the covering army. On the 23rd, the Tenaille was stormed, and a lodgement made along the covered way. Mareschal Boufflers having found means to inform the duke de Vendome that his ammunition was almost expended, this general detached the chevalier de Luxenburgh, with a body of horse and dragoons, to supply the place with gunpowder, every man carrying a bag of forty pounds upon the crupper. They were discovered in passing through the camp of the allies, and pursued to the barrier of the town, into which about three hundred were admitted; but a great number were killed by the confederates, or miserably destroyed by the explosion of the powder which they carried.

(f) While the trial continued, nothing could exceed the violence and outrage of the populace. They surrounded the queen's sedan, exclaiming, "God bless your majesty and the church; we hope your majesty is for Doctor Sacheverel." They destroyed several meeting houses, plundered the dwellings of many eminent dissenters, and even proposed to attack the bank. The queen, in compliance with the request of the commons, published a proclamation for suppressing the tumults; and several persons being apprehended, were tried for high treason. Two were convicted, and sentenced to die; but neither of them were executed.

(g) The lenity of this sentence, which was, in a great measure, owing to the dread of popular resentment, was considered by the Tories as an absolute triumph. They declared their joy in bonfires and illuminations, and openly avowed their rage against his persecutors. Shortly after, he was presented to a benefice in North Wales, whither he went with all the pomp and magnificence of a sovereign. He was sumptuously entertained by the university of Oxford, and many noblemen in his way, who, while they worshipped him as the idol of their faction, could not help despising the object of their adoration. He was received in several towns by the magistrates in their formalities, and often attended by a body of a thousand horse. At Bridgenorth he was met by a Mr. Creswell, at the head of four thousand men on horseback, and as many on foot, wearing white knots edged with gold. The hedges were for two miles decorated with garlands, and the steeples covered with streamers, flags, and colours. The church, and Dr. Sacheverel, was the universal cry, and a spirit of religious enthusiasm spread through the whole nation.

The next attempt of the French generals was to intercept a convoy from Ostend. The count de la Motte marched from Ghent, with about two-and-twenty thousand men, to attack this convoy, which was guarded by six thousand of the allies, commanded by major-general Webb. This officer made such an admirable disposition by the wood of Wymendale, and received the enemy with such a close fire, that after a very warm action, that lasted two hours, they retired in the utmost confusion, notwithstanding their great superiority in number, leaving six thousand men killed upon the field of battle; the loss of the allies not exceeding nine hundred and twelve, officers and soldiers. This was the most honourable exploit performed during the whole war, and of such consequence to the confederates, that if the convoy had been taken, the siege must have been raised. The duke de Vendome ordered the dykes between Bruges and Nieuport to be cut, so as to lay the whole country under water, in hopes of destroying the communication between Ostend and the camp of the confederates; and, after a regular siege, he took colonel Caulfield, and a body of British troops posted in the village of Leffinghen, by whose means the convoys had been forwarded to the duke of Marlborough. On the 22nd of October, mareschal Boufflers desired to capitulate for the town of Lisle: next day the articles were signed: on the 25th the allies took possession of the place, and the mareschal retired into the citadel with the remains of his garrison, which, from twelve thousand, was reduced to less than half of that number. A negociation was begun for the surrender of the citadel: but Boufflers made such extravagant demands as were rejected with disdain. Hostilities were renewed on the 29th, and the earl of Stair was detached to provide corn for the army in the districts of Furnes and Dixmude. During these transactions, velt-mareschal D'Auverquerque died at Rousselaer, in the sixty-seventh year of his age, after having, in above thirty campaigns, exhibited innumerable proofs of uncommon courage, ability, and moderation. The duke de Vendome did not yet despair of obliging the confederates to abandon their enterprize: the French ministers at Rome and Venice publicly declared the allied army was cooped up in such a manner, that it must either raise the siege or be famished. The elector of Bavaria, with a detachment of ten thousand men, marched to Brussels, and attacked the counterscarp with incredible fury; but was repulsed by the garrison, under the command of general Paschal, and retired with precipitation, when he understood that the duke of Marlborough was in motion to relieve the place. This nobleman and Prince Eugene no sooner understood the danger to which Brussels was exposed, than they marched with their covering army to the Scheldt, which they passed in pontoons without opposition, notwithstanding the formidable works which the French had raised. They now abandoned them with precipitation, to the surprize of the confederates. Having passed the river between Eskenaffe and Hauterive, as well as at other places, they marched to Oudenarde, where they received intelligence that the elector had retreated. Then prince Eugene returned to Lisle, and the duke of Marlborough proceeded to Brussels, where he was received with joy and acclamation. He afterwards took post at Oudenarde, so as to maintain a communication with prince Eugene.

The besiegers having made lodgements and raised batteries on the second counterscarp of the citadel, sent a message to Boufflers, intimating, that if he would surrender before the opening of the batteries, he should have an honourable capitulation; otherwise he and his garrison must be made prisoners of war. He chose to avoid the last part of the alternative: hostages were exchanged on the 8th of December, and the articles signed on the 10th; when the mareschal and his garrison marched out with the honours of war, and were conducted to Douay. The success of the allies in this enterprize, was owing in a great measure to the improvidence and misconduct of the besieged. The French generals thought that the allies would not attempt any thing of consequence after the reduction of Lisle, considering the advanced season of the year, and therefore they returned to Paris, after having distributed their army into winter quarters. But their antagonists were determined to strike another stroke of importance before their forces should separate. On the 20th of December they invested the Ghent on all sides; and on the 30th, when the batteries were ready to open, the count de la Motte, who commanded the garrison, desired to capitulate. On the 3rd of January, 1709, he marched out with thirty battalions and sixteen squadrons, which were conducted to Tournay; while the duke of Argyle, with six British battalions, took possession of the town and citadel. Then the enemy abandoned Bruges, Plassedahl, and Leffingen; and the generals of the allies, having settled the plan of winter quarters, repaired to Holland, leaving the forces under the command of count Tilly.

The campaign in Catalonia was productive of a great event. Count Guido de Staremberg arrived at Barcelona on the last day of April: but the Imperial troops brought from Italy by admiral Leake did not land in time to relieve Tortosa, which the duke of Orleans besieged and took, together with Denia, the garrison of which were made prisoners of war, contrary to the articles of capitulation. These losses, however, were abundantly made up to the allies by the conquest of Sardinia and Minorca. Sir John Leake, having taken on board a handful of troops, under the conduct of the marquis d'Alconzel, set sail for Cagliari, and summoned the viceroy to submit to king Charles. As he did not send an immediate answer, the admiral began to bombard the city, and the inhabitants compelled him to surrender at discretion. The greater part of the garrison inlisted themselves in the service of Charles. The deputies of the States being assembled by the marquis D'Alconzel, acknowledged the prince as their sovereign, and agreed to furnish his army with thirty thousand sacks of corn, which were accordingly transported to Catalonia, where there was a great scarcity of provision. Major-general Stanhope having planned the conquest of Minorca, and concerted with the admiral the measures necessary to put it in execution, obtained from count Staremberg a few battalions of Spaniards, Italians, and Portuguese: at the head of these he embarked at Barcelona, with a fine train of British artillery, accompanied by brigadier Wade and colonel Petit, an engineer of great reputation. They landed on the island, about ten miles from St. Philip's fort, on the 26th of August, with about eight hundred marines, which augmented their number to about three thousand. Next day they erected batteries; and general Stanhope ordered a number of arrows to be shot into the place, to which papers were affixed, written in the Spanish and French languages, containing threats, that all the garrison should be sent to the mines, if they would not surrender before the batteries were finished. The garrison consisted of a thousand Spaniards and six hundred French marines, commanded by colonel la Jonquire, who imagined that the number of the besiegers amounted to at least ten thousand, so artfully had they been drawn up in sight of the enemy. The batteries began to play, and in a little time demolished four towers that served as outworks to the fort. On the second or third day they thought proper to beat a parley, and capitulate, on condition, That they should march out with the honours of war: that the Spaniards should be transported to Murcia, and the French to Toulon. These last, however, were detained, by way of reprisal for the garrison of Denia (h).

(h) The Spanish governor was so mortified when he learned the real number of the besiegers, that on his arrival at Murcia he threw himself out of a window in despair, and was killed upon the spot. La Jonquire was confined for life, and all the French officers incurred their master's displeasure.

Fort

Fort St. Philip being thus reduced, to the amazement of all Europe, and the garrison of Fort Fornelles having surrendered themselves prisoners to the admirals Leake and Whitaker, the inhabitants submitted to the English government, for king Philip had oppressed and deprived them of their privileges: general Stanhope appointed colonel Petit governor of fort St. Philip, and deputy-governor of the whole island.

The British fleet not only contributed to the reduction of Minorca, but likewise over-awed the pope, who had endeavoured to form a league of the princes in Italy against the emperor. This pontiff had manifested his partiality to the house of Bourbon in such a palpable manner, that his Imperial majesty ordered Monsieur de Bonneval to march with the troops that were in Italy, reinforced by those belonging to the duke of Modena, and invade the duchy of Ferrara. He accordingly took possession of Comachio and some other places, pretending they were allodial estates belonging to the duke of Modena, and fiefs of the emperor, to which the holy see had no lawful claim. The viceroy of Naples was forbid to remit any money to Rome; and the council of the kingdom drew up a long memorial, containing the pretensions of his catholic majesty, which struck at the very foundation of the pope's temporal power. His holiness wrote a long remonstrance to the emperor, on the injustice of those proceedings, and declared that he would assert his cause though he should lose his life in the contest. He forthwith began to raise an army, and revived a plan of forming a league among the princes and states of Italy for their mutual defence. Sir John Leake had received orders to bombard Civita-Vecchia; but as the emperor and duke of Savoy hoped to effect an accommodation with the court of Rome, they prevailed upon the English admiral to suspend hostilities until they should have tried the method of negociation. The marquis de Prie, a Piedmontese nobleman, was sent ambassador to Rome; but the pope would not receive him in that quality. Elated with the promises of France, he set the emperor at defiance; and his troops having surprised a body of Imperialists, were so barbarous as to cut them all in pieces. The duke of Savoy having ended the campaign, the troops of the emperor, which had served under that prince, were ordered to march into the papal territories, and drove the forces of his holiness before them, without any regard to number. Bologna capitulated; and Rome began to tremble with the apprehension of being once more sacked by a German army. Then the pope's courage failed: he was glad to admit the marquis de Prie as envoy from the emperor. He consented to disband his new levies; to accommodate the Imperial troops with winter-quarters in the papal territories; to grant the investiture of Naples to king Charles; and to allow at all times a passage to the Imperial troops through his dominions.

In the West Indies commodore Wager destroyed the admiral of the galleons, and took the rear admiral on the coast of Carthagena. Had the officers of his squadron done their duty, the greatest part of the fleet would have fallen into his hands. At his return to Jamaica two of his captains were tried by a court-martial, and dismissed from the service.

The court of England was about this time not a little perplexed by the consequences of an outrage committed on the person of the count de Matueof the Muscovite ambassador. He was publicly arrested at the suit of a laceman, and maltreated by the bailiffs, who dragged him to prison, where he continued until he was bailed by the earl of Feversham. Incensed at this insult, he demanded redress of the government, and was seconded in his remonstrances by the ministers of the emperor, the king of Prussia, and several other foreign potentates. The queen expressed uncommon indignation against the authors of this violence, who were immediately apprehended, and orders were given to prosecute them with the utmost severity of the law. Matueof repeated his complaints with great acrimony; and Mr. secretary Boyle assured him, in the queen's name, that he should have ample satisfaction. Notwithstanding this assurance, he demanded a pass for himself and family; refused the ordinary presents at his departure, and retired to Holland. From thence he transmitted a memorial, with a letter from the Czar to the queen, insisting upon her punishing with death all the persons concerned in violating the law of nations upon the person of his ambassador. Such punishment being altogether inconsistent with the laws of England, the queen and her ministry were extremely disquieted, and held several councils, to deliberate upon the measures proper to be taken on such an occasion.

On the 28th of October, 1708, prince George of Denmark died of an asthma and dropsy, with which he had been long afflicted. He was a prince of an amiable rather than a shining character, brave, good-natured, modest, and humane, but devoid of great talents and ambition. He had always lived in harmony with the queen, who, during the whole term of their union, and especially in his last illness, approved herself a pattern of conjugal truth and tenderness. At his death the earl of Pembroke was created lord high admiral, the earl of Wharton promoted to the government of Ireland, and lord Somers appointed president of the council. Notwithstanding these promotions of the Whig noblemen, the duke of Marlborough declined apace in his credit with the queen, who privately consulted and reposed her chief confidence in Mr. Harley, though he had no visible concern in the administration.

The laws of England having been found insufficient to punish capitally the authors of the insult offered to the Muscovite ambassador, a bill was brought into the house of commons for preserving the privileges of ambassadors and other foreign ministers; and passed through both houses: as did another to prevent the laying of wagers relating to the public, a practice which had been carried to a degree of infatuation: and by which many unwary persons fell a sacrifice to crafty adventurers. On the 14th of March the commons voted the sum of one hundred and three thousand two hundred and three pounds, for the relief of the inhabitants of Nevis and St. Christopher's, who had suffered by the late invasion; and on the 21st of April, 1709, the parliament was prorogued.

The Muscovite ambassador, however, continued to write expostulatory letters to Mr. secretary Boyle, who at last owned, that the laws of the kingdom did not admit of such punishment as he demanded. An information was tried in the court of Queen's Bench for her majesty, against Thomas Morton, laceman, and thirteen other persons concerned in the insult, of which they were found guilty; and the special matter of the privileges of ambassadors was to be argued next term before the judges. Meanwhile, the queen, by way of satisfaction to the Czar, condescended to make solemn excuses by her ambassador; to repair Matueof's honour by a letter, and indemnify him for all his costs and damages: concessions, with which the Czar and his ambassador declared themselves well satisfied.

In 1709, the campaign was opened in Flanders by prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough, who encamped the allied army, towards the end of June, in the plain of Lisle, to the number of one hundred and ten thousand fighting men. At the same time the mareschal Villars, reckoned the most fortunate general of France, assembled the French forces in the plain of Lens, where he began to throw up entrenchments. The confederate generals having observed his situation, and perceiving he could not be attacked with any probability of success, resolved to undertake the siege of Tournay, the garrison of which Villars had imprudently weakened. Accordingly, they made a feint upon Ypres, in order to deceive the enemy, and convert all their attention to that side, while they suddenly invested Tournay on the 27th of June. Though the garrison did not exceed twelve weakened battalions, and four squadrons of dragoons, the place was so strong, both by art and nature, that the siege was protracted, contrary to the expectation of the allies, and cost them a great number of men, notwithstanding all the precautions that could be taken for the safety of the troops. As the besiegers proceeded by the method of sap, their miners frequently met with those of the enemy under ground, and fought with bayonet and pistol. The volunteers on both sides presented themselves to the subterraneous combats, in the midst of mines and countermines ready primed for explosion. Sometimes they were kindled by accident, and sometimes sprung by design; so that great numbers of those brave men were stifled below, and whole battalions blown into the air, or buried in the rubbish. On the 28th of July, the besiegers having effected a practicable breach, and made the necessary dispositions for a general assault, the enemy offered to capitulate: the town was surrendered upon conditions, and the garrison retired to the citadel. Surville, the governor, likewise entered into a treaty about giving up the citadel: the articles being sent to the court of Versailles, Louis would not ratify them, except upon condition that there should be a general cessation in the Netherlands till the 5th of September. Hostilities were renewed on the 8th of August, and prosecuted with uncommon ardour and animosity. On the 30th, Surville desired to capitulate on certain articles, which were rejected by the duke of Marlborough, who gave him to understand that he had no terms to expect, but must surrender at discretion. At length, his provision being quite exhausted, he was obliged to surrender himself and his garrison prisoners of war, though they were permitted to return to France, on giving their parole that they would not act in the field until a like number of the allies should be released.

The next object that attracted the eyes of the confederates was the city of Mons, which they resolved to besiege with all possible expedition. They passed the Scheldt on the 3rd of September, and detached the prince of Hesse to attack the French lines from the Haisne to the Sombre, which were abandoned at his approach. On the 7th, mareschal de Boufflers arrived in the French camp at Quievrain, content to act in an inferior capacity to Villars, although his superior in point of seniority. The duke of Marlborough having received advice that the French were on their march to attack the advanced body under the prince of Hesse, decamped from Havre, in order to support that detachment. On the 9th the allies made a motion to the left, by which the two armies were brought so near each other, that a mutual cannonading ensued; the French army, amounting to one hundred and twenty thousand men were posted behind the woods of La Merte and Tanieres, in the neighbourhood of Malplaquet. The confederates, nearly of the same number, encamped with the right near Sart and Bleron, and the left on the edge of the woods of Lagniere: the head-quarters being at Blarignies. The enemy, instead of attacking the allies, began to fortify their camp, which was naturally strong, with triple entrenchments. In a word, they were so covered with lines, hedges, entrenchments, cannon, and trees laid across, that they seemed to be quite inaccessible. Had the confederates attacked them on the 9th, the battle would not have been so bloody, and the victory would have proved more decisive; for they had not then begun to secure the camp; but Marlborough postponed the engagement until they should be reinforced by eighteen battalions which had been employed in the siege of Tournay; and, in the mean time, the French fortified themselves with incredible diligence and dispatch. On the 11th, early in the morning, the confederates, favoured by a thick fog, erected batteries on each wing, and in the centre: and about eight o'clock, the weather clearing up, the attack began. Eighty-six battalions on the right, commanded by general Schuylemburgh, the duke of Argyle, and other generals, and supported by two-and-twenty battalions under count Lottum, attacked the left of the enemy with such vigour, that, notwithstanding their lines and barricadoes, they were in less than an hour driven from their entrenchments, into the woods of Sart and Tanieres. The prince of Orange and baron Fagel, with six-and-thirty Dutch battalions, advanced against the right of the enemy, posted in the wood of La Merte, and covered with three entrenchments. Here the battle was maintained with the most desperate courage on both sides. The Dutch obliged the French to quit the first entrenchment; but were repulsed from the second with great slaughter. The prince of Orange persisted in his efforts with incredible perseverance and intrepidity, even after two horses had been killed under him, and the greater part of his officers either slain or disabled. The French fought with an obstinacy of courage that bordered on despair, till seeing their lines forced, their left wing and centre giving way, and their general, Villars, dangerously wounded, they made an excellent retreat towards Bavay, under the conduct of Boufflers, and took post between Quesnoy and Valenciennes. The field of battle they abandoned to the confederates, with about forty colours and standards, sixteen pieces of artillery, and a good number of prisoners: but this was the dearest victory the allies had ever purchased. About twenty thousand of their best troops were killed in the engagement; whereas the enemy did not lose half the number, and retired at leisure, perfectly recovered of that apprehension with which they had been for some years inspired and over-awed by the successes of their adversaries. On the side of the allies, count Lottum, general Tettau, count Oxienstern, and the marquis of Tullibardine were killed with many other officers of distinction. Prince Eugene was slightly wounded on the head: lieutenant-general Webb received a shot in the groin. The duke of Argyle, who distinguished himself by extraordinary feats of valour, escaped unhurt; but several musket-balls penetrated through his clothes, hat, and periwig. In the French army, the chevalier de St. George charged twelve times with the household troops, and in the last was wounded with a sword in the arm. The mareschal de Villars confidently asserted, that if he himself had not been disabled, the confederates would certainly have been defeated (i). The French having retired to Valenciennes, the allies were left at liberty to besiege Mons, which capitulated about the end of October; and both armies were distributed in winter-quarters. In Italy the pope delayed acknowledging king Charles, under various pretences, in hopes that the campaign would prove favourable to the house of Bourbon; till at length the emperor giving him to understand that his army should take up their winter-quarters in the Ecclesiastical State, his holiness, solemnly owned Charles as king of Spain, Naples and Sicily. But the military operations in Spain and Portugal were unfavourable to the allies. On the 7th of May, the Portuguese and English were defeated at Caya, by the Spaniards, under the command of the mareschal de Bay. The castle of Alicant, guarded by two English regiments, had been besieged, and held out during the whole winter. At length the Chevalier d'Asfeldt ordered the rock to be undermined, and having lodged two hundred barrels of gunpowder, gave Syburg, the governor to understand that two of his officers might come out and see the condition of the works. This offer being accepted, Asfeldt in person accompanied them to the mine: he told them he could not bear the thoughts of seeing so many brave men perish in the ruins of a place they had so gallantly defended; and allowed them four-and-twenty hours to consider on the resolution they should take. Syburg continued deaf to his remonstrances; and with an obstinacy that savoured more of stupidity than of valour, determined to stand the explosion. When the centinels that were posted on the side of the hill gave notice, by a preconcerted signal, that fire was set to the mine, the governor ordered the guard to retire, and walked out to the parade, accompanied by several officers. The mine being sprung, the rock opened under their feet, and they falling into the chasm, it instantly closed, and crushed them to death. Notwithstanding this dreadful incident, colonel d'Albon, who succeeded to the command, resolved to defend the place to the last extremity. Sir Edward Whitaker sailed from Barcelona to the relief of the place, but the enemy had erected such works as effectually hindered the troops from landing. Then general Stanhope, who commanded them, capitulated with the Spanish general for the garrison, which marched out with all the honours of war, and was transported to Minorca, where the men were put into quarters of refreshment. On the frontiers of Catalonia, general Staremberg maintained his ground, and even annoyed the enemy. He passed the Segra, and reduced Balaguer: having left a strong garrison in the place, he repassed the river, and sent his forces into winter quarters.

Although the events of this campaign were more favourable to Louis than he had reason to expect, yet he still continued desirous of peace, and once more resolved to solicit a conference. He employed Mr. Petkum, resident of the duke of Holstein at the Hague, to negociate upon this subject, and he ventured also to solicit the duke of Marlborough himself in private. However, as his affairs were now less desperate than they were in the beginning of the campaign, he would not adhere to those conditions which he then offered as preliminaries to a conference. The Dutch inveighed against his insincerity for thus retracting his former offers; not considering that he certainly had a right to retract those offers which they had formerly rejected. They still had reasons for protracting

(i) Considering the situation of the French, the number of their troops, and the manner in which they were fortified, nothing could be more rash and imprudent than the attack, which cost the lives of so many gallant men, and was attended with so little advantage to the conquerors. Perhaps the duke of Marlborough thought a victory was absolutely necessary to support his sinking interest at the court of Great Britain. His intention was to have given battle before the enemy had entrenched themselves; but prince Eugene insisted upon delaying the action until the reinforcement should arrive from Tournay. The extraordinary carnage is imputed to the impetuosity of the prince of Orange, whose aim, through this whole war, was to raise himself into consideration with the States-General, by signal acts of military prowess.

the war, and the duke took care to confirm them in this resolution. Nevertheless, the French king seeing the misery of his people daily increase, and all his resources fail, continued to humble himself before the allies; and by means of Petkum, who still corresponded from the Hague with his ministers, implored the Dutch that the negociation might be resumed. A conference was at length begun at Gertruydenburgh, under the influence of the duke of Marlborough, prince Eugene, and count Zinzendorff, who were all three, from private motives, entirely averse to the treaty. Upon this occasion the French ministers were subjected to every species of mortification. Spies were placed upon all their conduct. Their master was insulted, and their letters were opened. The Dutch deputies would hear of no relaxation, and no expedient for removing the difficulties that retarded the negociation. The French commissioners offered to satisfy every complaint that had given rise to the war. They consented to abandon Philip of Spain; they agreed to grant the Dutch a large barrier; they were even willing to grant a supply towards the dethroning of Philip; but all their offers were treated with contempt. The conferences lasted from the 19th of March till the 25th of July, 1710, and the French commissioners were at last compelled to return home, after having sent a letter to the states, in which they declared that the proposals made by their deputies were unjust and impracticable, and complained of the unworthy treatment they had received. Louis therefore resolved to hazard another campaign, in hope that some lucky incident in the event of war, or some happy change in the ministry of England, might procure him more favourable concessions.

But though the duke of Marlborough by this means protracted his power on the continent, all his influence at home was at an end. The members of the house of commons, that had been elected just after Sacheverel's trial, were almost universally Tories. From all parts of the kingdom addresses were sent and presented to the queen, confirming the doctrine of non-resistance; and the queen, in course, received them with pleasure. But when the conferences at Gertruydenburgh were ended, the designs of the Dutch and English commanders were too obvious not to be perceived. The writers of the Tory faction displayed the avarice of the duke, and the self-interested conduct of the Dutch. They pretended, that while England was exhausting her blood and treasure in foreign conquests for the benefit of other nations, she was sapping the foundations of her liberty at home. They asserted, that her ministers were not contented with sharing the plunder of an impoverished state, but by controlling their queen, were resolved to seize upon its liberties also.

A part of these complaints was undoubtedly true, and a part exaggerated; but the real crime of the ministry, in the queen's estimation, was their pride, their combinations, and their increasing power. The insolence of the duchess of Marlborough, who had hitherto possessed more power than the whole privy council united, was likewise now become insupportable to the queen, who had entirely withdrawn her confidence from her; and she was resolved to seize the first opportunity of shewing her resentment, and such an opportunity was not long wanting.

Upon the death of the earl of Essex, who was colonel of a regiment under the duke of Marlborough, the queen resolved to bestow it on a person whom she knew was very displeasing to him. She therefore sent him word, that she wished he would give it to Mr. Hill, brother to her favourite Mrs. Masham, as a person every way qualified for the command. The duke was struck with this request, which he considered as a previous step to his own disgrace. He represented to the queen the prejudice that would redound to the service from the promotion of so young an officer, and the jealousy that would arise in the breasts of his seniors, never considering that he himself was a younger officer than many of those which he commanded. He expostulated with her on this extraordinary mark of partiality in favour of Mrs. Masham's brother, who had treated him with such peculiar ingratitude. To all this the queen made no other reply, but that he would do well to consult his friends. He therefore retired in disgust, and sat down to prepare a letter to the queen, in which he begged leave to resign all his employments.

The queen, in the mean time, who was conscious of the popularity of her conduct, went to the council, where she seemed not to take the least notice of the duke's absence. The whole junto of his friends, which almost entirely composed the council, did not fail to alarm her with the consequences of disobliging so useful a servant. She therefore for some time dissembled her resentment, and even sent the duke a letter, empowering him to dispose of the regiment as he thought proper. Still, however, she was too sensibly mortified at many parts of his conduct not to wish for his removal; though for the present she thought proper to continue him in his command. But she acted with less duplicity towards the duchess, who supposing, from the queen's present condescension, that she was willing to be pacified, resolved once more to practise the long-forgotten arts by which she rose. She therefore demanded an audience of her majesty, on pretence of vindicating her character from some aspersions. She hoped to work upon the queen's tenderness, by tears, entreaties, and supplications; but all her humiliations served only to render her more contemptible. The queen heard her without exhibiting the least emotions of tenderness or pity. The only answer she gave to the duchess's entreaties, was a repetition of an insolent expression used in one of this lady's own letters to her: "You desired no answer, and you shall have none."

It was indeed by insensible degrees that the queen seemed now to acquire courage enough to second her inclinations, and depose a ministry which had long been disagreeable to her. Harley, however, who still shared her confidence, did not fail to inculcate the popularity, and the security of such a measure; and upon his advice she began the changes, by transferring the post of lord chamberlain from the duke of Kent to the duke of Shrewsbury, who had lately voted with the Tories, and maintained an intimate correspondence with Mr. Harley. Soon after, the earl of Sunderland, secretary of state, and son-in-law to the duke of Marlborough, was displaced, and the earl of Dartmouth put in his room. Finding that she was rather applauded than condemned for this resolute proceeding, the queen resolved to free herself from those who were become noxious to her.

In these resolutions her majesty was strengthened by the duke of Beaufort, who coming to court on this occasion, told her, he was extremely glad he could now salute her queen in reality. The whole Whig party were in consternation: they influenced the directors of the Bank, so far as to assure her majesty that public credit would be entirely ruined if this change in the ministry should take place. The emperor and the states general interposed in this domestic revolution, and, by their ministers at London, presented memorials, and even threats; but the queen assured them, that whatever changes might be made, the duke of Marlborough should be continued in his employments. In the month of August the earl of Godolphin was divested of his office, and the treasury put in commission, subjected to the direction of Harley, who was appointed chancellor of the exchequer, and under-treasurer. The earl of Rochester was declared president of the council in the room of lord Somers: the staff of the lord steward being taken from the duke of Devonshire, was given to the duke of Buckingham; and Mr. Boyle was removed from the secretary's office, to make way for Mr. Henry St. John. The lord chancellor having resigned the great seal, it was first put in commission, and afterwards given to sir Simon Harcourt. The earl of Wharton surrendered his commission of lord lieutenant of Ireland, which the queen conferred on the duke of Ormond. The earl of Orford withdrew himself from the board of admiralty; and Mr. George Grenville was appointed secretary of war, in the room of Mr. Robert Walpole. The command of the forces in Portugal was bestowed upon the earl of Portmore: the duke of Hamilton was appointed lord lieutenant of the County Palatine of Lancaster. In a word, there was not one Whig left in any office of state, except the duke of Marlborough, who would have renounced his command, had not he been earnestly dissuaded by his particular friends from taking such a step as might have been prejudicial to the interest of the nation.

But the triumph of the Tory party was not yet complete, until the parliament was brought to confirm and approve the measures of the queen. The new parliament met on the 25th of November, 1710, and Mr. Bromley was chosen speaker without opposition. The queen, in her speech, recommended the prosecution of the war with vigour, especially in Spain. She declared herself resolved to support the church of England; to preserve the British constitution according to the Union; to maintain the indulgence allowed by law to scrupulous consciences; and to employ none but such as were heartily attached to the protestant protestant succession in the House of Hanover. The parliament were ardent in their expressions of zeal and unanimity. They exhorted her to discountenance all such principles and measures as had so lately threatened the dignity of the crown. In the house of peers, the earl of Scarborough moved that the thanks of the house should be returned to the duke of Marlborough; but the duke of Argyle made some objections to the motion, and the general's friends, dreading the consequence of putting the question, postponed the consideration of this proposal until the duke should return from the continent. The earl of Peterborough was appointed ambassador extraordinary to the Imperial Court: the earl of Rivers was sent in the same quality to Hanover: Mr. Richard Hill was nominated envoy extraordinary to the United Provinces, as well as to the council of state appointed for the government of the Spanish Netherlands, in the room of lieutenant-general Cadogan. Meredith, Macartney, and Honeywood, were deprived of their regiments, because, in their cups, they had drank confusion to the enemies of the duke of Marlborough.

This nobleman arrived in England towards the latter end of December. He conferred about half an hour in private with the queen, and next morning assisted at a committee of the privy council. Her majesty gave him to understand, that he needed not to expect the thanks of the parliament as formerly: and told him she hoped he would live well with her ministers. He expressed no resentment at the alterations which had been made; but resolved to acquiesce in the queen's pleasure, and retain the command of the army on her own terms. On the 2nd of January, 1711, the queen sent a message to both houses, intimating that there had been an action in Spain to the disadvantage of king Charles: that the damage having fallen particularly on the English forces, she had given directions for sending and procuring troops to repair the loss, and hoped the parliament would approve her conduct. Both houses seized this opportunity of venting their spleen against the old ministry. The history of England is disgraced by the violent conduct of two turbulent factions, which, in their turn, engrossed the administration and legislative power. Marlborough, who but a few months before had been so highly extolled and caressed by the representatives of the people, was now become the object of parliamentary hatred and censure, though no sensible alteration had happened in his conduct or success. That hero, who had retrieved the glory of the British arms, won so many battles, subdued such a number of towns and districts, humbled the pride and checked the ambition of France, secured the liberty of Europe, and, as it were, chained victory to his chariot wheels, was, in a few weeks, dwindled into an object of contempt and derision. He was ridiculed in public libels, and reviled in private conversation. Instances were every where repeated of his fraud, avarice, and extortion; his insolence, cruelty, ambition, and misconduct: even his courage was called in question; and this consummate general was represented as the lowest of mankind. So unstable is the popularity of every character that fluctuates between two opposite tides of faction.

In their answer to the queen's message, the lords declared, that as the misfortune in Spain might have been occasioned by some preceding mismanagement, they would use their utmost endeavours to discover it, so as to prevent the like for the future. They set on foot an enquiry concerning the affairs of Spain; and the earl of Peterborough being examined before the committee, imputed all the miscarriages in the course of that war to the earl of Galway and general Stanhope. Notwithstanding the defence of Galway, which was clear and convincing, the house resolved, That the earl of Galway, lord Tyrawley, and general Stanhope, in advising an offensive war, had been the unhappy occasion of the battle at Almanza, the source of our misfortunes in Spain, and one great cause of the disappointment of the expedition to Toulon, concerted with her majesty. They voted, That the prosecution of an offensive war in Spain was approved and directed by the ministers, who were, therefore, justly blameable, as having contributed to all our misfortunes in Spain, and to the disappointment of the expedition against Toulon. The house, proceeding in the enquiry, passed another vote, importing, That the late ministry, had been negligent in managing the Spanish war, to the great prejudice of the nation. Finding that the Portuguese troops were posted on the right of the English at the battle of Almanza, they resolved, That the earl of Galway, in yielding this point, had acted contrary to the honour of the Imperial Crown of Great Britain. These resolutions they included in an address to the queen, who had been present during the debates, which were extremely violent; and to every separate vote was attached a severe protest. These were not the proceedings of candour and national justice, but the ebullitions of party zeal and rancorous animosity.

While the lords were employed in this enquiry, the commons examined certain abuses which had crept into the management of the navy; and some censures were passed upon certain persons concerned in contracts for victualling the seamen. The inhabitants of St. Olave's and other parishes presented a petition, complaining that a great number of Palatines, inhabiting one house, might produce among them a contagious distemper; and in time become a charge to the public, as they were destitute of all visible means of subsistence. Animated by the heat of this enquiry, they passed a bill to repeal the act for a general naturalization of all protestants: but this was rejected in the house of lords. Another bill was enacted into a law, importing, That no person should be deemed qualified for representing a county in parliament, unless he possessed an estate of six hundred pounds a-year; and restricting the qualification of burgess to half that sum. The design of this bill was to exclude trading people from the house of commons, and to lodge the legislative power with the land-holders. A third act passed, permitting the importation of French wines in neutral bottoms: a bill against which the Whigs loudly exclaimed, as a national evil, and a scandalous compliment to the enemy.

A violent party in the house of commons began to look upon Harley as a lukewarm Tory, because he would not enter into all their measures; they even began to suspect his principles, when his credit was re-established by a very singular accident. Guiscard, the French partizan, thought himself very ill rewarded for his services with a precarious pension of four hundred pounds, which he enjoyed from the queen's bounty. He had been renounced by St. John, the former companion of his pleasures: he had in vain endeavoured to obtain an audience of the queen, with a view to demand more considerable appointments. Harley was his enemy, and all access to her majesty was denied. Enraged at these disappointments, he attempted to make his peace with the court of France, and offered his services, in a letter to one Moreau, a banker in Paris. This packet, which he endeavoured to transmit by the way of Portugal, was intercepted, and a warrant issued out to apprehend him for high treason. When the messenger disarmed him in St. James's Park, he exhibited marks of guilty confusion and despair, and begged that he would kill him directly. Being conveyed to the Cockpit, in a sort of phrenzy, he perceived a penknife lying upon the table, and took it up without being perceived by the attendants. A committee of council was immediately summoned, and Guiscard brought before them to be examined. Finding that his correspondence with Moreau was discovered, he desired to speak in private with secretary St. John, whom, in all probability he had resolved to assassinate. His request being refused, he said, "Voilà qui est dur! pas un mot!" i.e. "That's hard! not one word!" St. John being out of his reach, he stepped up to Mr. Harley, and exclaiming, "J'en veux donc à toi!" i.e. "Have at thee then!" stabbed him in the breast with the penknife which he had concealed. The instrument broke upon the bone, without penetrating into the cavity: nevertheless, he repeated the blow with such force, that the chancellor of the exchequer fell to the ground. Secretary St. John, seeing him fall, cried out, "The villain has killed Mr. Harley!" and drew his sword. Several other members followed the example, and wounded Guiscard in several places. Yet he made a desperate defence, until he was overpowered by the messengers and servants, and conveyed from the council-chamber, which he had filled with terror, tumult, and confusion. His wounds, though dangerous, were not mortal: but he died of a gangrene occasioned by the bruises he had sustained. This attempt upon the life of Harley, by a person who wanted to establish a traitorous correspondence with France, extinguished the suspicions of those who began to doubt that minister's integrity. The two houses of parliament, in an address to the queen, declared their belief, that Mr. Harley's fidelity to her majesty, and zeal for her services, had drawn upon him the hatred of all the abettors, of popery and faction. They besought her majesty to take all possible care of her sacred person; and, for that purpose, to give directions for causing papists to be removed from the cities of London and Westminster. A proclamation was published, ordering the laws to be strictly put in execution against papists. When Harley appeared in the house of commons after his recovery, he was congratulated upon it by the speaker, in a florid and fulsome premeditated speech. An act was passed, decreeing, That an attempt upon the life of a privy counsellor should be felony without benefit of clergy. The earl of Rochester dying, Harley became sole minister, was created baron of Wigmore, and raised to the rank of earl, by the noble and ancient title of Oxford and Mortimer: to crown his prosperity, he was appointed lord treasurer, and vested with the supreme administration of affairs.

In the beginning of this year, 1711, the commons empowered certain persons to examine all the grants made by king William, and report the value of them, as well as the considerations upon which they were made. Upon their report a bill was formed, and passed that house; but the lords rejected it at the first reading. Their next step was to examine the public accounts, with a view to fix an imputation on the earl of Godolphin. They voted, that above five-and-thirty millions of the money granted by parliament remain unaccounted for. This sum, however, included some accounts in the reigns of king Charles and king William. One half of the whole was charged to Mr. Bridges, the paymaster, who had actually accounted for all the money he had received, except about three millions, though these accounts had not passed through the auditor's office. The commons afterwards proceeded to enquire into the debts of the navy, that exceeded five millions, which, with many other debts, were thrown into one stock, amounting to nine millions four hundred and seventy-one thousand, three hundred and twenty-five pounds. A fund was formed for paying an interest or annuity of six per cent. until the principal should be discharged; and with this was granted a monopoly of a projected trade to the South Sea, vested in the proprietors of the navy-bills, debentures, and other public securities, which were incorporated for this purpose. Such was the origin of the South-Sea Company, founded upon a chimerical supposition, that the English would be permitted to trade upon the coast of Peru. About this time the emperor Joseph died of the small-pox without male issue; so that his brother's immediate aim was to succeed him on the Imperial throne. This event was, on the 20th of April, communicated by a message from the queen to both houses. She told them, that the States general had concurred with her in a resolution to support the house of Austria; and that they had already taken such measures as would secure the election of Charles as head of the empire.

The house of commons, in order to demonstrate their attachment to the church, in consequence of an address from the lower house of convocation, and a quickening message from the queen, passed a bill for building fifty new churches in the suburbs of London and Westminster, and appropriated for this purpose the duty upon coals, which had been granted for the building of St. Paul's, now finished. This imposition was continued until it should raise the sum of three hundred and fifty thousand pounds. At the close of the session, the commons presented a remonstrance or representation to the queen, in which they told her, that they had not only raised the necessary supplies, but also discharged the heavy debts of which the nation had so long and justly complained. They said, that, in tracing the causes of this debt, they had discovered fraud, embezzlement, and misapplication of the public money: that they who of late years had the management of the treasury were guilty of a notorious breach of trust and injustice to the nation, in allowing above thirty millions to remain unaccounted for; a purposed omission that looked like a design to conceal embezzlements. They begged her majesty would give immediate directions for compelling the several imprest accountants speedily to pass their accounts. They expressed their hope, that such of the accountants as had neglected their duty in prosecuting their accounts, ought no longer to be entrusted with the public money. They affirmed, that from all these evil practices and worse designs of some persons, who had, by false professions of love to their country, insinuated themselves into her royal favour, irreparable mischief would have accrued to the public, had not her majesty, in her great wisdom, seasonably discovered the fatal tendency of such measures, and removed from the administration those who had so ill answered her majesty's favourable opinion, and in so many instances grossly abused the trust reposed in them. They observed, that her people could with greater patience have suffered the manifold injuries done to themselves, by the frauds and depredations of such evil ministers, had not the same men proceeded to treat her sacred person with undutifulness and disregard. This representation being circulated through the kingdom, produced the desired effect of inflaming the minds of the people against the late ministry. Such expedients were become necessary for the execution of Oxford's project, which was to put a speedy end to a war that had already subjected the people to grievous oppression, and even accumulated heavy burdens to be transmitted to their posterity. The nation was inspired by extravagant ideas of glory and conquest, even to a rage of war-making; so that the new ministers, in order to dispel those dangerous chimeras, were obliged to take measures for exciting their indignation and contempt against those persons whom they had formerly idolized as their heroes and patriots. On the 12th of June, 1711, the queen having given the royal assent to several public and private bills, made an affectionate speech to both houses. She thanked the commons in the warmest expressions, for having complied with all her desires; for having baffled the expectations of her enemies in finding supplies for the service of the ensuing year; in having granted greater sums than were ever given to any prince in one session: and in having settled funds for the payment of the public debts, so that the credit of the nation was restored. She expressed her earnest concern for the succession of the house of Hanover; and her fixed resolution to support and encourage the church of England as by law established. After which the parliament was prorogued.

Of the convocation which was assembled with the new parliament, the lower house chose Dr. Atterbury their proculator. He was an enterprizing ecclesiastic, of extensive learning, acute talents, violently attached to the Tory principles, and intimately connected with the prime minister, Oxford; so that he directed all the proceedings in the lower house of convocation, in concert with that minister. The queen, in a letter to the archbishop, signified her hope, that the consultations of the clergy might be of use to repress the attempts of loose and profane persons. She sent a licence under the broad seal, empowering them to sit and do business in as ample a manner as ever had been granted since the Reformation. They were ordered to lay before the queen an account of the excessive growth of infidelity and heresy, as well as of other abuses, that necessary measures might be taken for a reformation. The bishops were purposely slighted and overlooked, because they had lived in harmony with the late ministers. A committee being appointed to draw up a representation of the present state of the church and religion, Atterbury undertook the task, and composed a remonstrance that contained the most keen and severe strictures upon the administration, as it had been exercised since the time of the revolution. Another was penned by the bishops in more moderate terms: and several regulations were made, but in none of these did the two houses agree. They concurred, however, in censuring some tenets, favouring Arianism, broached and supported by Mr. Whiston, mathematical professor in Cambridge.

The new ministry had not yet determined to supersede the duke of Marlborough in the command of the army. This was a step which could not be taken without giving umbrage to the Dutch and other allies. He, therefore, set out for Holland, in the month of February, after the queen had assured him, that he might depend upon the punctual payment of the forces. Having conferred with the deputies of the states about the operations of the campaign, he, about the middle of April, assembled the army at Orchies, between Lisle and Douay; while mareschal de Villars drew together the French troops in the neighbourhood of Cambray and Arras. Villars had found means to assemble a very numerous army, with which he encamped behind the river Sanset, in such an advantageous post as could not be attacked with any prospect of success. Meanwhile the duke of Marlborough passed the Scarpe, and formed his camp between Douay and Bouchain, where he was joined by prince Eugene, on the 23rd of May. This general, however, did not long remain in the Netherlands. Understanding that detachments had been made made from the army of Villars to the Rhine, and that the elector of Bavaria intended to act in the empire, the prince, by order from the court of Vienna, marched towards the Upper Rhine with the Imperial and Palatine troops, to secure Germany. The duke of Marlborough repassing the Scarpe, encamped in the plains of Lens, from whence he advanced towards Aire, as if he intended to attack the French lines in that quarter. These lines beginning at Bouchain on the Schelde, were continued along the Sanset and the Scarpe to Arras, and thence along the Upper Scarpe to Canché. They were defended by redoubts, and other works, in such a manner, that Villars judged they were impregnable, and called them the Ne plus ultrà of Marlborough. But the duke, by an extraordinary effort, and marching thirty miles without halting, outwitted Villars, and, without the loss of one man, entered the lines which he had pronounced impregnable. This stroke of the English general was extolled as a master-piece of military skill, while Villars was exposed to the ridicule even of his own officers. The duke's intention was to besiege Bouchain; an enterprize that was deemed impracticable, inasmuch as the place was situated in a morass, strongly fortified, and defended by a numerous garrison, in the neighbourhood of an army superior in number to that of the allies. Notwithstanding these disadvantages, and the dissuasions of his own friends, he resolved to undertake the siege: and, in the mean time, dispatched brigadier Sutton to England, with an account of his having passed the French lines; which was not at all agreeable to his enemies. They had prognosticated that nothing would be done during this campaign, and began to insinuate that the duke could not effect any thing of importance without the assistance of prince Eugene. They now endeavoured to lessen the glory of his success; and even taxed him with having removed his camp from a convenient situation to a place where the troops were in danger of starving. Nothing could be more provoking than this scandalous malevolence to a great man who had done so much honour to his country, and was then actually exposing his life in her service.

On the 10th of August, Bouchain was invested, and the duke of Marlborough exerted himself to the utmost extent of his vigilance and capacity, well knowing the difficulties of the undertaking, and how much his reputation would depend upon his success. Villars had taken every precaution that his skill and experience could suggest, to baffle the endeavours of the English general. He had reinforced the garrison to the number of six thousand chosen men, commanded by officers of known courage and ability. He made some efforts to raise the siege; but they were rendered ineffectual by the consummate prudence and activity of the duke of Marlborough. Then he laid a scheme for surprizing Douay, which likewise miscarried. If we consider that the English general, in the execution of his plan, was obliged to form lines, erect regular forts, raise batteries, throw bridges over a river, make a causeway through a deep morass, provide for the security of convoys against a numerous army on one side, and the garrison of Condé and Valenciennes on the other, we must allow this was the boldest enterprize of the whole war: that it required all the fortitude, skill, and resolution of a great general, and all the valour and intrepidity of the confederate troops, who had scarcely ever exhibited such amazing proofs of courage upon any other occasion as they now displayed at the siege of Bouchain. In twenty days after the trenches were opened, the garrison were obliged to surrender themselves prisoners of war; and this conquest was the last military exploit performed by the duke of Marlborough: the breaches of Bouchain were no sooner repaired than the opposite armies began to separate, and the allied forces were quartered in the frontier towns, that they might be at hand to take the field early in the spring. They were now in possession of the Maese, almost as far as the Sambre; of the Scheldt from Tournay; and of the Lys as far as it is navigable. They had reduced Spanish Guelderland, Limburgh, Brabant, Flanders, and the greatest part of Hainault: they were masters of the Scarpe; and, by the conquest of Bouchain, they had opened to themselves a way into the very bowels of France. All these acquisitions were owing to the valour and conduct of the duke of Marlborough, who now returned to the Hague, and arrived in England about the middle of November.

The command of the forces in Spain was conferred by the queen upon the duke of Argyle, who was recalled from the service in Flanders for that purpose. He had long been at variance with the duke of Marlborough; a circumstance which recommended him the more strongly to the ministry. He landed at Barcelona on the 29th of May, and found the British troops in the utmost distress for want of subsistence. The treasurer had promised to supply him liberally; the commons had granted one million five hundred thousand pounds for that service. The duke of Argyle, however, waited in vain for the promised remittances, and was obliged to borrow money on his own credit, before the British troops could take the field. At length, Staremberg advanced towards the enemy, who attacked him at the pass of Prato del Rey, where they were repulsed with considerable loss. After this action the duke of Argyle was seized with a violent fever, and conveyed back to Barcelona. Vendome invested the castle of Cardona, which was vigorously defended till the end of December, when a detachment being sent to the relief of the place, defeated the besiegers, killed two thousand on the spot, and took all their artillery, ammunition, and baggage. Staremberg was unable to follow the blow: the duke of Argyle wrote pressing letters to the ministry, and loudly complained that he was altogether unsupported; but all his remonstrances were ineffectual: no remittances arrived; and he returned to England without having been able to attempt any thing of importance. In September, king Charles, leaving his queen at Barcelona, set sail for Italy, and at Milan had an interview with the duke of Savoy, where all disputes were compromised.

The ministry of England had conceived great expectations from an expedition against Quebec and Placentia, in North America, planned by colonel Nicholson, who had taken possession of Nova Scotia, and garrisoned Port Royal, to which he gave the name of Anapolis. He had brought four Indian chiefs to England, and represented the advantages that would redound to the nation, in point of commerce, should the French be expelled from North America. The ministers liked the proposal. A body of five thousand men was embarked in transports, under the command of brigadier Hill, brother to Mrs. Masham; and they sailed from Plymouth in the beginning of May, with a strong squadron of ships commanded by sir Hovenden Walker. At Boston in New England, they were joined by two regiments of provincials; and about four thousand men, consisting of American planters, Palatines, and Indians, rendezvoused at Albany, in order to march by land into Canada, while the fleet sailed up the river of that name. On the 21st of August, they were exposed to a violent storm, and driven among rocks, where eight transports perished, with about eight hundred men. The admiral immediately sailed back to Spanish River Bay, where it was determined, in a council of war, that as the fleet and forces were victualled for ten weeks only, and they could not depend upon a supply of provisions from New England, they should return home, without making any further attempt. Such was the issue of this paltry expedition, entrusted to the direction of an officer without talents and experience.

The commissioners for examining the public accounts, having discovered that the duke of Marlborough had received an annual present of five or six thousand pounds from the contractors of bread to the army, the queen declared in council, that she thought fit to dismiss him from all his employments, that the matter might be impartially examined. This declaration was imparted to him in a letter under her own hand, in which she took occasion to complain of the treatment she had received. She probably alluded to the insolence of his duchess; the subjection in which she had been kept by the late ministry; and the pains lately taken by the Whigs to depreciate her conduct, and thwart her measures with regard to the peace. The duke wrote an answer to her majesty, vindicating himself from the charge which had been brought against his character; and his two daughters, the countess of Sunderland and the lady Rialton, resigned their places of ladies of the bed-chamber.

Mr. Walpole had been very troublesome in the house of commons, by his talents, activity, and zealous attachment to the Whig interest, and the Tories found means to discover some clandestine practices in which he was concerned as secretary at war, with regard to the forage contract in Scotland. The contractors, rather than admit into their partnership a person whom he had recommended for that purpose, chose to present his friend with five hundred pounds. Their bill was addressed to Mr. Walpole, who endorsed it, and his friend received the money. This transaction was interpreted into a bribe. Mr. Walpole was voted guilty of corruption, imprisoned in the Tower, and expelled the house (k). Mr. Walpole had been the representative of the borough of Lynn Regis, and after his expulsion was chosen again by the electors of the same borough; a petition was therefore lodged against him, and the commons voted him incapable of being elected a member to serve in the present parliament.

The next attack of the house was upon the duke of Marlborough, who was found to have received a yearly sum from sir Solomon Medina, a Jew, concerned in the contract for furnishing the army with bread; to have been gratified by the queen with ten thousand pounds a-year to defray the expence of intelligence; and to have pocketed a deduction of two and a half per cent. from the pay of the foreign troops maintained by England. It was alledged, in his justification, that the present from the Jew was a customary perquisite, which had always been enjoyed by the general of the Dutch army: that the deduction of two and a half per cent. was granted to him by an express warrant from her majesty: that all the articles of the charge joined together did not exceed thirty thousand pounds, a sum much inferior to that which had been allowed to king William for contingencies; that the money was expended in procuring intelligence, which was so exact that the duke was never surprized; that none of his parties were ever intercepted or cut off: and that all his designs were by these means so well concerted, that he never once miscarried. Notwithstanding these representations, the majority voted that his practices had been unwarrantable and illegal; and that the deduction was to be accounted for as public money. These resolutions were communicated to the queen, who ordered the attorney-general to prosecute the duke for the money he had deducted by virtue of her own warrant. Such practices were certainly mean and mercenary, and greatly tarnished the glory which the duke had acquired by his military talents, and other shining qualities.

For some time before the dismission of the duke of Marlborough, a negociation for peace had been carried on between the court of France and the new ministry. They had a double motive in bringing this about: first, it would serve to mortify the Whigs; and, secondly, it would free their country from a ruinous and unnecessary war. The motives of every political measure, where faction enters, are partly good, and partly evil. The present ministers were, without doubt, actuated as well by hatred on the one hand, as impelled by a love of their country on the other. They hoped to obtain such advantages in point of commerce for the English as would silence all detraction. They were not so very mindful of the interests of the Dutch, as they knew that people to be but too attentive to those interests themselves. In order therefore to attain the end in view, the earl of Jersey, who acted in concert with Oxford, sent a private message to the court of France, importing the queen's earnest desire for peace, and her wish for a renewal of the conference. This intimation was delivered by one Gualtier, an obscure priest, who was chaplain to the Imperial ambassador, and a spy of the French court. The message was received with great pleasure by the French, and an answer was returned, ardently professing the same inclinations. This led the way to a reply, and soon after to a more definitive memorial from the court of France, which was immediately transmitted to the Dutch by the queen, for their approbation.

This memorial being perused by the states-general, they assured queen Anne that they were ready to join with her in contributing to the conclusion of a durable peace; but they expressed a desire that Louis would be more explicit in his offers towards settling the repose of Europe. That the Dutch might have some satisfaction in this particular, a conference between the French and English courts had previously taken place. Matthew Prior, much more famous as a poet than as a statesman, was sent with proposals to France; and Menager, a man of no great station, returned with Prior to London, with full powers to treat upon the preliminaries. At length, after long and intricate debates, preliminary articles were agreed upon, and signed by the English and French ministers, in consequence of a written order from the queen. The greater difficulty, however, remained, that of making the terms of peace agreeable to all the confederates. The earl of Stafford, who had been recalled from the Hague, where he had resided as ambassador, was sent back to Holland, with orders to communicate to the pensionary Heinsius, the preliminary proposals, to signify the queen's approbation of them, and to propose a place where the plenipotentiaries should assemble. They sent over an envoy to persuade the queen from her resolution; but finding their efforts fruitless, they fixed upon Utrecht as the place of general conference, and granted passports to the French ministers accordingly.

But the Dutch and the Germans made use of many stratagems to frustrate the negociations of this congress. The emperor wrote circular letters to the princes of the empire, exhorting them to persist in their former engagements. His ambassador at London procuring a copy of the preliminary articles, procured their insertion in a common newspaper, in order to throw blame upon the ministry, and render their proceedings odious to the people. The Dutch complained of perfidy, and laboured to raise a discontent in England against the measures then in speculation. The Whigs in London seconded their efforts with all the arts of clamour, ridicule, and reproach. Pamphlets, libels, and lampoons, were every day published by one faction, and the next were answered by the other. But the confederates took a step from which they hoped success by reason of the greatness of the agent whom they employed. Prince Eugene, who had been long famous for his talents in the cabinet as well as in the field, was sent over with a letter from the emperor to the queen; but his intrigues and his arts were unable to prevail: he found at court indeed a polite reception; but at the same time such a repulse as the private proposals he carried seemed to deserve. Still measures for the conference were going forward, and the English ministry were determined to bring them to a conclusion.

Many of the motives, however, which first incited each side to take up arms were now no more. Charles of Austria, for whose cause England had spent so much blood and treasure, was, by the death of his elder brother, the emperor Joseph, placed on the imperial throne. There was therefore every reason for not supporting his pretensions to the Spanish monarchy; and the same jealousy which invited him to that kingdom, was necessary to be exerted in keeping him out of it. The elector of Bavaria, who was intimately connected with the French, was now detached from them; and the Dutch, who had trembled for their barrier, were encroaching upon that of the enemy.

The conferences began at Utrecht, in January, 1712, under the conduct of Robinson, bishop of Bristol, lord privy seal, and the earl of Stafford, on the side of the English; of Buys and Vanderdussen, on the part of the Dutch; and of the mareschal D'Uxelles, the abbot (afterwards cardinal) de Polignac, and M. Menager, in behalf of France. The ministers of the emperor and Savoy assisted, and the other allies also sent plenipotentiaries, though with the greatest reluctance: so that they rather retarded than advanced the adjustment of a peace. The English ministry were sensible of the dangerous and difficult task they had to sustain; therefore they hastened the peace, and this haste relaxed the English ministers' severity, in insisting upon such terms and advantages as they had a right to demand. The allies, however, endeavoured to raise obstacles, and conference followed conference; but still the contending parties appeared as remote from each other as when they begun.

Upon the dismission of the duke of Marlborough, the duke of Ormond had been invested with the supreme command of the British forces; but with particular directions that he should not act upon the offensive, nor hazard an engagement. However he joined prince Eugene at Tournay, who not being acquainted with the secret, advised the attacking of Villars; but he soon found how affairs stood with his co-adjutor. Ormond himself seemed uneasy at his situation; and, in a letter to the secretary in England, desired permission to return home. This gave the confederates fresh ground of complaint; and, having a strong party in the English house of lords, the Dutch employed that engine to arraign the conduct of the ministry. Lord Halifax descanted on the ill consequences of the duke of Ormond's refusal to co-operate with prince Eugene, and moved for an address to her majesty to loose

(k) An animated speech was delivered on this occasion in the house of commons, censuring Mr. Walpole as guilty of the basest corruption; and sir Peter King asserted in the house, that his crime merited not only imprisonment and expulsion, but suspension on a gibbet, as an example to others vested with offices of public trust.

the hands of the English general. Earl Pawlet replied, that the duke of Ormond was not like a certain general who led his troops to the slaughter, in hopes that a great number of the officers might be knocked on the head, that he might increase his treasures by disposing of their commissions (l).

The loss of the British forces was soon severely felt in the allied army. Villars attacked a separate body of their troops, encamped at Denain, under the command of the earl of Albemarle. Their entrenchments were forced, and seventeen battalions either killed or taken. The earl himself and all the surviving officers were made prisoners. Five hundred waggons loaded with bread, twelve pieces of brass cannon, a large quantity of ammunition and provisions, a great number of horses, and a considerable booty fell into the hands of the enemy: this advantage they gained in sight of prince Eugene, who advanced on the other side of the Scheldt to sustain Albemarle; but the bridge over that river was broke down by accident; so that he was prevented from lending the least assistance. Villars immediately invested Marchiennes, where the principal stores of the allies were lodged. The place was surrendered on the last day of July; and the garrison, consisting of five thousand men, were conducted prisoners to Valenciennes. He afterwards undertook the siege of Douay; an enterprize, in consequence of which prince Eugene abandoned his design on Landrecy, and marched towards the French, in order to hazard an engagement. The states, however, would not run the risque; and the prince had the mortification to see Douay reduced by the enemy. He could not even prevent their retaking Quesnoy and Bouchain, of which places they were in possession before the tenth of October. The allies enjoyed no other compensation for their great losses, but the conquest of fort Knocque, which was surprized by one of their partizans. These successes of Villars served to hasten the treaty of Utrecht. The great obstacle which retarded that peace which England and France seemed so ardently to desire, was the settling the succession to the kingdoms of France and Spain. The danger that threatened the interests of Europe was, lest both kingdoms should be united under one sovereign; and Philip, who was now king of Spain, stood next in succession to the throne of France, except with the interposition of one child, (afterwards Louis XV.) who was then sickly. Philip, however, after various expedients, at last resolved to wave his pretension to the French monarchy, and the treaty went forward with rapidity and success. In the beginning of August, 1712, secretary St. John, now created viscount Bolingbroke, was sent to the court of Versailles to remove all obstructions to a separate treaty between France and England. He was accompanied by Mr. Prior and the abbé Gualtier, and treated with the most distinguished marks of respect. He was caressed by the French king and the marquis de Torcy, with whom he adjusted the principal interests of the duke of Savoy, and the elector of Bavaria. This negociation being finished in a few days, Bolingbroke returned to England, and Prior remained as resident at the court of France.

The campaign being at an end in the Netherlands, the duke of Ormond returned to England, where the party disputes were become more violent than ever. The Whigs affected to celebrate the anniversary of the late king's birthday, in London, with extraordinary rejoicings. Mobs were hired by both factions; and the whole city was filled with riot and uproar. A ridiculous scheme was contrived to frighten the lord treasurer with some squibs in a band-box, which the ministers magnified into a conspiracy. The duke of Hamilton having been appointed ambassador-extraordinary to the court of France, the Whigs were alarmed on the supposition that this nobleman favoured the pretender. Some dispute arising between the duke and lord Mohun, on the subject of a law-suit, furnished a pretence for a quarrel. Mohun, who had been twice tried for murder, and was counted a mean tool, as well as the hector of the Whig party, sent a message by general Macartney to the duke, challenging him to single combat. The principals met by appointment in Hyde Park, attended by Macartney and colonel Hamilton. They fought with such fury, that Mohun was killed upon the spot, and the duke expired before he could be conveyed to his own house. Macartney disappeared, and escaped in disguise to the continent. Colonel Hamilton declared upon oath before the privy-council, that when the principals engaged, he and Macartney followed their example; that Macartney was immediately disarmed; but the colonel seeing the duke fall upon his antagonist, threw away the swords, and ran to lift him up: that while he was employed in raising the duke, Macartney, having taken up one of the swords, stabbed his grace over Hamilton's shoulder, and retired immediately. A proclamation was issued, promising a reward of five hundred pounds to those who should apprehend or discover Macartney; and the duchess of Hamilton offered three hundred pounds for the same purpose. The Tories exclaimed against this event as a party-duel: they treated Macartney as a cowardly assassin; and affirmed that the Whigs had posted others of the same stamp all round Hyde Park, to murder the duke of Hamilton, in case he had triumphed over his antagonist, and escaped the treachery of Macartney. The Whigs, on the other hand, affirmed, that it was altogether a private quarrel: that Macartney was entirely innocent of the perfidy laid to his charge: that he afterwards submitted to a fair trial, at which colonel Hamilton prevaricated in giving his evidence, and was contradicted by the testimony of divers persons who saw the combat at a distance. The duke of Marlborough, hearing himself accused as the author of those party mischiefs, and seeing his enemies grow every day more and more implacable, thought proper to retire to the continent, where he was followed by his duchess; and his retreat was compared by his party to that of Scipio from Rome, after he had saved his country. His friend Godolphin had died in September, with the general character of an able, cool, dispassionate minister, who had rendered himself necessary to four successive sovereigns, and managed the finances with equal skill and integrity. The duke of Shrewsbury was nominated ambassador to France, in the room of the duke of Hamilton: the duke d'Aumont arrived at London in the same quality from the court of Versailles; and about the same time the queen granted an audience to the marquis de Monteleone, whom Philip had appointed one of his plenipotentiaries at the congress.

At length, the treaties of peace and commerce between England and France being agreed on by the plenipotentiaries on both sides, and ratified by the queen, she acquainted the parliament with the steps she had taken. She informed them of her precautions to secure them the succession of a Protestant king; and desired them to consider by her actions whether she ever meant to divide her interests from the house of Hanover. She left it to the commons to determine what forces, and what supplies might be necessary for the safety of the kingdom. "Make yourselves safe, said she, and I shall be satisfied. The affection of my people, and the providence of Heaven, are the only guards I ask for my protection." Both houses returned warm addresses; and the ratifications of the treaty being exchanged, peace was proclaimed on the 5th of May, 1713, to the inexpressible joy of the greater part of the nation (m). It should be observed, that the chevalier

(l) The duke of Marlborough, who was present, was so deeply affected at this malicious insinuation, that he sent the earl a challenge the next day; but the nature of the message being made known to the queen, the duke was ordered to proceed no farther in the quarrel.

(m) The articles of this famous treaty were longer canvassed, and more warmly debated, than those of any other treaty we read of in history. The number of different interests concerned, and the great enmity and jealousy which subsisted between the parties, made it impossible that all could be satisfied: and indeed there seemed no other method of obtaining peace, but that which was taken, namely, for the two principal powers concerned to make their own articles, and to leave the rest for a subject of future discussion.

By the treaty of peace the French king obliged himself to abandon the pretender, and acknowledge the queen's title and the Protestant succession; to raze the fortifications of Dunkirk within a limited time, on condition of receiving an equivalent; to cede Newfoundland, Hudson's Bay, and St. Christopher's to England; but the French were left in possession of Cape Breton, and at liberty to dry their fish at Newfoundland. By the treaty of commerce a free-trade was established, according to the tariff of the year one thousand six hundred and sixty-four, except in some commodities that were subjected to new regulations in the year sixteen hundred and ninety-nine. It was agreed, that no other duties should be imposed on the productions of France imported into England, than those that were laid on the same commodities from other countries; and that commissaries should meet at London, to adjust all matters relating to commerce; as for the tariff with Spain, it was not yet finished. It was stipulated, that the emperor should possess the kingdom of Naples, the duchy of Milan, and the Spanish Netherlands: that the duke of Savoy should enjoy Sicily, with the title of king: that the same title, with the island of Sardinia, should be allotted to the elector of Bavaria, as indemnification for his losses: that the states-general should restore Lisle and its dependencies: that Namur, Charleroi, Luxembourg, Ypres, and lier de St. George, (the pretender,) about this period conveyed a printed remonstrance to the minister at Utrecht, solemnly protesting against all that might be stipulated to his prejudice.

The Dutch and the Imperialists, after complaining of the desertion of their allies, resolved to hold out for some time: but they soon after concluded a peace; the former by the barrier treaty, and the latter by the treaty of Rastadt, in which their several interests were ascertained, and the treaty of Utrecht confirmed.

The English being now freed from their foreign enemies, had full leisure to indulge their domestic dissensions. The two parties never contended with greater animosity, nor greater injustice, against each other. No merit could be allowed in those of the opposite faction, and no knavery could be seen in their own. Whether it were at this time the wish of ministers to alter the succession of the crown from the house of Hanover to the pretender, cannot now be clearly made out; but true it is, that the Whigs believed it as certain, and the Tories but faintly denied the charge. The suspicions of that party became every day stronger, particularly when they saw a total removal of the Whigs from all places of trust and confidence throughout the kingdom, and their employments bestowed on professed Tories, supposed to be maintainers of an unbroken hereditary succession. The Whigs were all in commotion, either apprehending, or affecting to apprehend, a design in favour of the pretender; nay their reports went so far as to assert that he was actually concealed in London, and that he had held several conferences with the ministers of state.

Be this as it may, the chiefs of the Whig faction held secret conferences with baron Schutz, resident from the court of Hanover. They communicated their fears and apprehensions to the elector, who, before he arrived in England, or considered the spirit of parties, was thoroughly prejudiced against the Tories. In return, they received his instructions, and were taught to expect his favour in case of his succession. The house of lords seemed to share in the general apprehension. The queen was addressed to know what steps had been taken for removing the pretender from the dominions of the duke of Lorrain. They requested her to give them a list of such persons as having been once attainted for their political misconduct, had obtained licences to return into Great Britain since the Revolution. Mr. Steele, afterwards known as the celebrated sir Richard Steele, was not a little active in raising and spreading these reports. In a pamphlet written by him, called "The Crisis," he vehemently exclaimed against the ministry, and the immediate danger of their bringing in the pretender. The house of commons considered this performance as a scandalous and seditious libel; and Steele was expelled the house of which he was a member.

But while the Whigs were attacking the ministers from without, these were in much greater danger from their own internal dissensions. Harley was created lord Oxford, and St. John viscount Bolingbroke. Though they had started with the same principles and designs, yet having vanquished other opposers, they now began to turn their strength against each other. Never were two tempers worse matched to carry on business together. Oxford, cautious, slow, diffident, and reserved; Bolingbroke, hot, eager, impetuous, and proud; the first of great erudition, the latter of great natural capacity; the first obstinate in command, the other reluctant to obey; the first bent on maintaining that rank in the administration which he had obtained upon the dissolution of the last ministry; the other disdaining to act as a subaltern to a man whom he thought himself able to instruct. Both therefore began to form separate interests, and to adopt different principles. Oxford's plan was the more moderate, Bolingbroke's the more vigorous, but the less secure. Oxford, it is thought, was entirely for the Hanover succession; Bolingbroke had some hopes of bringing in the pretender. But though they hated each other cordially, yet they were for a while kept together by the good offices of their friends and adherents, who had the melancholy prospect of seeing the citadel of their hopes, while openly besieged from without, secretly undermining within.

This was a mortifying prospect to the Tories; but it was more particularly displeasing to the queen, who daily saw her favourite ministry declining, while her own health kept pace with their contentions. Her constitution was now quite broken. One fit of sickness succeeded another; and what completed the ruin of her health was the anxiety of her mind. The council chamber was for some time turned into a scene of obstinate dispute, and bitter altercation. Even in the queen's presence the treasurer and secretary did not abstain from mutual obloquy and reproach. As Oxford foresaw that the Whig ministry would force themselves in, he was for moderate measures. Bolingbroke, on the contrary, was for setting the Whigs at defiance, and flattered the queen, by giving way to all her favourite attachments. At length, their animosities coming to a height, Oxford wrote a letter to the queen, containing a detail of public transactions, in the course of which he endeavoured to justify his own conduct, and expose the turbulent and ambitious spirit of his rival. On the other hand, Bolingbroke charged the treasurer with having invited the duke of Marlborough to return from his voluntary exile, and of maintaining a private correspondence with the house of Hanover. In consequence of this, and the intrigues of lady Masham, who now seconded the aims of Bolingbroke, Oxford was removed from his employments, and his rival seemed to triumph in his new victory.

While these dissensions took place in England the princess Sophia died, in the eighty-fourth year of her age; and her death was intimated to the queen by baron Bothmar, who arrived in England with the character of envoy extraordinary from the elector of Hanover. This princess was the fourth and youngest daughter of Frederic, elector Palatine, king of Bohemia, and Elizabeth, daughter of king James I. of England. She enjoyed from nature an excellent capacity, which was finely cultivated: and was, in all respects, one of the most accomplished princesses of the age in which she lived. At her death the court of England appeared in mourning; and the elector of Brunswic was prayed for by name in the liturgy of the church of England.

The paltry triumph, however, of Bolingbroke was but of short duration. For a while he seemed to enjoy the confusion he had made; and the whole state being driven into disorder by the suddenness of the treasurer's fall, he sat secure, considering that he must be called upon to remedy every inconvenience. But the queen's declining state of health soon began to give him a dreadful prospect of his own situation, and the triumph of his enemies. As no plan had been adopted for supplying the vacancy of treasurer, the queen was perplexed and harrassed with the choice, and she had no longer strength left to support the fatigue. It had such an effect upon her spirits and constitution, that she declared she could not outlive it, and immediately sunk into a state of lethargic insensibility. Notwithstanding all the medicines that the physicians could prescribe, the distemper gained ground so fast, that the day after they despaired of her life, and the privy council was assembled on the occasion, July 30, 1714. The dukes of Somerset and Argyle being informed of the desperate state in which she lay, entered the council chamber without being summoned, not a little to the surprize of the Tory members, who did not expect their appearance. The duke of Shrewsbury thanked them for their readiness to give their assistance at such a critical juncture, and desired them to take their places. The physicians having declared that the queen was still in her senses, the council unanimously agreed that the duke of Shrewsbury was the fittest person to be appointed to the vacant office of treasurer. Thus Bolingbroke's ambition was defeated just at the moment when he thought himself secure.

All the members of the privy council, without distinction, being now summoned from the different parts of the kingdom, began to provide for the security of the constitution. They sent a letter to the elector of Hanover, informing him of the queen's dangerous situation, and desiring him to repair to Holland, where he would be attended by a British squadron to convey him to England. At the same time they dispatched instructions to the earl of Stafford at the Hague, to desire the states-general to be ready to perform the guaranty of the protestant succession. Precautions were taken to secure the sea-ports; and the command of the fleet was bestowed upon the earl of Berkeley, a professed Whig. These measures, which and Nieuport, should be added to the other places they already possessed in Flanders: and, that the king of Prussia should have Upper-Gueldre, in lieu of Orange and other estates belonging to Franch-Comté. The king of Portugal was satisfied; and the first day of June was fixed as the period of time, granted to the emperor for consideration.

were all dictated by that party, answered a double end. It argued their own alacrity, in the cause of their new sovereign, and seemed to imply a danger to the state from the disaffection of the opposite interest.

The queen, however, seemed to be somewhat relieved by medicines, arose from her bed, and walked a little. After some time, casting her eyes on a clock that stood in her chamber, she continued to gaze at it for some minutes. One of the ladies in waiting asked her what she saw there more than usual; to which the queen only answered, by turning her eyes upon her with a dying look. Soon after she was seized with a fit of the apoplexy, from which she was somewhat recovered by Dr. Mead; but she continued all night in a state of stupefaction. She gave some signs of life the following morning; but expired on the first of August, 1714, in the fiftieth year of her age. She reigned more than twelve years over a people now risen to the highest pitch of refinement; that had attained by their wisdom all the advantages of opulence, and by their valour all the happiness of security and conquest. Thus, by the death of Anne, ended the reign of the Stuarts; a family whose misfortunes and misconducts are not to be paralleled in history; a family, who, less than men themselves, seemed to expect from their followers more than manhood in their defence.

Anne Stuart, queen of Great Britain, was, in her person, of the middle size, well proportioned. Her hair was of a dark brown colour, her complexion ruddy, her features were regular, her countenance was rather round than oval, and her aspect more comely than majestic. Her voice was clear and melodious, and her presence engaging. Her capacity was naturally good, but not much cultivated by learning; nor did she exhibit any marks of extraordinary genius. She was certainly deficient in that vigour of mind by which a prince ought to preserve his independence, and avoid the snares and fetters of sycophants and favourites; but whatever her weakness in this particular might have been, the virtues of her heart were never called in question. She was a pattern of conjugal affection and fidelity: a tender mother, a warm friend, an indulgent mistress, a munificent patron, a mild and merciful prince, during whose reign no subject's blood was shed for treason. She was zealously attached to the church of England from conviction, rather than from prepossession, unaffectedly pious, just, charitable, and compassionate. She felt a mother's fondness for her people, by whom she was universally beloved with a warmth of affection, which even the prejudice of party could not abate. She had less vivacity and animation than her sister, and less activity and fortitude. She was dull and indolent in her disposition; was extremely timid and irresolute; and easily resigned herself to the influence and direction of others. She was, however, jealous of her prerogative, and willing to exact from her attendants a punctilious respect of her station. In the disputes of party she leaned strongly to the Tories; for she had been taught to believe, that their adversaries, the Whigs, were very unfriendly to the rights of monarchy and the principles of the national church.

CHAP. II.

Affairs of the Church, from the Revolution to the Death of Queen Anne.

ON the abdication of James the Second, in 1689, and the elevation of William the Third to the throne, the zealous friends of the church of England were fearful that the Calvinistic principles of the new king would render him partial to the presbyterians, who were the most numerous class of dissenters. They prepared to resist his supposed views; and when they were apprized of three schemes which he resolved to submit to parliamentary discussion, (for a toleration, a comprehension, and the removal of the test,) they propagated the alarm of danger with such success, that he succeeded only in one of his aims. The bill of toleration originated in the house of lords, being introduced by the earl of Nottingham. Though disapproved by the rigid churchmen, it was supported by the generality of the members of both houses; and a proposition for making it temporary, that the renewal of it might depend on the good behaviour of the non-conformists, did not meet with assent. Besides allowing the open frequenting of places of worship, suited to different persuasions, to such as should take the oaths to the new government, or (if quakers) should make a correspondent affirmation, this act exempted dissenting ministers from the obligation of acting as jurors, and the burthen of parochial offices; and permitted dissenters in general to execute those employments by deputies. All sects who denied the doctrine of the Trinity, as well as all Roman catholics, were precluded from the benefit of the statute; but from the increasing liberality of the times, even these sectaries felt the effects of that indulgence from which the strictness of the law would have debarred them.

The scheme for a comprehension was strongly opposed; nor was it supported with due spirit by those who professed their approbation of it. The high church zealots were unwilling to give up any points of doctrine or discipline for the purpose of introducing their old enemies within the pale of general communion; and many of the more moderate episcopalians were inclined to question the policy as well as the efficacy of the proposed union, which, they thought, would never form a cordial or compleat coalition. But others recommended it as a necessary act of humanity and Christian charity to relax the rigour of particular ordinances, in behalf of persons whose scruples of conscience entitled them to indulgence, and who did not differ so widely from the churchmen, as to be unworthy of a participation of the emoluments of the hierarchy. The chief debates in the progress of the bill through the upper house, related to a clause for dispensing with the act of kneeling at the reception of the sacrament; and to a motion for admitting the laity into a commission of ecclesiastical reform. The former question was carried in favour of the dissenters; while the other was decided in prejudice of the laity (n). The commons were less friendly to the bill than the peers; and, when it entered their house, it was exposed to contemptuous neglect, and became abortive.

To the bill for instituting new oaths of allegiance and supremacy, the addition of a clause was proposed by some of the ministerial peers, for the repeal of that part of the test act which imposed the sacrament on all candidates for offices; but it was eagerly discouraged by the majority of the house, and exploded without a division. A similar attempt was made, without success, by the offer of a clause, providing, that the reception of the sacrament, according to the forms of any protestant congregation, within a year previous or subsequent to the entrance upon any employment, should be a sufficient qualification for such office, notwithstanding the injunctions of the test act.

In the discussion of the same bill, debates arose with regard to the expediency of compelling the ministers of the church to take the oaths to William and Mary. After some dispute between the lords and commons, it was resolved, that the clerical non-jurors should not be exempt from the punishment of deprivation. Though the ecclesiastics of the establishment had opposed the arbitrary measures of James the Second, they were not inclined to an absolute renunciation of their former opinions of the indefeasible rights of monarchy and the strict rules of hereditary succession; and were therefore unwilling to sanction, by their solemn assent, a breach of those principles which they deemed sacred: but, to prevent their ejection from their benefices, they silenced the scruples of their consciences by various excuses, particularly by the allegation of the expediency of a temporary submission to an actual king, whose resentment they would otherwise excite, while they secretly retained their allegiance to the rightful sovereign whom he had supplanted, and whom they were ready to serve whenever an opportunity should present itself. Hence it happened, that a small number only of the clergy declined the oaths. Of the refusal of several of the prelates to comply with the act, we have already treated in the civil history.

At the desire of the commons, William summoned a convocation;

(n) It is remarkable, that the two divisions were respectively attended with an equality of votes; in which case, by the practice of the house of lords, a negative decision of the immediate question takes place. A committee having rejected the clause of dispensation, the question was, whether the house should agree to the omission of it: the negative to that point was therefore favourable to the clause. The motion concerning the laity being put in its original form, the equality of suffrages proved adverse to it.

convocation; but this meeting did not take place before the business of the comprehension had been discussed by commissioners whom he selected from the higher stations of the church, and whom he authorized to consider of such ecclesiastical alterations as seemed requisite. After frequent meetings of the delegates, such concessions were made to the dissenters as would probably have induced the majority of them to unite with the church. The convocation having met, a contest ensued for the office of prolocutor of the lower house, on the 21st of November, 1689. Dr. John Tillotson was proposed by the moderate members of the assembly; but the zealots, who were much more numerous, recommended Dr. Jane, who was therefore chosen speaker. William was so disgusted at the non-compliance of the clergy in this assembly with his wishes, that he resolved to follow the example of Charles the Second, in prohibiting the convocation from acting. He therefore regularly summoned that body with the parliament, but took care to preclude all business by repeated prorogations.

The deprivation of archbishop Sancroft and his nonjuring brethren occasioned a great clamour among the bigoted ecclesiastics, who condemned this treatment of the heads of the church as severe and unjust, and affirmed that the parliament had encroached on the power of the church by such jurisdiction. They therefore represented Tillotson (whom the king had promoted to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury) as the usurper of a see which belonged to another; and, by affecting to consider all the deprived dignitaries as being still entitled to their preferments, endeavoured to establish a new schism.

On the decease of Dr. Tillotson in 1694, after a short enjoyment of his metropolitan dignity, Dr. Thomas Tenison, bishop of Lincoln, was advanced to the vacant see. He, like his predecessor, was attached to the principles of the Whigs. He had distinguished himself by an able and faithful discharge of the clerical duties; and in his new dignity he did not degenerate from his former fame.

The new primate, soon after his elevation, persuaded the king to issue injunctions for the strict observance of every branch of ecclesiastical discipline; and, in 1695, when the extraordinary prevalence of the Arian and Socinian doctrines alarmed the orthodox divines, he not only encouraged the Trinitarians, but procured fresh directions from the crown, which were published in every diocese in 1696. The defenders of the church, in the treatises which they sent into the world, did not entirely agree in their sentiments concerning this abstruse point; some explaining it one way, and others another. To check these disputes among the churchmen, and to guard against the attacks of the enemies of the Trinity, William directed, that no preacher or writer should deliver any other doctrine on this head, but what was agreeable to the Scriptures, the three creeds, and the articles; and that it should be explained in the ordinary way, without the introduction of new terms: and the prelates were ordered to exert their authority against the mischievous views of those who controverted or denied the Trinitarian system.

Under the spiritual government of Tenison, a process was instituted against Watson, bishop of St. David's, whose delinquency disgraced the order to which he belonged. The primate, assisted by some of his brethren, sat in judgement on this occasion in 1699. It appeared, that the accused prelate had been guilty of corrupt and simoniacal practices, of fraud and extortion, and of solemn attestations of falsehood; and for these offences he was deprived of his see. He appealed from this sentence to a court of delegates; but they confirmed the former decision. Complaint was made, in the house of lords, of the illegality of the process; and it was asserted, that the jurisdiction of the archbishop was incompetent to such a trial, as the cognizance of the cause belonged to a regular synod of the bishops of the province. Though better authority was produced on the other side, the vacatiey occasioned by the deprivation was not filled before the court of exchequer had decided that the delinquent had no right to the temporalities of the see.

The king being importuned by the Tory leaders in 1701 to suffer the convocation to sit, that assembly was opened with the usual forms. Hooper, dean of Canterbury was chosen prolocutor. He was inclined to support the zealous party. As some of the members quickly exercised their elocution to the prejudice of the moderate clergy, the primate ordered a short prorogation: but the lower house continued to sit and debate, and then adjourned. Some time after the two houses proceeded to the examination of heretical tenets advanced by the writers of the times; and having censured some of the opinions of Toland, they requested the concurrence of the prelates in their resolutions: but the latter replied, that they did not consider the convocation as competent to the pronunciation of a judicial censure in this case without a licence from the king; and that the bishop of the diocese in which that author resided was lawfully empowered to proceed against him. The two houses of convocation, however, continued to dispute with vehemence, till they were prorogued by the king's writ. When the convocation was again permitted to sit, in 1702, their contentions were renewed with augmented spirit, till the death of the king, and then a new difference of opinion arose, which, like the former, occasioned violent disputes.

Towards the close of William's reign, the solicitations of the primate procured a charter, which established a society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. Several associations had taken place in this reign for the encouragement of religion and virtue. The members of these associations had employed themselves in promoting the enforcement of the laws against profane, vicious, and profligate individuals, and in collecting contributions for lectures and daily prayers in the churches, for the education of the children of the poor, and other laudable purposes. A more regular society (which still subsists) had been formed, in 1699, for the extension of Christian knowledge, by the distribution of religious publications among the inferior ranks of the community. These institutions led to others of a similar kind; and the consideration of the low state of religion in the Trans-Atlantic colonies induced several divines, particularly Blair (o), Bray, and Stanley, to recommend the erection of that society for which the above-mentioned charter, dated June 16, 1701, was granted. Many of the clergy and laity subscribed liberally towards the execution of the intentions of this corporation, which extended not only to the instruction of the descendants of the European colonists, but to the conversion of the savages and negroes.

During the reign of queen Anne, the disputes between the two houses of convocation were continually renewed, to the disgrace of the church party, and which in time rendered the dissenters from the established church exceedingly numerous. Amidst the disputes which agitated the convocation, the Anti-Trinitarian notions of Whiston came under consideration. The bishops, being doubtful of the power of the assembly to proceed against a heretic in the first instance, desired the opinion of the judges, of whom the major part asserted the competency of the convocation in this respect. Having still some doubts, the prelates would only censure the objectionable doctrines which Whiston had propagated, and the lower house followed their example.

In the subsequent meetings of the clergy, till the death of the queen, nothing memorable occurred. Want of unanimity still prevailed; and a warmth of zeal still influenced a great proportion of the clerical representatives; but it did not so strongly display itself as on some former occasions.

BOOK XII.

THE HOUSE OF HANOVER.

GEORGE THE FIRST.

THE inclinations of Anne for the promotion of her brother's claim to the throne of Great Britain had not been disclosed, and if they had been made known, would not have met with the concurrence of the majority of her ministers, still less with the acquiescence of the generality of the people; so that the parliamentary pretensions of George Lewis (p), elector of Hanover, were carried into immediate effect. The queen had no sooner resigned her breath, than the privy council met, and three instruments were produced, by which the elector appointed several of his adherents to be added as lords justices to the seven great officers of the kingdom. Orders were immediately issued for proclaiming George king of England, Scotland, and Ireland. The regency appointed the earl of Dorset to carry to Hanover the intimation of his majesty's accession to the crown, and to attend him in his journey to England. They sent the general officers, in whom they could confide, to their respective posts: they reinforced the garrison of Portsmouth; and they appointed the celebrated Mr. Addison secretary of state. To mortify the late ministry, lord Bolingbroke was obliged to wait every morning in the passage, among the servants, with his bag of papers, where there were persons purposely placed to insult and deride him. No tumult or sign of popular discontent appeared on the accession of the new monarch; so that the unprejudiced part of the nation were persuaded that no design had been concerted by queen Anne and her ministry in favour of the pretender. The mayor of Oxford indeed received a letter, requiring him to proclaim the pretender; but this being communicated to the vice-chancellor, a copy of it was immediately transmitted to Mr. secretary Bromley, member of parliament for the university; and the vice-chancellor offered a reward of one hundred pounds to any person who should discover the author. It was supposed to be either the production of some mad-headed partizan, or a weak contrivance to fix an odium on that venerable body.

The parliament having assembled, pursuant to the act which regulated the succession, the lord chancellor, on the 1st of August, made a speech to both houses in the name of the regency. He told them, that the privy council, appointed by the elector of Brunswick, had proclaimed that prince, under the name of king George, as the lawful and rightful sovereign of these kingdoms; and that they had taken the necessary care to maintain the public peace. He observed, that the several branches of the public revenue were expired by the demise of her late majesty; and recommended to the commons the making such provision, in that respect, as might be requisite to support the honour and dignity of the crown. He likewise expressed his hope, that they would not be wanting in any thing that might conduce to the establishing and advancing of the public credit. Both houses immediately agreed to addresses, containing the warmest expressions of duty and affection to their new sovereign, who did not fail to return such answers as were very agreeable to the parliament of Great Britain. In the mean time the lower house proposed and passed a bill, granting to his majesty the same civil list which the queen had enjoyed; with additional clauses for the payment of arrears due to the troops of Hanover, which had been in the service of Great Britain; and for a reward of one hundred thousand pounds, to be paid by the treasury to any person who should apprehend the pretender in landing, or attempting to land, in any part of the British dominions. Mr. Craggs, who had been dispatched to Hanover before the queen died, returning on the 13th of August, with letters from the king to the regency, they went to the house of peers: then the chancellor, in another speech to both houses, intimated his majesty's great satisfaction in the loyalty and affection which his people had universally expressed at his accession. Other addresses were voted on this occasion. The commons finished the bill for the civil list, and one for making some alterations in an act for a state lottery, which received the royal assent from the lords justices. The parliament was then prorogued.

Mr. Prior having notified the queen's death to the court of Versailles, Louis declared that he would inviolably maintain the treaty of peace concluded at Utrecht, particularly with relation to the settlement of the British crown in the house of Hanover. The earl of Strafford signified the same event to the states of Holland; and the resident of Hanover presented them with a letter, in which his master claimed the performance of their guarantee; they resolved to perform their engagements, and congratulated his electoral highness on his accession to the throne of Great Britain. They invited him to pass through their dominions, and assured him that his interests were as dear to them as their own. The chevalier de St. George no sooner received the news of the queen's death, than he posted to Versailles, where he was given to understand, that the king of France expected he should quit his territories immediately; and he was accordingly obliged to return to Lorraine. By this time Mr. Murray had arrived in England from Hanover, with notice that the king had deferred his departure for some days. He brought orders to the regency, to prepare a patent for creating the prince royal prince of Wales; and for removing lord Bolingbroke from his post of secretary. The seals were taken from this minister by the dukes of Shrewsbury and Somerset, and lord Cowper, who, at the same time, sealed up all the doors of his office.

The king landed at Greenwich on the 18th of September, 1714, where he was received by the duke of Northumberland, captain of the life-guards, and the lords of the regency. From the landing place he walked to his house in the park, accompanied by a great number of the nobility and other persons of distinction, who expected to make their court in this reign. When he retired to his bed-chamber, he sent for such of the nobility as had distinguished themselves by their zeal for his succession. But the duke of Ormond, the lord chancellor, and the lord treasurer, found themselves excluded. Lord Oxford, the next morning, presented himself with an air of confidence, supposing that his rupture with Bolingbroke would compensate for his former conduct: but he had the mortification to remain a considerable time among the crowd unnoticed; and then was permitted to kiss the king's hand, without being honoured with any circumstance of peculiar respect. On the other hand, the king expressed uncommon regard for the duke of Marlborough, who had just arrived from the continent, as well as for all the leaders of the Whig party. This was a great mortification to the Tories.

(p) Genealogists have traced the Hanoverian family to Otbert, an Italian nobleman, who retired from Este into Germany in the tenth century, and whose grandson Azo received the hand of Cunegunda, the daughter of Guelfo, or Welff, duke of Bavaria. Guelf, the offspring of this match, succeeded to the duchy; and his grandson, Henry the Proud, added to it, by marriage, the territories of Brunswick, Zell, Lunenburg, and other provinces of Lower Saxony. Henry the Lion, son of this prince, being dispossessed of his dominions by his German enemies, fled into Normandy, to the court of Henry the Second, king of England, whose eldest daughter he had espoused, and by whose interest he at length recovered Brunswick, with other states between the Elbe and the Weser, which he divided among his three sons. After alternate separations and re-unions, Henry and William, his lineal descendants, jointly possessed the duchy of Lunenburg, that of Zell, and the county of Danneberg. The elder brother, retaining the county, resigned the two duchies to William, who, at different times, found means to augment his territorial portion. While the posterity of Henry became dukes of Brunswick and Wolfenbuttel, the line of William possessed Lunenburg and its dependencies, including the duchy of Hanover. Ernest, one of his grandsons, obtained the bishopric of Osnabruck in 1662; and, in 1680, the duchy of Hanover; which, in consequence of his zeal in the service of the emperor Leopold, was formed into an electorate. He was succeeded in the electoral dukedom, in 1698, by George Lewis, who was his eldest son by the princess Sophia, grand-daughter of James the First of England. George, in 1705, acquired Lunenburg, Zell, and Saxe-Lawenburg, by the death of his uncle and father-in-law; and was therefore a prince of territorial respectability, before the death of Anne called him to the British throne, at which time he was in the fifty-fifth year of his age.

The

The king of a faction is indeed but the sovereign of half his subjects. Of this, however, the newly elected monarch did not seem sensible. It was his misfortune, and consequently of the nation, that he was hemmed round by men, who soured him with all their own interests and prejudices. None now but the leaders of a party were admitted to employment. The Whigs, while they pretended to secure the crown for the king, were with all possible arts confirming their own interests, extending their connexions, and giving laws to their sovereign. An instantaneous and total change was made in all the offices of trust, honour, or advantage. The Whigs governed the senate and the court; whom they would they oppressed; bound the lower orders of the people with severe laws, and kept them at a distance by vile distinctions.

On the 20th of October, he was crowned in Westminster with the usual solemnity; at which the earl of Oxford and lord Bolingbroke assisted. On that very day, the university of Oxford, in full convocation, unanimously conferred the degree of Doctor of Civil Law on sir Constantine Phipps, with particular marks of honour and esteem. As the French king was said to protract the demolition of Dunkirk, Mr. Prior received orders to present a memorial to hasten this work, and to prevent the canal of Mardyke from being finished. The answer which he received being deemed equivocal, this minister was recalled, and the earl of Stair appointed ambassador to the court of France, where he prosecuted this affair with uncommon vigour. About the same time, general Cadogan was sent as plenipotentiary to Antwerp, to assist at the barrier treaty, negociated there between the emperor and the states-general.

The king's partiality to the Whigs soon raised great discontent among the people, and increased the number of malcontents in every part of the kingdom. The old clamour of the church being in danger was revived; jealousies were excited; seditious libels dispersed; dangerous tumults raised; and the people only seemed to want a leader to excite them to insurrection. Birmingham, Bristol, Chippenham, Norwich, and Reading, were filled with riot. The party cry was, "Down with the Whigs! Sacheverel for ever!" Many gentlemen of the Whig faction were abused; magistrates in towns, and justices in the country were reviled and insulted in the execution of their office.

During these commotions the pretender was not an idle spectator; for he transmitted, by the French mail, copies of a printed address to the dukes of Shrewsbury, Marlborough, Argyle, and other noblemen of the first distinction, vindicating his right to the crown, and complaining of the injustice of his people. Yet though he still complained of their conduct, he never took one step to reform his own, or to correct that objection upon which his father had forfeited the throne. He still continued to profess the truest regard to the catholic religion; and, instead of concealing his sentiments on that head, gloried in his principles. He expected to ascend the throne against a very powerful opposition, and that by professing the very same principles by which it had been lost. He observed that his people, instead of doing him and themselves justice, had proclaimed for their king a foreign prince, contrary to the fundamental and incontestible laws of hereditary right, which their pretended acts of settlement could never abrogate. These papers being delivered to the secretaries of state, the king refused an audience to the marquis de Lamberti, minister from the duke of Lorraine, on the supposition that this manifesto could not have been prepared or transmitted without the knowledge and countenance of his master. The marquis having communicated this circumstance to the duke, that prince denied his having been privy to the transaction, and declared that the chevalier de St. George came into Lorraine by directions of the French king, whom the duke could not disoblige without exposing his territories to invasion. Notwithstanding this apology, the marquis was given to understand that he could not be admitted to an audience until the pretender should be removed from the dominions of his master: he, therefore, quitted the kingdom without further hesitation.

Religion too was still mingled in all political disputes. The high-churchmen complained that impiety and heresy daily gained ground from the connivance, or at least the supine negligence of the Whig prelates. The lower house of convocation had, before the queen's death, declared that a book published by Dr. Samuel Clarke, under the title of "The Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity," contained assertions contrary to the catholic faith. They sent up extracts from this performance to the bishops; and the doctor wrote an answer to their objections. He was prevailed upon to write an apology, which he presented to the upper house: but apprehending it might be published separately, and misunderstood, he afterwards delivered an explanation to the bishop of London. This was satisfactory to the bishops; but the lower house resolved, that it was no recantation of his heretical assertions. The disputes about the Trinity increasing, the archbishops and bishops received directions, which were published, for preserving unity in the church, the purity of the Christian faith concerning the Holy Trinity, and for maintaining the peace and quiet of the state. By these every preacher was restricted from delivering any other doctrine than what is contained in the Holy Scriptures with respect to the Trinity; and from intermeddling in any affairs of state or government. The like prohibition was extended to those who should write, harangue, or dispute on the same subjects.

The parliament being dissolved, another was called by a very extraordinary proclamation, in which the king complained of the evil designs of men disaffected to his succession; and of their having misrepresented his conduct and principles. He mentioned the perplexity of public affairs, the interruption of commerce, and the heavy debts of the nation. He expressed his hope that his loving subjects would send up to parliament the fittest persons to redress the present disorders; and that in the elections, they would have a particular regard to such as had expressed a firm attachment to the protestant succession when it was in danger: though it does not appear that the protestant succession was ever in danger. When the earl of Strafford returned from Holland, all his papers were seized by an order from the secretary of state's office. Mr. Prior was recalled from France, and promised to discover all he knew relating to the conduct of Oxford's administration. Uncommon vigour was exerted on both sides in the elections; but, by dint of monied interest, which prevailed in most of the corporations through the kingdom, and the countenances of the ministry, which will always have weight with needy and venal electors, a great majority of Whigs were returned both in England and Scotland.

When this new parliament assembled on the 17th of March, 1715, at Westminster, Mr. Spencer Compton was chosen speaker of the commons. On the 21st, the king appeared in the house of lords, and delivered to the chancellor a written speech, which was read in presence of both houses. His majesty thanked his faithful and loving subjects for that zeal and firmness they had shown in defence of the protestant succession, against all the open and secret practices which had been used to defeat it. He told them, that some conditions of the peace, essential to the security and trade of Great Britain, were not yet duly executed; and that the performance of the whole might be looked upon as precarious, until defensive alliances should be formed to guarantee the present treaties. He observed, that the pretender boasted of the assistance he expected in England, to repair his former disappointment: that great part of the national trade was rendered impracticable; and that the public debts were surprizingly encreased, even since the fatal cessation of arms. He gave the commons to understand, that the branches of the revenue formerly granted for the support of the civil government, were so far encumbered and alienated, that the produce of the funds which remained, and had been granted to him, would fall short of what was at first designed for maintaining the honour and dignity of the crown: that it was his, and their happiness, to see a prince of Wales who might in due time succeed him on the throne, and to see him blessed with many children; these circumstances would naturally occasion an expence to which the nation had not been for many years accustomed; and therefore he did not doubt but they would think of it with that affection which he had reason to hope from his commons. He desired that no unhappy divisions of parties might divert them from pursuing the common interest of their country. He declared that the established constitution in church and state should be the rule of his government; and that the happiness, ease, and prosperity of his people should be the chief care of his life. He concluded with expressing his confidence, that with their assistance he should disappoint the designs of those who wanted to deprive him of that blessing which he most valued—the affection of his people.

This declaration portended measures which it was the interest terest of the crown to avoid, and suited the temper of the majority in both houses, which breathed nothing but destruction to their political adversaries. The lords, in their address of thanks, professed their hope that his majesty, assisted by the parliament, would be able to recover the reputation of the kingdom in foreign parts, the loss of which they hoped to convince the world by their actions was by no means to be imputed to the nation in general. The Tories said this was an invidious reflection, calculated to mislead and inflame the people; for the reputation of the kingdom had never been so high as at this very juncture. The commons pretended astonishment to find that any conditions of the late peace should not yet be duly executed; and that care was not taken to form such alliances as might have rendered the peace not precarious. They declared their resolution to enquire into the fatal miscarriages; to trace out those measures whereon the pretender placed his hopes, and bring the authors of them to condign punishment. These addresses were not voted without opposition. In the house of lords, the dukes of Buckingham and Shrewsbury, the earl of Anglesey, the archbishop of York, and other peers, both secular and ecclesiastical, observed, that their address was injurious to the late queen's memory, and would serve only to increase those unhappy divisions that distracted the kingdom. In the lower house, sir William Wyndham, Mr. Bromley, Mr. Shippen, general Ross, sir William Whitelocke, and other members, took exceptions to passages of the same nature, in the address which the commons had prepared. They were answered by Mr. Walpole, Mr. Pulteney, and secretary Stanhope. These gentlemen took occasion to declare, that notwithstanding the endeavours which had been used to prevent a discovery of the late mismanagements, by conveying away several papers from the secretary's office, yet the government had sufficient evidence left, to prove the late ministry the most corrupt that ever sat at the helm: that those matters would soon be laid before the house, when it would appear that a certain English general had acted in concert with, if not received orders from, mareschal de Villars. Lord Bolingbroke, who had hitherto appeared in public, as usual, with remarkable serenity, and spoke in the house of lords with great freedom and confidence, thought it was now high time to consult his personal safety. He accordingly withdrew to the continent, leaving a letter which was afterwards printed in his justification (q).

In the midst of all this violence against the late ministers, friends were not wanting to espouse their cause in the face of opposition: and even in some addresses to the king their conduct was justified. Nay, some individuals had courage enough to attack the present administration. When a motion was made in the house of commons, to consider the king's proclamation for calling a new parliament, sir William Whitelocke, member for the university of Oxford, boldly declared it was unprecedented and unwarrantable. Being called upon to explain himself, he made an apology. Nevertheless, sir William Wyndham said, the proclamation was not only unprecedented and unwarrantable, but even of dangerous consequence to the very being of parliaments. When challenged to justify his charge, he observed, that every member was free to speak his thoughts. Some exclaimed, "The Tower! the Tower!" A warm debate ensued; sir William being ordered to withdraw, was accompanied by one hundred and twenty-nine members; and those who remained in the house resolved, That he should be reprimanded by the speaker. He was accordingly rebuked, for having presumed to reflect on his majesty's proclamation, and having made an unwarrantable use of the freedom of speech granted by his majesty. Sir William said, he was not conscious of having offered any indignity to his majesty, or of having been guilty of a breach of privilege: that he acquiesced in the determination of the house; but had no thanks to give those gentlemen, who, under pretence of lenity, had subjected him to this censure.

On the 9th of April, general Stanhope delivered to the house of commons fourteen volumes, consisting of all the papers relating to the late negociations of peace and commerce, as well as to the cessation of arms; and moved that they might be referred to a select committee of twenty persons, who should digest the substance of them under proper heads, and report them, with their observations, to the house. One more was added to the number of this secret committee, which was chosen by ballot, and met that same evening. Mr. Robert Walpole, original chairman, being taken ill, was succeeded in that place by Mr. Stanhope. The whole number was subdivided into three committees: to each a certain number of books was allotted; and they carried on the enquiry with great eagerness and expedition (r). Immediately after the committee had begun to act, the Whig party lost one of their warmest champions, by the death of the marquis of Wharton, a nobleman possessed of happy talents for the cabinet, the senate, and the common scenes of life; talents, which a life of pleasure and libertinism did not prevent him from employing with surprising vigour and application. The committee of the lower house taking the civil list into consideration, examined several papers relating to that revenue. The Tories observed, that from the seven hundred thousand pounds granted annually to king William, fifty thousand pounds were allotted to the late queen, when princess of Denmark; twenty thousand pounds to the duke of Gloucester; and twice that sum, as a dowry, to James's queen; that near two hundred thousand pounds had been yearly deducted from the revenues of the late queen's civil-list, and applied to other uses; notwithstanding which deduction, she had honourably maintained her family, and supported the dignity of the crown. In the course of the debate some warm altercation passed between lord Guernsey and one of the members, who affirmed that the late ministry had used the Whigs, and, indeed, the whole nation in such a manner, that nothing they should suffer could be deemed hardship. At length the house agreed that the sum of seven hundred thousand pounds clear should be granted for the civil-list during his majesty's life. A motion being made for an address against pensions, it was opposed by Mr. Walpole, and over-ruled by the majority. The lords passed the bill for regulating the land forces, with some amendments.

On the 18th of May, sir John Norris sailed with a strong squadron to the Baltic, in order to protect the commerce of the nation, which had suffered from the king of Sweden, who caused all ships trading to those parts to be seized and confiscated. That prince had rejected the treaty of neutrality concerted by the allies for the security of the empire; and considered the English and Dutch as his enemies. The ministers of England and the states general had presented memorials to the regency of Sweden; but finding no redress, they resolved to protect their trade by force of arms. After the Swedish general Steenboch and his army were made prisoners, count Wellen concluded a treaty with the administration of Holstein-Gottorp, by which the towns of Stetin and Wismar were sequestered into the hands of the king of Prussia; the administrator engaged to secure them, and all the rest of Swedish Pomerania, from the Poles and Muscovites; but, as the governor of Pomerania refused to comply with this treaty, those allies marched into the province, subdued the island of Rugen, and obliged Stetin to surrender. Then the governor consented to the sequestration, and paid to the Poles and Muscovites four hundred thousand rix dollars, to indemnify them for the expence of the siege. The king of Sweden returning from Turkey, rejected the treaty of sequestration, and insisted upon Stetin's being restored, without his repaying the money. As this monarch likewise threatened to invade the electorate of Saxony, and chastise his false friends; king George, for the security of his German dominions, concluded a treaty with the king of Denmark, by which the Duchies of Bremen and Verden, which had been taken from the Swede in his absence, were made over to his Britannic majesty, on condition that he should declare war against Sweden.

(q) In this paper, he declared he had received certain and repeated informations, that a resolution was taken to pursue him to the scaffold: that if there had been the least reason to hope for a fair and open trial, after having been already prejudged, unheard, by the two houses of parliament, he should not have declined the strictest examination. He challenged the most inveterate of his enemies to produce any one instance of criminal correspondence, or the least corruption in any part of the administration in which he was concerned. He said, if his zeal for the honour and dignity of his royal mistress, and the true interest of his country, had any where transported him to let slip a warm and unguarded expression, he hoped the most favourable interpretation would be put upon it. He affirmed, that he had served her majesty faithfully and dutifully, in that especially which she had most at heart, relieving her people from a bloody and expensive war; and that he had always been too much an Englishman to sacrifice the interest of his country to any foreign ally whatsoever.

(r) Before this measure was taken, Dr. Gilbert Burnet, bishop of Sarum, died of a pleuritic fever, in the seventy-second year of his age.

Accordingly,

Accordingly, he took possession of the Duchies in October; published a declaration of war against Charles in his Germanic dominions; and detached six thousand Hanoverians to join the Danes and Prussians in Pomerania. These allies reduced the islands of Rugen and Uledon, and attacked the towns of Wismar and Stralsund, from which last place Charles was obliged to retire in a vessel to Schonen. He assembled a body of troops with which he proposed to pass the Sound upon the ice, and attack Copenhagen; but was disappointed by a sudden thaw. Nevertheless, he refused to return to Stockholm, which he had not seen for sixteen years; but remained at Carlescroon, in order to hasten his fleet for the relief of Wismar.

The spirit of discontent and disaffection seemed to gain ground every day in England. Notwithstanding proclamations against riots, and orders of the justices for maintaining the peace, repeated tumults were raised by the malcontents in London and Westminster. Those who celebrated the anniversary of the king's birth-day with the usual marks of joy and festivity, were insulted by the populace; but next day, which was the anniversary of the restoration, the whole city was lighted up with bonfires and illuminations, and echoed with the sound of mirth and tumultuous rejoicing. The people even obliged the life guards, who patroled through the streets, to join in the cry of "High Church and Ormond!" and in Smithfield they burned the picture of king William (s). A frivolous incident served to increase the popular ferment. The shirts allowed to the first regiment of guards, commanded by the duke of Marlborough, were so coarse, that the soldiers could hardly be persuaded to wear them. Some were thrown into the garden of the king's palace, and into that which belonged to the duke of Marlborough. A detachment, in marching through the city, produced them to the view of the shopkeepers and passengers, exclaiming, "These are the Hanover shirts." The court being informed of this clamour, ordered those new shirts to be burned immediately: but even this sacrifice, and an advertisement published by the duke of Marlborough in his own vindication, did not acquit that general of a suspicion that he was concerned in this mean species of peculation. A reward of fifty pounds was offered by the government to any person that would discover one captain Wight, who by an intercepted letter, appeared to be disaffected to king George; and Mr. George Jefferies was seized at Dublin, with a packet, directed to Dr. Jonathan Swift, dean of St. Patrick's. Several treasonable papers being found in this packet, were transmitted to England: Jefferies was obliged to give bail for his appearance; and Swift thought proper to abscond.

The house of lords, to demonstrate their abhorrence of all who should engage in conspiracies against the king, rejected with indignation a petition presented to them in behalf of Blackburn, Casilis, Barnarde, Meldrum, and Chambers, who had hitherto continued prisoners, for having conspired against the life of king William. On the 9th of June, Mr. Walpole, as chairman of the secret committee, declared to the house of commons, that the report was ready; and in the mean time moved, That a warrant might be issued by Mr. Speaker, for apprehending several persons, particularly Mr. Matthew Prior and Mr. Thomas Harley, who being in the house, were immediately taken into custody. Then he recited the report, ranged under these different heads: the clandestine negociations with Monsieur Menager: the extraordinary measures pursued to form the congress at Utrecht: the trifling of the French plenipotentiaries, by the connivance of the British ministers: the negociation about the renunciation of the Spanish monarchy: the fatal suspension of arms: the seizure of Ghent and Bruges, in order to distress the allies and favour the French: the duke of Ormond's acting in concert with the the French general: the lord Bolingbroke's journey to France, to negociate a separate peace: Mr. Prior's and the duke of Shrewsbury's negociation in France: the precipitate conclusion of the peace at Utrecht. The report being read, sir Thomas Hamner moved, That the consideration of it should be adjourned to a certain day; and that in the mean time the report should be printed for the perusal of the members: he was seconded by the Tories: a debate ensued; and the motion was rejected by a great majority.

This point being gained, Mr. Walpole impeached Henry lord viscount Bolingbroke of high treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors. Mr. Hungerford declared his opinion, that nothing mentioned in the report, in relation to lord Bolingbroke, amounted to high treason; and general Ross expressed the same sentiment. Then lord Coningsby said, "The worthy chairman has impeached the hand, but I impeach the head: he has impeached the clerk, and I the justice: he has impeached the scholar, and I the master. I impeach Robert earl of Oxford and earl of Mortimer of high treason, and other crimes and misdemeanors." Mr. auditor Harley, the earl's brother, spoke in vindication of that minister. He affirmed he had done nothing but by the immediate command of his sovereign: that the peace was a good peace, and approved as such by two parliaments; and that the facts charged to him in the report amounted only to misdemeanors: if the faction of a parliament, which is the representative and legislature of the nation, be not sufficient to protect a minister from the vengeance of his enemies, he can have no security. Mr. auditor Foley, the earl's brother-in-law, made a speech to the same purpose: sir Joseph Jekyll, a staunch Whig, and member of the secret committee, expressed his doubt, whether they had sufficient matter or evidence to impeach the earl of high treason. Nevertheless, the house resolved to impeach him, without a division. When he appeared in the house of lords, the following day, he found himself deserted by his brother peers, as infectious; and retired with signs of confusion. Prior and Harley having been examined by such of the committee as were justices of the peace for Middlesex, Mr. Walpole informed the house that matters of such importance appeared in Prior's examination, that he was directed to move them for that member's being closely confined. Prior was accordingly imprisoned, and cut off from all communication. On the 21st of June, Mr. secretary Stanhope impeached James duke of Ormond, of high-treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors. Mr. Archibald Hutchinson, one of the commissioners of trade, spoke in favour of the duke. He enumerated the great services performed to the crown and nation by his grace and his ancestors; and affirmed that all the allegations against him could not, in the rigour of the law, be construed into high-treason. Mr. Hutchinson was seconded by general Lumney, who urged that the duke of Ormond had on all occasions given signal proofs of his affection for his country, as well as of personal courage; and that he had generously expended the best part of his estate, by living abroad in a most noble and splendid manner, for the honour of his sovereign. Sir Joseph Jekyll said, if there was room for mercy, he hoped it would be shewn to that noble, generous, and courageous peer, who had in a course of many years exerted those great accomplishments for the good and honour of his country; that, as the statute of Edward III. on which the charge of high treason against him was to be grounded, had been mitigated by subsequent acts, the house ought not, in his opinion, to take advantage of that act against the duke, but only impeach him of high crimes and misdemeanors. General Ross, sir William Wyndham, and the speakers of that party, did not abandon the duke in this emergency; but all their arguments and eloquence were lost upon the other faction, by which they were greatly out-numbered. The question being put, was carried for the impeachment of the duke of Ormond, who perceiving every thing conducted by a furious spirit of revenge, and, that he could not expect the benefit of an impartial trial, consulted his own safety, by withdrawing himself from the kingdom. On the following day, the earl of Strafford was impeached by Mr. Aislaby, for having advised the fatal suspension of arms, and the seizing of Ghent and Bruges: as well as for having treated the most serene house of Hanover with insolence and contempt. He was also defended by his friends, but overpowered by his enemies.

When the articles against the earl of Oxford were read in the house, a warm debate arose upon the eleventh, by which he was charged with having advised the French king in what manner Tournay might be gained from the states general. The question being put, Whether this article amounted to high treason; sir Robert Raymond, formerly solicitor general, maintained the negative, and was supported not only by sir William Wyndham, and the Tories, but also by sir Joseph Jekyll, who said, that he hoped he might pretend to have some knowledge of the laws of the kingdom, and would not scruple to declare, that, in his judgement, the charge in question did not amount to high treason. Mr. Walpole answered with great warmth, and said, that there were several persons both in and out of the committee, who were satisfied that the charge specified in the eleventh article amounted to high-treason. This point being decided against the earl, and the other articles approved by the house, lord Coningsby, attended by the Whig members, impeached the earl of Oxford at the bar of the house of lords, demanding at the same time, that he might be sequestered from parliament, and committed to safe custody. A motion was made, that the consideration of the articles might be adjourned. After a short debate the articles were read; then the Tory lords moved that the judges might be consulted. The motion being rejected, another was made, that the earl should be committed to safe custody: this occasioned another debate, in which he himself spoke to the following purpose: That the whole charge might be reduced to the negociations and conclusion of the peace: that the nation wanted a peace, he said, nobody would deny: that the conditions of this peace were as good as could be expected, considering the backwardness and reluctancy which some of the allies shewed to come into the queen's measures: that the peace was approved by two successive parliaments: that he had no share in the affair of Tournay, which was wholly transacted by that unfortunate nobleman who had thought fit to step aside: that, for his own part, he always acted by the immediate directions and commands of the late queen, without offending against any known law; and, being justified by his own conscience, was unconcerned for the life of an insignificant old man: that, if ministers of state, acting by the immediate commands of their sovereign, are afterwards to be made accountable for their proceedings, it might one day or other be the case with all the members of that august assembly: that he did not doubt their lordships, out of regard to themselves, would give him an equitable hearing: and that in the prosecution of the enquiry it would appear he had merited not only the indulgence, but even the favour of his government. "My lords (said he) I am now to take leave of your lordships, and of this honourable house, perhaps for ever; I shall lay down my life with pleasure in a cause favoured by my late dear royal mistress. When I consider that I am to be judged by the justice, honour, and virtue of my peers, I shall acquiesce, and retire with great content; and, my lords, God's will be done." The duke of Shrewsbury having acquainted the house that the earl was very much indisposed with the gravel, he was suffered to remain at his own house, in custody of the black-rod: in his way thither, he was attended by a great multitude of people, crying, "High Church, Ormond and Oxford, for ever!" Next day he was brought to the bar; where he received a copy of the articles, and was allowed a month to prepare his answer. Though Dr. Mead declared that if the earl should be sent to the Tower his life would be in danger, it was carried, on a division, that he should be conveyed thither on the 16th of July. During the debate, the earl of Anglesea observed that these impeachments were disagreeable to the nation; and that it was to be feared such violent measures would make the sceptre shake in the king's hands. This expression kindled the whole house into a flame. Some members cried, "To the Tower!" some, "To order!" The earl of Sunderland declared, that if these words had been spoken in another place he would have called the person that spoke them to account: in the mean time, he moved that the noble Lord should explain himself. Anglesea, dreading the resentment of the house, made an apology; which was accepted. The earl of Oxford was attended to the Tower by a prodigious concourse of people, who did not scruple to exclaim against his persecutors. Tumults were raised in Staffordshire, and other parts of the kingdom against the Whig party, which had depressed the friends of the church, and embroiled the nation. The house of commons presented an address to the king, desiring that the laws might be vigorously executed against the rioters. They prepared the proclamation-act, decreeing, that if any persons, to the number of twelve, unlawfully assembled, should continue together one hour after having been required to disperse by a justice of peace or other officer, and heard the proclamation against riots read in public, they should be deemed guilty of felony without benefit of clergy.

When the king went to the house of peers, on the 20th of July, to give the royal assent to this, and some other bills, he told both houses that a rebellion was actually begun at home; and that the nation was threatened with an invasion from abroad. He, therefore, expected that the commons would not leave the kingdom in a defenceless condition, but enable him to take such measures as should be necessary for the public safety. Addresses in the usual style were immediately presented by the parliament, the convocation, the common-council and lieutenancy of London, and the two universities; but that of Oxford was received in the most contemptuous manner: and the deputies were charged with disloyalty, on account of a fray which had happened between some recruiting officers and the scholars of the university. The addresses from the kirk of Scotland, and the dissenting ministers of London and Westminster, met with a much more gracious reception. The parliament forthwith passed a bill, empowering the king to secure suspected persons, and to suspend the habeas corpus act in that time of danger. A clause was added to a money-bill, offering the reward of one hundred thousand pounds to such as should seize the pretender dead or alive. Sir George Byng was sent to take the command of the fleet; general Earle repaired to his government of Portsmouth: the guards were encamped at Hyde Park: lord Irwin was appointed governor of Hull, in the room of brigadier Sutton, who, together with lord Windsor, the generals Ross, Webb, and Stuart, were dismissed from the service. Orders were given for raising thirteen regiments of dragoons, and eight of infantry: and the train bands were kept in readiness to suppress tumults.

In the midst of these transactions, the commons added six articles to those exhibited against the earl of Oxford. Lord Bolingbroke was impeached at the bar of the house of lords by Mr. Walpole. Bills being brought in to summon him and the duke of Ormond to surrender themselves by the 10th of September, or, in default, thereof, to attaint them of high-treason, they passed both houses, and received the royal assent. On the last day of August, the commons agreed to the articles against the earl of Strafford, which being presented to the house of lords, the earl made a speech in his own vindication. He complained that his papers had been seized in an unprecedented manner. He said, if he had in his letters or discourse dropped any unguarded expressions against foreign ministers, while he had the honour to represent the crown of Great Britain, he hoped they would not be accounted criminal by a British house of peers: he desired he might be allowed a competent time to answer the articles brought against him, and have duplicates of all the papers which had either been laid before the committee of secrecy, or remained in the hands of government, to be used occasionally in his justification. The request was immediately opposed by the leaders of the other party, until the earl of Ilay represented that, in all civilized nations, all courts of judicature, except the Inquisition, allowed the persons arraigned all that was necessary for their justification; and that the house of peers of Great Britain ought not, in this case, to do any thing contrary to that honour and equity for which they were so justly renowned throughout all Europe. This observation made an impression on the house, which resolved that the earl should be indulged with copies of such papers as he might have occasion to use in his defence.

On the 3rd of September, Oxford's answer was delivered to the house of lords, who transmitted it to the commons. Mr. Walpole having heard it read, said it contained little more than a repetition of what had been suggested in some pamphlets and papers which had been published in vindication of the late ministry: that it was a false and malicious libel laying upon his royal mistress the blame of all the pernicious measures he had led her into, against her own honour, and the good of his country; that it was likewise a libel on the proceedings of the commons, since he endeavoured to clear those persons who had already confessed their guilt by flight. After some debate, the house resolved, That the answer of Robert, earl of Oxford, should be referred to the committee appointed to draw up articles of impeachment, and prepare evidence against the impeached lords; and that the committee should prepare a replication to the answer. This was accordingly prepared, and sent up to the lords. Then the committee reported, That Mr. Prior had grossly prevaricated on his examination, and behaved with great contempt of their authority. The duke of Ormond and lord viscount Bolingbroke having omitted to surrender themselves within the time limited, the house of lords ordered the earl-marshal to erase out of the list of peers their names and armorial bearings. Inventories were taken of their personal estates; and the duke's atchievement, as knight of the garter, was taken down from St. George's Chapel at Windsor (t).

About this period, the royal assent was given to an act for encouraging loyalty in Scotland. By this law the tenant who continued peaceable while his lord took arms in favour of the pretender, was invested with the property of the lands he rented: on the other hand, it was decreed that the lands possessed by any person guilty of high-treason should revert to the superior of whom they were held, and be consolidated with the superiority; and that all entails and settlements of estates, since the first day of August, in favour of children, with a fraudulent intent to avoid the punishment of the law due to the offence of high-treason, should be null and void. It likewise contained a clause for summoning suspected persons to find bail for their good behaviour, on pain of being denounced rebels. By virtue of this clause all the heads of the Jacobite clans, and other suspected persons, were summoned to Edinburgh: and those who did not appear were declared rebels.

By this time the rebellion was actually begun in Scotland. The dissensions occasioned in that country by the Union had never been wholly appeased. Even since the queen's death, addresses were prepared in different parts of Scotland, against the Union, which was deemed a national grievance; and the Jacobites did not fail to encourage this aversion. Though their hopes of dissolving that treaty were baffled by the industry and other arts of the revolutioners, who secured a majority of Whigs in parliament, they did not lay aside their designs of attempting something of consequence in favour of the pretender: but maintained a correspondence with the malcontents of England, a great number of whom were driven by apprehension, hard usage, and resentment into a system of politics, which otherwise they would not have espoused. The Tories finding themselves excluded from any share in the government and legislature, and exposed to the insolence and fury of a faction which they despised, began to wish in earnest for a revolution. Some of them held private consultations, and communicated with the Jacobites, who conveyed their sentiments to the chevalier de St. George, with such exaggerations as were dictated by their own eagerness and extravagance. They assured the pretender that the nation was wholly disaffected to the new government, and, indeed, the clamours, tumults, and conversation of the people in general countenanced this assertion. They promised to take arms without further delay in his favour: and engaged that the Tories should join him at his first landing in Great Britain. They, therefore, besought him to come over with all possible expedition, declaring that his appearance would produce an immediate revolution. The chevalier resolved to take the advantage of this favourable disposition. He had recourse to the French king, who had always been the refuge of his family. Louis favoured him in secret; and, notwithstanding his late engagements with England, cherished the ambition of raising him to the throne of Great Britain. He supplied him privately with money, to prepare a small armament in the port of Havre, which was equipped in the name of Depine d'Anicaut. The duke of Ormond and lord Bolingbroke, who had retired to France, finding themselves condemned unheard, and attainted, engaged in the service of the chevalier, and corresponded with the Tories of England.

These intrigues and machinations were discovered and communicated to the court of London by the earl of Stair, who then resided as English ambassador at Paris. He was a nobleman of unquestionable honour and integrity, generous, humane, discerning, and resolute. He had signalized himself by his valour, intrepidity, and other military talents, during the war in the Netherlands; and he now acted in another sphere with uncommon vigour, vigilance, and address. He detected the Chevalier's scheme while it was yet in embryo, and gave such early notice of it as enabled the king of Great Britain to take effectual measures for defeating the design. All the pretender's interest in France expired with Louis XIV. At his death, which happened on the first of September, the regency of the kingdom devolved to the duke of Orleans, who adopted a new system of politics, and had already entered into engagements with the king of Great Britain. Instead of assisting the pretender, he amused his agents with mysterious and equivocal expressions, calculated to frustrate the design of the expedition. Nevertheless, the more violent part of the Jacobites in Great Britain believed he was at bottom a friend to their cause, and depended upon him for succour. They even extorted from him a sum of money by dint of importunities, and some arms; but the vessel they were sent by was shipwrecked, and the cargo lost upon the coast of Scotland.

The partizans of the pretender had proceeded too far to retreat with safety; and, therefore, resolved to try their fortune in the field. The earl of Mar repaired to the Highlands, where he held consultations with the marquisses of Huntley and Tullibardine, the earls Marischal and Southesk, the generals Hamilton, and Gordon, with the chiefs of the Jacobite clans. Then he assembled three hundred of his own vassals; proclaimed the pretender at Castletown, and set up his standard at Brae-Mar, on the 6th of September. By this time the earls of Home, Wigroun, and Kinnoul, lord Deskford, and Lockhart of Carnwath, with other persons suspected of disaffection to the present government, were committed prisoners to the castle of Edinburgh; and major-general Whetham marched with regular troops which were in that kingdom to secure the bridge at Stirling. Before these precautions were taken, two vessels had arrived at Arbroath from Havre, with arms, ammunition, and a great number of officers, who assured the earl of Mar that the pretender would soon be with them in person. The death of Louis XIV. struck a general damp upon their spirits; but they laid their account with being joined by a powerful body in England. The earl of Mar, by letters and messages, pressed the chevalier to come over without further delay. He, in the mean time, assumed the title of lieutenant-general of the pretender's forces, and published a declaration, exhorting the people to take arms for their lawful sovereign. This was followed by a shrewd manifesto, explaining the national grievances, and assuring the people of redress. Some of his partizans attempted to surprize the castle of Edinburgh, but were prevented by the vigilance and activity of colonel Stuart, lieutenant-governor of that fortress. The duke of Argyle set out for Scotland, as commander in chief of the forces in North Britain: the earl of Sutherland set sail in the Queenborough ship of war, for the north, where he proposed to raise his vassals for the service of government; and many other Scottish peers returned to their own country, in order to signalize their loyalty to king George.

In England the practices of the Jacobites did not escape the notice of the ministry. Lieutenant-colonel Paul was imprisoned in the Gate House, for enlisting men in the service of the pretender. The titular duke of Powis was committed to the Tower: lords Lansdown and Duplin were taken into custody; and a warrant issued for apprehending the earl of Jersey. The king desired the consent of the lower house to seize and detain sir William Windham, sir John Packington, Mr. Edward Harvey of Combe, Mr. Thomas Forster, Mr. John Anstis, and Mr. Corbet Kynaston, who were members of the house, and suspected of favouring the invasion. The commons unanimously agreed to the proposal, and presented an address, signifying their approbation. Harvey and Anstis were immediately secured. Forster, with the assistance of some popish lords, assembled a body of men in Northumberland: sir John Packington being examined before the council, was dismissed for want of evidence: Mr. Kynaston absconded: sir William Windham was seized at his own house in Somersetshire, by colonel Huske and a messenger, who secured his papers: he found means, however, to escape from them; but afterwards surrendered himself, and, having been examined at the council-board, was committed to the Tower. His father-in-law, the duke of Somerset, offered to become bound for his appearance: and being rejected as bail, expressed his resentment so warmly, that the king thought proper to remove him from the office of master of the horse. On the 21st of September the king went to the house of lords and passed the bills that were ready for the royal assent. Then the chancellor read his majesty's speech, expressing his acknowledgment and satisfaction, in consequence of the uncommon marks of their affection he had received; and the parliament adjourned on the 6th of October.

The friends of the house of Stuart were very numerous in the western counties, and began to make preparations for an insurrection. They had concealed some arms and artillery at Bath, and formed a design to surprize Bristol; but they were discovered and betrayed by the emissaries of government, who baffled all their schemes, and apprehended every person of consequence suspected of attachment to that cause. The University of Oxford felt the rod of power on that occasion. Major-general Pepper, with a strong detachment of dragoons, took possession of the city at day-break, declaring he would use military execution on all students who should presume to appear without the limits of their respective colleges. He seized ten or eleven persons, among whom was one Lloyd, a coffee-man; and made prize of some horses and furniture belonging to colonel Owen, and other gentlemen. With this booty he retreated to Abingdon; and Handasyde's regiment of foot was afterwards quartered in Oxford, to over-awe the University. The ministry found it more difficult to suppress the insurgents in the northern counties. In the month of October the earl of Derwentwater and Mr. Forster took the field with a body of horse, and being joined by some gentlemen from the borders of Scotland, proclaimed the pretender at Warkworth, Morpeth, and Alnwick. Their first design was to seize the town of Newcastle, in which they had many friends: but they found the gates shut upon them, and retired to Hexham; while general Carpenter, having assembled a body of troops, resolved to march from Newcastle, and attack them before they should be reinforced. The rebels retiring northward by Woller, were joined by two hundred Scottish horse, under the lord viscount Kenmuir, and the earls of Carnwath and Wintoun, who had set up the pretender's standard at Moffat, and proclaimed him in different parts of Scotland. The rebels thus reinforced, advanced to Kelso, having received advice that they would be joined by Mackintosh, who had crossed the Forth with a body of Highlanders.

By this time the earl of Mar was at the head of ten thousand men, well armed. He had secured the pass of the Tay at Perth, where his head-quarters were established, and made himself master of the whole fruitful province of Fife, and all the sea-coast on that side of the Frith of Edinburgh. He selected two thousand five hundred men, commanded by brigadier Mackintosh, to make a descent upon the Lothian side, and join the Jacobites in that country, or such as should take arms on the borders of England. Boats were assembled for this purpose: and, notwithstanding all the precautions that could be taken by the king's ships in the Frith, to prevent the design, above fifteen hundred chosen men made good their passage in the night, and landed on the coast of Lothian, having crossed an arm of the sea, about sixteen miles broad, in open boats, that passed through the midst of the king's cruizers. Nothing could be better concerted, or executed, with more conduct and courage, than was this hazardous enterprize. They amused the king's ships with marches and counter-marches along the coast, in such a manner that they could not possibly know where they intended to embark. The earl of Mar, in the mean time, marched from Perth to Dumblaine, as if he had intended to cross the Forth at Stirling Bridge: but his real design was to divert the duke of Argyle from attacking his detachment, which had landed in Lothian. So far the scheme succeeded. The duke, who had assembled some troops in Lothian, returned to Stirling with the utmost expedition, after having secured Edinburgh, and obliged Mackintosh to abandon his design on that city. This partizan had actually taken possession of Leith, from whence he retired to Seaton-house, near Preston-pans, which he fortified in such a manner that he could not be forced without artillery. Here he remained until he received an order across the Firth from the earl of Mar, to join lord Kenmuir, and the English at Kelso, for which place he immediately began his march, and reached it on the 22nd of October, though a good number of his men had deserted on the route.

The lord Kenmuir, with the earls of Wintoun, Nithsdale, and Carnwath, the earls of Derwentwater and Mr. Forster, with the English insurgents, arriving at the same time, a council of war was immediately called. Wintoun proposed that they should march immediately into the western parts of Scotland, and join general Gordon, who commanded a strong body of Highlanders in Argyleshire. The English insisted upon crossing the Tweed, and attacking general Carpenter, whose troops did not exceed nine hundred dragoons. Neither scheme was executed. They took the route to Jedburgh, where they resolved to leave Carpenter on one side, and penetrate into England by the western border. The Highlanders declared they would not quit their own country; but were ready to execute the schemes proposed by the earl of Wintoun. Means, however, were found to prevail upon one half of them to advance, while the rest returned to the Highlands. At Brampton, Forster opened his commission of general, which had been sent to him from the earl of Mar, and proclaimed the pretender. They continued their march to Penrith, where the sheriff, assisted by lord Lonsdale, and the bishop of Carlisle, had assembled the whole posse comitatus of Cumberland, amounting to twelve thousand men, who dispersed with the utmost precipitation at the approach of the rebels. From Penrith, Forster proceeded by the way of Kendal and Lancaster to Preston, from whence Stanhope's regiment of dragoons, and another of militia, immediately retired; so that he took possession of the place without resistance.

General Willis marched against the enemy with six regiments of horse and dragoons, and one battalion of foot commanded by colonel Preston. They had advanced to the bridge of Ribble before Forster received intelligence of their approach. He forthwith began to raise barricadoes, and put the place in a posture of defence. On the 12th of November the town was briskly attacked in two different places; but the king's troops met with a very warm reception, and were repulsed with considerable loss. Next day general Carpenter arrived with a reinforcement of three regiments of dragoons; and the rebels were invested on both sides. The Highlanders declared they would make a sally sword in hand, and either cut their way through the king's troops, or perish in the attempt; but they were over-ruled. Forster sent colonel Oxburgh with a trumpet to general Willis, to propose a capitulation. He was given to understand, that the general would not treat with rebels; but, in case of their surrendering at discretion, he would prevent his soldiers from putting them to the sword, until he should receive further orders. He granted them time to consider till next morning, upon their delivering the earl of Derwentwater and Mackintosh as hostages. When Forster submitted, this Highlander declared he could not promise that the Scots would surrender in that manner. The general desired him to return to his people, and he would forthwith attack the town, in which case every man of them should be cut to pieces. The Scottish noblemen did not chuse to run the risque; and persuaded the Highlanders to accept the terms that were offered. They accordingly laid down their arms, and were put under a strong guard. All the noblemen and leaders were secured. Major Nairn, captain Lockhart, captain Shaftoe, and ensign Erskine were tried by a court-martial as deserters, and executed. Lord Charles Murray, son of the duke of Athol, was likewise condemned for the same crime, but reprieved. The common men were imprisoned at Chester and Liverpool: the noblemen and considerable officers were sent to London, conveyed through the streets, pinioned like malefactors, and committed to the Tower and to Newgate.

The day on which the rebels surrendered at Preston was remarkable for the battle of Dumblaine, fought between the duke of Argyle and the earl of Mar, who commanded the pretender's forces. This nobleman had retreated to his camp at Perth, when he understood the duke was returned from Lothian to Stirling. But, being now joined by the northern clans under the earl of Seaforth, and those of the west, commanded by general Gordon, who had signalized himself in the service of the Czar of Moscovy, he resolved to pass the Forth, in order to join his southern friends, that they might march together into England. With this view he advanced to Auchterarder, where he reviewed his army, and rested on the 11th of November. The duke of Argyle, apprized of his intention, and being joined by some regiments of dragoons from Ireland, determined to give him battle in the neighbourhood of Dumblaine. The next day Argyle passed the Forth at Stirling, and encamped with his left at the village of Dumblaine, and his right towards Sheriffmoor. The earl of Mar advanced within two miles of his camp, and remained till day-break in order of battle; his army consisting of nine thousand effective men, cavalry as well as infantry. In the morning, the duke, understanding they were in motion, drew up his forces, which did not exceed three thousand five hundred men, on the heights to the north-east of Dumblaine; but he was outflanked both on the right and left. The clans that formed part of the centre and right wing of the enemy, with Glengary and Clanronald at their head, charged the left of the king's army sword in hand, with such impetuosity, that in seven minutes both horse and foot were totally routed with great slaughter; and general Whetham, who commanded them, fled at full gallop to Stirling, where he declared that the royal army was totally defeated. In the mean time, the duke of Argyle, who commanded in person on the right, attacked the left of the enemy, at the head of Stair's and Evans's dragoons, and drove them two miles before him, as far as the water of Allan: yet in that space they wheeled about, and attempted to rally ten times; so that he was obliged to press them hard, that they might not recover from their confusion. Brigadier Wightman followed, in order to sustain him with three battalions of infantry; while the victorious right wing of the rebels, having pursued Whetham a considerable way, returned to the field, and formed in the rear of Wightman, to the amount of five thousand men. The duke of Argyle, returning from the pursuit, joined Wightman, who had faced about, and taken possession of some enclosures and mud-walls, in expectation of being attacked. In this posture both armies fronted each other till the evening, when the duke drew off towards Dumblaine, and the rebels retired to Ardoch, without mutual molestation. Next day, the duke marching back to the field of battle, carried off the wounded, with four pieces of cannon left by the army, and retreated to Stirling. Few prisoners were taken on either side: the number of slain might be about five hundred of each army; and both generals claimed the victory. This battle was not so fatal to the Highlanders as the loss of Inverness, from which sir John Mackenzie was driven by Simon Frazer, lord Lovat, who, contrary to the principles he had hitherto professed, secured this important post for the government; by which means a free communication was opened with the north of Scotland, where the earl of Sutherland had raised a considerable number of vassals. The marquis of Huntley and the earl of Seaforth were obliged to quit the rebel army, in order to defend their own territories; and in a little time submitted to king George: a good number of the Frazers declared, with their chief, against the pretender: the marquis of Tullibardine withdrew from the army, to cover his own country; and the clans, seeing no likelihood of another action, began to disperse, according to custom.

The government was now in a condition to send strong reinforcements to Scotland. Six thousand men that were claimed of the states-general, by virtue of the treaty, landed in England, and began their march for Edinburgh: general Cadogan set out for the same place, together with brigadier Petit, and six other engineers; and a train of artillery was shipped at the Tower for that country, the duke of Argyle resolving to drive the earl of Mar out of Perth, to which town he had retired with the remains of his forces. The pretender having been amused with the hope of seeing the whole kingdom of England rise up as one man in his behalf; and the duke of Ormond having made a fruitless voyage to the western coast, to try the disposition of the people, he was now convinced of the vanity of his expectation in that quarter; and as he knew not what other course to take, he resolved to hazard his person among his friends in Scotland, at a time when his affairs in that kingdom were absolutely desperate. From Bretagne he posted through part of France in disguise, and embarking in a small vessel at Dunkirk, hired for that purpose, arrived on the 22nd of December at Peterhead, with six gentlemen in his retinue, one of whom was the marquis of Tinmouth, son to the duke of Berwick. He passed through Aberdeen incognito, to Fetterosse, where he was met by the earls of Mar and Marischal, and about thirty noblemen and gentlemen of the first quality. Here he was solemnly proclaimed: his declaration, dated at Commercy, was printed and circulated through all the parts of that neighbourhood; and he received addresses from the episcopal clergy, and the laity of that communion in the diocese of Aberdeen. On the 5th of January, 1716, he made his public entry into Dundee; and on the 7th arrived at Scone, where he seemed determined to stay until the ceremony of his coronation should be performed. From thence he made an excursion to Perth, where he reviewed his forces. Then he formed a regular council; and published six proclamations; one for a general thanksgiving, on account of his safe arrival; another enjoining the ministers to pray for him in churches; a third establishing the currency of foreign coins; a fourth summoning the meeting of the Convention of Estates; a fifth ordering all fensible men to repair to his standard; and a sixth, fixing the 23rd of January for his coronation. He made a pathetic speech in a grand council, at which all the chiefs of his party assisted. They determined, however, to abandon the enterprize, as the king's army was reinforced by the Dutch auxiliaries, and they themselves were not only reduced to a small number, but likewise destitute of money, arms, ammunition, forage, and provision; for the duke of Argyle had taken possession of Burnt-Island, and transported a detachment to Fife, so as to cut off Mar's communication with that fertile country.

Notwithstanding the severity of the weather, and a prodigious fall of snow, which rendered the roads almost impassable, the duke, on the 29th of January, began his march to Dumblaine, and next day reached Tullibardine, where he received intelligence that the pretender and his forces had, on the preceding day, retired towards Dundee. He forthwith took possession of Perth; and then began his march to Aberbrothick, in pursuit of the enemy. The chevalier de St. George, being thus hotly pursued, was prevailed upon to embark on board a small French ship that lay in the harbour of Montrose. He was accompanied by the earls of Mar and Melfort, the lord Drummond, lieutenant general Bulkley, and other persons of distinction, to the number of seventeen. In order to avoid the English cruizers, they stretched over to Norway, and coasting along the German and Dutch shores, arrived in five days at Graveline. General Gordon, whom the pretender had left commander in chief of the forces, assisted by the earl Marischal, proceeded with them to Aberdeen, where he secured three vessels to sail northward, and take on board the persons who intended to make their escape to the continent. Then they continued their march through Strathspey, and Strathdown, to the hills of Badenoch, where the common people were quietly dismissed. This retreat was made with such expedition, that the duke of Argyle, with all his activity, could never overtake their rear-guard, which consisted of a thousand horse, commanded by the earl Marischal.—Such was the issue of a rebellion that proved fatal to many noble families: a rebellion, which, in all probability, would never have happened, had not the violent measures of a Whig ministry kindled such a flame of discontent in the nation, as encouraged the partizans of the pretender to hazard a revolt.

The law was now put in force with all its terrors; and the prisons of London were crowded with those deluded wretches, whom the ministry seemed resolved not to pardon. The commons, in their address to the crown, declared they would prosecute, in the most rigorous manner, the authors of the late rebellion, and their resolutions were as speedy, as their measures were vindictive. The earls of Derwentwater, Nithisdale, Carnwarth, and Wintown, the lords Widrington, Kenmuir, and Nairne, were impeached, and upon pleading guilty, all but lord Wintown, who petitioned for a longer time, received sentence of death. No entreaties could soften the king or his ministers to spare the lives of these unhappy men. The house of lords even presented an address to the throne for mercy, but without effect; for the king only answered, that on this, and all other occasions, he would act as he thought most consistent with the dignity of the crown and the safety of the people. The writs for executing the six lords were therefore delivered to the lieutenant of the Tower, and to the sheriffs of London and Middlesex, on the 18th of February, 1716; and on the 24th James earl of Derwentwater, and William viscount Kenmuir, were beheaded on Tower Hill. William earl of Nithisdale was to have been executed at the same time, but he made his escape out of the Tower the night before, in a woman's dress, which had been conveyed to him by his mother. The earl of Carnwarth, and the lords Widrington and Nairne were respited till the 7th of March (u).

To second these vindictive efforts, an act of parliament was

(u) Great contests happened in the privy council concerning the execution of the six noblemen, between Daniel earl of Nottingham and others: for which, on the 28th of February, he was removed from being president of the council; and the next day his son, lord Finch, was also removed was made for trying the private prisoners in London, and not in Lancashire, where they were taken in arms (v). On the 7th of April, therefore, commissioners for trying the rebels met in the court of common pleas, when bills of high treason were found against Thomas Forster, major William Mackintosh, William Shaftoe, Robert Talbot, Henry Oxborough, Charles and Nicolas Wogan, John Hall, Richard Gascoigne, Alexander and John Menzies, and John Robertson, twelve of the Preston prisoners. Forster escaped from Newgate, and reached the continent in safety: the rest pleaded not guilty, and were allowed time to prepare for their trials. Pitts, the keeper of Newgate, being suspected of having connived at Forster's escape, was tried for his life, but acquitted. Yet notwithstanding this, Mackintosh and several others escaped from Newgate, after having mastered the keeper and turnkey, and disarmed the centinel. The court proceeded to the trials of those that remained; four or five were hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn. Among these, William Paul, a clergyman, attracted particular pity: he professed himself a true member of the church of England, but not of that schismatical church, whose bishops had abandoned their king, and shamefully given up their ecclesiastical privileges. How strong soever the taint of faction may be in any man's bosom, if he has any goodness in him, he cannot help feeling the strongest pity for those brave men, who are willing, however erroneously, to sacrifice their lives to their principles. The judges appointed to try the rebels at Liverpool, found a considerable number guilty of high treason. Two-and-twenty were executed at Preston and Manchester; about a thousand prisoners experienced the king's mercy, if such it may be called, to be transported to North America. Such was the end of a rebellion probably at first hastened forward by the rigour of the new Whig ministry and parliament (w).

In a constitution so very complicated as that of England, it must necessarily suffer alterations from time; for some of its branches will gain strength, while others will, in a similar ratio, become weaker. At this period, the orders placed between the king and the people acquired more than their share of power. The king himself being a foreigner, and ignorant of the laws and constitution of the country, was kept under the control of his ministers, who, by their private connections, governed the parliament. At the same time the people, awed by the fears of imputed Jacobitism, were afraid to murmur, and were content to give up their freedom for safety. The rebellion now extinguished, only served to confirm the arrogance of those in power. The parliament had shewn itself eager to second the views of the ministry; and the pretended danger of the state was made a pretext for continuing the parliament beyond the term fixed for its dissolution. A bill therefore was brought into the house of lords, by the duke of Devonshire, on the 10th of April, for septennial parliaments; which occasioned long debates in both houses (x).

The domestic concerns of the nation being adjusted, the king began to turn his thoughts to his Hanoverian dominions, and resolved upon a voyage to the continent. He foresaw a storm gathering on the side of Sweden. Charles the Twelfth was highly provoked against him for having entered into a confederacy with the Russians and Danes in his absence, and for having purchased the towns of Bremen and Verden from the king of Denmark, which constituted a part of his dominions. George therefore having appointed the prince of Wales guardian of the realm, and his lieutenant during his absence, his majesty set out from St. James's on the 7th of July, and two days after landed in Holland; through which he passed incognito; arrived at Hanover on the 15th; and on the 20th set out for Pyrmont, to drink the waters. In order to secure his German dominions, he entered into a new treaty with the Dutch and the regent of France; by which they agreed mutually to assist each other in case of an invasion.

The king's fears, however, on account of Sweden were not without foundation; for Charles maintained a close correspondence with the disaffected subjects of Great Britain; and a scheme was formed for the landing a considerable body of Swedish forces, with the king at their head, in some part of the island, where it was expected they would be joined by all the malcontents in the kingdom. Count Gyllenborg, the Swedish minister in London, was peculiarly active in the conspiracy; but being seized with all his papers, by order of the king, on the 29th of January, 1717, the confederacy was broke for this time. The barons Gortz and Sparre, the Swedish ministers at the Hague and Paris, were likewise concerned in this confederacy.

The king left Hanover on the 8th of January, 1717, and arrived at Margate in ten days, from whence he proceeded to London. The parliament met on the 20th of February; and on the 4th of March, in pursuance of an act, authorizing his majesty to prohibit all commerce with Sweden, so long as he should think it necessary for the safety and peace of the nation, a proclamation was issued for prohibiting commerce with that kingdom; the trade with which country was of the utmost consequence to the English merchants. A supply of two hundred and fifty thousand pounds was granted the king to enable him to secure his dominions against the threatened invasion. These were the first fruits of England's being wedded to the continent; however, the death of the Swedish monarch, who was soon after killed by a cannon ball at the siege of Fredericshall in Norway, put an end to all disquietude from that quarter.

But this was the age of treaties, subsidies, and political combinations. At that time the politicians of the age supposed that such paper chains would be sufficient to secure the permanence of dominion, but experience has undoubtedly taught the contrary. Among other treaties concluded with such hopes was that called the Quadruple Alliance. It was agreed upon between the emperor, France, England, and Holland, that the emperor should renounce all pretensions to the crown of Spain, and exchange Sardinia for Sicily with the duke of Savoy; that the successors to the dutchies of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia, should be settled on the queen of Spain's eldest son, in case the present possessors should die without male issue. This treaty, however, was by no means agreeable to the king of Spain, and consequently it became prejudical to the English, as it interrupted the commerce to that kingdom: but the interest of England was not the object which this treaty was intended to secure.

The displeasure of the king of Spain soon broke out into an open war against the emperor, whom he considered as the chief contriver of this alliance; and a numerous body of Spanish troops were sent into Italy to support Philip's pretensions in that quarter. It was in vain that the regent of France endeavoured to dissuade him; in vain the king of England offered his mediation: their interposition was rejected as partial and unjust. War, in the present exhausted state of the English finances, was a real evil; but a rupture with Spain was resolved on, in order to support a very distant interest. A strong squadron of twenty-two ships was expeditiously equipped, and sailed from St. Helen's under the command of sir George Byng, on the 4th of June, 1718, with orders to proceed to Naples, which was then threatened by the Spanish army. He was received with the greatest demonstrations removed from being one of the lords of the treasury; his brother Heneage earl of Aylesford, from being chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster; and his cousin Heneage lord Guernsey, from his place of master of the jewel office.—It should also be mentioned, that the countess of Derwentwater, with her sister, accompanied by the duchesses of Cleveland and Bolton, and several other ladies of the first distinction, was introduced by the dukes of Richmond and St. Alban's into the king's bedchamber, where she invoked his majesty's clemency for her unfortunate consort; but she implored in vain.

(v) This proceeding was considered, by some of the best lawyers, as an alteration of the ancient constitution of the kingdom, by which it was confirmed, that every prisoner should be tried in the place where the offence was committed.

(w) In taking a retrospective view of the revolutions of human affairs, it affords a melancholy consideration that, in all contentions, we generally find little to applaud on either side. We here perceive a weak and imprudent party, endeavouring not only to subvert the government, but the religion of their country. We behold a pretended monarch, bred a papist himself, and confiding in popish counsellors, professing a desire to govern and protect the protestant religion. Most of his adherents, men of desperate fortunes, indifferent morals, or narrow principles, urging on a cause which nothing but repeated slaughter could establish. On the other hand, we see them opposed by a party actuated by pride, avarice, and animosity, concealing a love of power under a specious mask of freedom; and brandishing the sword of justice, to strike a vindictive blow. Clemency in the government, at that time, would probably have extinguished all that factious spirit which afterwards so much disturbed the public tranquillity; for they must be a wretched people indeed who are more easily driven than led into obedience to authority.

(x) This attempt, in any delegated body of people, to increase their own power by extending it, is contrary to the first principles of justice. If it were right to extend their duration from three to seven years, they might also perpetuate their authority; and thus cut off even the shadow of nomination. This bill, however, passed both houses, and all objections to it were considered as marks of disaffection. The people might murmur at the encroachment, but it was too late for redress.

of joy by the inhabitants of that city, and was informed that the Spaniards, to the amount of thirty thousand men, were then actually landed in Sicily, (where they soon made themselves masters of the city and castles of Palermo, of the town of Messina, and of the greater part of the island.) In this exigence, as no assistance could be given by land, he resolved to sail thither, fully determined to pursue the Spanish fleet, on board of which they had embarked. Upon sailing round Cape Faro, he perceived two small Spanish vessels; and following them closely, they led him to their main fleet, which before noon he discovered in line of battle, amounting in all to twenty-seven sail. However, the Spanish fleet, upon perceiving the force of the English, attempted to bear away, though superior in number. The Spaniards seemed distracted in their councils, and acted with extreme confusion. They made a running fight, and the commanders behaved with courage and activity; in spite of which they were all taken except three, which were preserved by the conduct of Cammor, their vice-admiral, a native of Ireland. This action was fought on the 31st of July. Sir George Byng behaved on this occasion with equal prudence and resolution, and the king wrote him a letter, with his own hand, approving his conduct. This victory produced the resentment and complaints of the Spanish ministers in all the courts of Europe; and hastened the declaration of war on the part of the English, which had been hitherto delayed: it was declared on the 17th of December.

The rupture with Spain served once more to raise the declining expectations of the pretender and his adherents. It was hoped, that by the assistance of cardinal Alberoni, the Spanish minister, a new insurrection might be excited in England. The duke of Ormond was the person fixed upon to conduct this expedition; and he obtained from the court of Spain a fleet of ten ships of war and transports, having on board six thousand regular troops, and arms for twelve thousand more (y). Having set sail from Cadiz, in the beginning of March, and proceeded as far as Cape Finisterre, he was encountered by a violent storm, which disabled his fleet, and frustrated the expedition (z). This misfortune, together with the bad success of the Spanish arms in Sicily, and other parts of Europe, induced Philip to wish for peace; and he at last consented to sign the Quadruple Alliance. This was at that time thought an immense acquisition; but England, though she procured the ratification, had no share in the advantage of the treaty.

The king having thus given peace once more to Europe, returned from the continent to receive the addresses and congratulations of his parliament. From addressing they proceeded to an object of much greater importance; namely, the securing the dependency of the Irish parliament on that of Great Britain. One Maurice Annesley had appealed to the house of peers in England, from a decree made by the house of peers in Ireland, and this decree was reversed. The British peers ordered the barons of the exchequer in Ireland to put Mr. Annesley in possession of the lands he had lost by the decree of the lords in that kingdom. The barons of the exchequer obeyed this order; and the Irish house of peers passed a vote against them, as having attempted to diminish the privileges of the parliament of Ireland; and at the same time ordered the barons to be taken under the custody of the black-rod. On the other hand, the house of lords in England resolved, that the barons of the exchequer in Ireland had acted with courage and fidelity, and addressed the king to signify his approbation of their conduct by some marks of his favour. To complete their intention a bill was prepared, by which the Irish house of lords was deprived of all right of final jurisdiction. This bill was opposed in both houses; but particularly in that of the commons. It was there asserted by Mr. Pitt that it would only increase the power of the English peers, who already were but too formidable. Mr. Hungerford demonstrated, that the Irish lords had always exerted their power of finally deciding causes. Notwithstanding all opposition the bill was carried by a great majority, and soon after received the royal assent.

On the 30th of October, 1719, John Matthews, a printer, was tried and convicted of high treason, for printing a pamphlet intituled "Vox Populi Vox Dei," that is, "The Voice of the People the Voice of God:" for which enormous crime he was executed at Tyburn on the 6th of November!

We are now to advert to the famous South Sea scheme, the most complete piece of deception that was ever practised upon a credulous people. The king having recommended to the commons the consideration of proper means for lessening the national debt, was a prelude to the famous South Sea act, which became productive of so much mischief and infatuation. The scheme was projected by sir John Blount, who had been bred a scrivener, and was possessed of all the cunning, plausibility, and boldness requisite for such an undertaking. He communicated his plan to Mr. Aislabie, the chancellor of the exchequer, as well as to one of the secretaries of state, in January, 1720. He answered all their objections; and the project was adopted. They foresaw their own private advantage in the execution of the design, which was imparted in the name of the South Sea Company, of which Blount was a director, who influenced all their proceedings. The pretence for the scheme was to discharge the national debt, by reducing all the funds into one. The Bank and South Sea Company outbid each other. The South Sea Company altered their original plan, and offered such high terms to government, that the proposals of the Bank were rejected; and a bill was then ordered to be brought into the house of commons, formed on the plan presented by the South Sea Company, on the 1st of February. While this affair was in agitation, the stock of that company rose from one hundred and thirty to near four hundred per cent. in consequence of the conduct of the commons, who had rejected a motion, for a clause in the bill, to fix what share in the capital stock of the company should be vested in those proprietors of the annuities who might voluntarily subscribe; or how many years purchase in money they should receive in subscribing, at the choice of the proprietors.

In the house of lords, the bill was opposed by lords North and Grey, earl Cowper, the dukes of Wharton, Buckingham, and other peers. They affirm it was calculated for enriching a few, and impoverishing a great number: that it countenances the fraudulent and pernicious practice of stock-jobbing, which diverted the genius of the people from trade and industry: that it would give foreigners the opportunity to double and treble the vast sums they had in the public funds; and they would be tempted to realize and withdraw their capital and immense gains to other countries; so that Great Britain would be drained of its gold and silver: that the artificial and prodigious rise of the South Sea stock was a dangerous bait, which might decoy many unwary people to their ruin, alluring them by a false prospect of gain to part with the fruits of their industry, to purchase imaginary riches: that the addition of above thirty millions capital would give such power to the South Sea Company, as might endanger the liberties of the nation; for by their extensive interest they would be able to influence most, if not all the elections of the members, and consequently over-rule the resolutions of the house of commons. Earl Cowper urged, that in all public bargains the individuals in the administration ought to take care, that they shall be more advantageous to the state than to private persons; but that a contrary method had been followed in the contract made with the South Sea Company; for, should the stocks be kept at the advanced price to which they had been raised by the oblique arts of stock-jobbing, either that company or its principal members would gain above thirty millions, of which no more than one fourth part would be given towards the discharge of the national debts. He apprehended that the re-purchase of annuities would meet with insuperable difficulties; and, in such case, none but a few persons who were in the secret, who had bought stock at a low rate, and afterwards sold them at a high price, would in the end be gainers by the project. The earl of Sunderland answered their objections. He declared that those who countenanced the scheme of the South Sea Company, had nothing in view but the advantage of the nation. He owned that the managers for that company had undoubtedly a prospect of private gain, either to themselves or to their corporation; but, he said, when the scheme was accepted, neither the one nor the other could foresee

(y) In consequence of this transaction, a proclamation was published in Ireland, in January, 1719, offering a reward of ten thousand pounds for seizing the duke of Ormond, in case he landed, or should attempt to land in that kingdom.

(z) On the 17th of March, a proclamation was issued, offering five thousand pounds for apprehending the duke of Ormond; one thousand pounds for every other attainted peer that was with him; and five hundred pounds for every gentleman under the degree of a peer.

that

that the stocks would have risen to such a height: that if they had continued as they were, the public would have had the far greater share of the advantage accruing from the scheme; and should they be kept up to the present high price, it was but reasonable that the South Sea Company should enjoy the profits, procured to it by the wise management and industry of the directors, which would enable it to make large dividends, and thereby accomplish the purpose of the scheme. The bill passed without amendment or division, and, on the 7th of April, received the royal assent. By this act the South Sea Company was authorised to take in, by purchase or subscription, the irredeemable debts of the nation, stated at sixteen millions five hundred forty-six thousand four hundred eighty-two pounds, seven shillings, one penny farthing, at such times as they should find convenient before the first day of March of the ensuing year, and without any compulsion on any of the proprietors, at such rates and prices as should be agreed upon between the company and the respective proprietors. They were likewise authorized to take in all the redeemable debts, amounting to the same sum as that of the irredeemables, either by purchase, by taking subscriptions, or by paying off the creditors. For the liberty of taking in the national debt, and increasing their capital stock accordingly, the company consented that their present, and to be increased annuity, should be continued at five per cent. till Midsummer, in the year one thousand seven hundred and twenty-seven; from thence to be reduced to four per cent. and be redeemable by parliament. In consideration of this and other advantages expressed in the act, the company declared themselves willing to make such payments into the receipt of the exchequer as were specified for the use of the public, to be applied to the discharge of the public debts incurred before Christmas, in the year 1716. The sums they were obliged to pay for the liberty of taking in the redeemable debts, four year's and a half's purchase for all the long and short annuities that should be subscribed, and one year's purchase for such long annuities as should not be subscribed, amounted on the execution of the act to about seven millions. For enabling the company to raise this sum, they were empowered to make calls for money from their members; to open books of subscription; to grant annuities redeemable by the company; to borrow money upon any contract or bill under their common seal, or on the credit of their capital stock; to convert the money demanded of their members into additional stock, without, however, making any addition to the company's annuities, payable out of the public duties. It was enacted, that out of the first monies arising from the sums paid by the company into the exchequer, such public debts carrying interest at five per cent. incurred before the 25th of December, in the year 1716, founded upon any former act of parliament, as were now redeemable, or might be redeemed before the 25th of December, in the year 1722, should be discharged in the first place: that then all the remainder should be applied towards paying off so much of the capital stock of the company as should then carry an interest of five per cent. It was likewise provided, that after Midsummer, in the year 1722, the company should not be paid off in any sums being less than one million at a time.

While the South Sea scheme was carrying on, the heads of the Royal Assurance and London Assurance Companies, understanding that the civil list was considerably in arrears, offered to the ministry six hundred thousand pounds towards the discharge of that debt, on condition of their obtaining the king's charter, with a parliamentary sanction for the establishment of their respective companies. The proposal was embraced; and the king communicated it in a message to the house of commons, desiring their concurrence. A bill was immediately passed, enabling his majesty to grant letters of incorporation to the two companies. It soon obtained the Royal assent; and, on the 11th of June, an end was put to the session. This was the age of interested projects, inspired by a venal spirit of adventure, the natural consequence of that avarice, fraud, and profligacy, which the monied corporations had introduced. This of all others is the most unfavourable æra for an historian.

Blount, the projector of the South Sea scheme, had taken the hint of his plan from the famous Mississipi scheme, formed by John Law, which in the preceding year had raised such a ferment in France, and entailed ruin upon many thousand families of that kingdom. In the scheme of Law, there was something substantial. An exclusive trade to Louisiana promised some advantage; though the design was defeated by the frantic eagerness of the people. Law himself became the dupe of the regent, who transferred the burthen of fifteen hundred millions of livres of the king's debts to the shoulders of the subjects; while the projector was sacrificed as the scapegoat of the political iniquity. The South Sea scheme promised no commercial advantage of any consequence. It was buoyed up by nothing but the folly and rapaciousness of individuals, which became so blind and extravagant, that Blount, with moderate talents, was able to impose upon the whole nation, and make tools of the other directors, to serve his own purposes, and those of a few associates. When this projector found that the South Sea stock did not rise according to his expectation upon the bills being passed, he circulated a report, that Gibraltar and Port Mahon would be exchanged for some places in Peru; by which means the English trade to the South Sea would be protected and enlarged. This rumour, diffused by his emissaries, acted like a contagion. In five days the directors opened their books for a subscription of one million, at the rate of three hundred pounds for every hundred pounds capital. Persons of all ranks crowded to the house in such a manner, that the first subscription exceeded two millions of original stock. In a few days this stock advanced to three hundred and forty pounds; and the subscriptions were sold for double the price of the first payment. Without entering into a detail of the proceedings, or explaining the scandalous arts that were practised to enhance the value of the stock, and decoy the unwary, we shall only observe, that by the promise of prodigious dividends, and other infamous arts, the stock was raised to one thousand; and the whole nation infected with the spirit of stock-jobbing to an astonishing degree. All distinctions of party, religion, sex, character, and circumstance, were swallowed up in this universal concern, or in some pecuniary project. Exchange Alley was filled with a strange concourse of statesmen and clergymen, churchmen and dissenters, Whigs and Tories, physicians, lawyers, tradesmen, and even with multitudes of females. All other professions and employments were utterly neglected; and the people's attention wholly engrossed by this and other chimerical schemes, which were known by the denomination of bubbles. New companies started up every day, under the countenance of the prime nobility. The prince of Wales was constituted governor of the Welch copper company: the duke of Chandos appeared at the head of the York-buildings company: the duke of Bridgewater formed a third, for building houses in London and Westminster. About an hundred such schemes were projected and put in execution, to the ruin of many thousands. The sums proposed to be raised by these expedients amounted to three hundred millions sterling, which exceeded the value of all the lands in England. The nation was so intoxicated with the spirit of adventure, that people became a prey to the grossest delusion. An obscure projector, pretending to have formed a very advantageous scheme, which, however, he did not explain, published proposals for a subscription, in which he promised, that in one month the particulars of his project fhould be disclosed. In the mean time, he declared that every person paying two guineas should be entitled to a subscription for one hundred pounds, which will produce that sum yearly. In one forenoon this adventurer received a thousand of these subscriptions; and in the evening set out for another kingdom. The king issued a proclamation against these unlawful projects; the lords justices afterwards dismissed all the petitions that had been presented for charters and patents; and the prince of Wales renounced the company of which he had been elected governor. The South Sea scheme raised such a flood of eager avidity and extravagant hope, that the majority of the directors were swept along with it, even contrary to their own sense and inclination; but Blount and his accomplices still directed the stream.

The infatuation prevailed till the 8th of September, when the stock began to fall. Then did some of the adventurers awake from their delirium. The number of the sellers daily increased. On the 29th of the month, the stock had sunk to one hundred and fifty; several eminent goldsmiths and bankers, who had lent great sums upon it, were obliged to stop payment, and abscond. The ebb of this portentous tide was so violent, that it bore down every thing in its way; and an infinite number of families was overwhelmed overwhelmed with ruin. Public credit sustained a terrible shock; the nation was thrown into a dangerous ferment; and nothing was heard but the ravings of grief, disappointment, and despair. Some principal members of the ministry were deeply concerned in these fraudulent transactions: when they saw the price of stock sinking daily, they employed all their influence with the Bank to support the credit of the South Sea Company. That corporation agreed, though with reluctance, to subscribe into the stock of the South Sea Company, valued at four hundred per cent. three millions five hundred thousand pounds, which the company was to repay to the Bank on Lady-day and Michaelmas of the ensuing year. This transaction was managed by Mr. Robert Walpole, who, with his own hand, wrote the minute of the agreement, afterwards known by the name of the Bank contract. Books were opened at the Bank, to take in a subscription for the support of public credit; and considerable sums of money were brought in. By this expedient the stock was raised at first, and those who contrived it seized the opportunity to realize. But the bankruptcy of the Goldsmiths and the Sword-blade Company, from the fall of South-Sea stock, occasioned such a run upon the Bank, that the money was paid away faster than it could be received from the subscription. Then the South Sea stock sunk again; and the directors of the Bank, finding themselves in danger of being involved in the company's ruin, renounced the agreement, which, indeed, they were under no obligation to perform, for it was drawn up in such a manner, as to be no more than the rough draft of a subsequent agreement, without due form, penalty, or clause of obligation. All expedients having failed, and the clamours of the people daily increasing, expresses were dispatched to Hanover, representing the state of the nation, and pressing the king to return. He accordingly shortened his intended stay in Germany, and arrived in England on the 11th of November.

The parliament being assembled on the 8th of December, his majesty expressed his concern for the unhappy turn of affairs, which had so deeply affected the public credit at home; he earnestly desired the commons to consider of the most effectual and speedy methods to restore the public credit, and fix it upon a lasting establishment. The lower house was too much interested in the calamity to postpone the consideration of that subject. The members seemed to lay aside all party distinctions, and vie with each other in promoting an enquiry, by which justice might be done to the injured nation. They ordered the directors to produce an account of all their proceedings. Sir Joseph Jekyl moved, that a select committee might be appointed, to examine the particulars of this transaction. Mr. Walpole, now paymaster of the forces, observed, that such a method would protract the enquiry, while the public credit lay in a bleeding condition. He told the house he had formed a scheme for restoring public credit; but, before he would communicate this plan, desired to know, whether the subscriptions of public debts and incumbrances, money-subscriptions, and other contracts made with the South Sea Company, should remain in the present state. After a warm debate the question was carried in the affirmative, with this addition, "Unless altered for the ease and relief of the proprietors, by a general court of the South Sea Company, or set aside in the due course of law." Next day Walpole produced his scheme to engraft nine millions of South Sea stock into the Bank of England, and the like sum into the East India Company on certain conditions. The house voted that proposals should be received from the Bank, and those two companies, on this subject. These being delivered, the commons resolved, that an engrossment of nine millions of the capital stock of the Bank and East-India Company, as proposed by these Companies, would contribute very much to the restoring public credit. A bill upon this resolution was brought in, passed through both houses and received the royal assent. Another bill was enacted into a law, for restraining the sub-governor, deputy-governor, directors, treasurer, under treasurer, cashier, secretary, and accountants, of the South Sea Company, from quitting the kingdom till the end of the next session of parliament; and for discovering their estates and effects, so as to prevent them from being transported or alienated. A committee of secrecy was chosen by ballot, to examine all the books, papers, and proceedings, relating to the execution of the South Sea act.

The lords were not less eager than the commons to prosecute this enquiry, though divers members in both houses were deeply involved in the guilt and infamy of the transaction. Earl Stanhope said, the estates of the criminals, whether directors or not directors, ought to be confiscated, to repair the public losses. He was seconded by lord Carteret, and even by the earl of Sunderland. The duke of Wharton declared he would give up the best friend he had, should he be found guilty. He observed, that the nation had been plundered in the most flagrant and notorious manner; therefore, they ought to find out and punish the offenders severely, without respect of persons. The sub and deputy governors, the directors and officers of the South Sea Company, were examined at the bar of the house. Then a bill was brought in, disabling them to enjoy any office in that company, or in the East-India Company, or in the Bank of England. Three brokers were likewise examined, and made great discoveries. Knight, the treasurer of the South Sea Company, who had been entrusted with the secrets of the whole affair, thought proper to withdraw himself from the kingdom. A proclamation was issued to apprehend him, and another for preventing any of the directors from escaping from the kingdom. At this period, the secret committee informed the house of commons, that they had already discovered a train of the deepest villainy and fraud, that hell ever contrived to ruin a nation, which in due time they would lay before the house: in the meanwhile they thought it highly necessary to secure the persons of some of the directors, and principal officers of the South Sea Company, as well as to seize their papers. An order was made to secure the books and papers of Knight, Surman, and Turner. The persons of sir George Caswell, sir John Blount, sir John Lambert, sir John Fellows, and Mr. Grigsby, were taken into custody. Sir Theodore Jansen, Mr. Sawbridge, sir Robert Chaplain, and Mr. Eyles, were expelled the house, and apprehended. Mr. Aislabie resigned his employments of chancellor of the exchequer, and lord of the treasury; and orders were given to remove all directors of the South Sea Company, from the places they possessed under the government.

The lords, in the course of their examination, discovered that large portions of South Sea stock had been given to several persons in the administration and house of commons, for promoting the passing of the South Sea act. The house immediately resolved, that this practice was a notorious and most dangerous species of corruption; that the directors of the South Sea Company have ordered great quantities of their stock to be bought for the service of the company, when it was at a very high price, and on pretence of keeping up the price of stock; and at the same time several of the directors, and other officers belonging to the company, having, in a clandestine manner, sold their own stock to the company, such directors and officers were guilty of a notorious fraud and breach of trust, and their so doing was one great cause of the unhappy turn of affairs, that had so much affected public credit. Many other resolutions were taken against that infamous confederacy, in which, however, the innocent were confounded with the guilty. Sir J. Blount refusing to answer certain interrogations, a violent debate arose about the manner in which he should be treated. The duke of Wharton observed, that the government of the best princes was sometime rendered intollerable to their subjects by bad ministers; he mentioned the example of Sejanus, who had made a division in the Imperial family, and rendered the name of Claudius hateful to the Romans. Earl Stanhope conceiving this reflection was aimed at him, was seized with a transport of anger. He undertook to vindicate the ministry; and spoke with such vehemence as produced a violent head-ach which obliged him to retire. He underwent proper evacuations, and seemed to recover: but next day, in the evening, became lethargic, and being seized with a suffocation, instantly expired. The king deeply regretted the death of his favourite minister, which was the more unfortunate, as it happened at such a critical conjuncture, and he appointed lord Townshend to fill his place of secretary. Earl Stanhope was survived but a few days by the other secretary, Mr. Craggs, who died of the small-pox on the 16th of February. Knight, the cashier of the South Sea Company, being seized at Tirlemont, by the vigilance of Mr. Gandot, secretary to Mr. Leathes, the British resident at Brussels, was confined in the citadel of Antwerp. Application was made to the court of Vienna, that he should be delivered up to such persons as might be appointed to receive him: but he found means to interest the states of Brabant in his behalf. They insisted upon their privilege granted by charter, that no person apprehended for any crime in Brabant, should be tried in any other country. The house of commons expressed their indignation at this frivolous pretence; instances were renewed to the emperor; and, in the mean time, Knight escaped from the citadel of Antwerp.

The committee of secresy found, that, before any subscription could be made, a fictitious stock of five hundred and seventy-four thousand pounds had been disposed of by the directors, to facilitate the passing of the bill. Great part of this was distributed among the earl of Sunderland, Mr. Craggs senior, the duchess of Kendal, the countess of Platen and her two nieces, Mr. Secretary Craggs, and Mr. Aislabie, chancellor of the exchequer. In consequence of the committees report, the house came to several severe, though just resolutions, against the directors and officers of the South Sea Company; and a bill was prepared for the relief of the unhappy sufferers. Mr. Stanhope, one of the secretaries of the treasury, charged in the report with having large quantities of stock and subscriptions, desired that he might have an opportunity to clear himself. His request was granted; and the affair being discussed, he was cleared by a majority of three voices. Fifty thousand pounds in stock had been taken by Knight for the use of the earl of Sunderland. Great part of the house entered eagerly into this enquiry; and a violent dispute ensued. The whole strength of the ministry was mustered in his defence. The majority declared him innocent; the nation in general was of another opinion. He resigned his place of first commissioner of the treasury, which was bestowed upon Mr. Robert Walpole; but he still retained the confidence of his master. With respect to Mr. Aislabie, the evidence appeared so strong against him, that the commons resolved, he had promoted the destructive execution of the South Sea scheme, with a view to his own exorbitant profit, and combined with the directors in their pernicious practices, to the ruin of public credit. He was expelled the house, and committed to the Tower. Mr. Craggs senior, died of the small pox before he underwent the censure of the house Nevertheless, they resolved that he was a notorious accomplice with Robert Knight, and some of the directors, in carrying on their scandalous practices; and therefore, that all the estate of which he was possessed, from the first day of December in the preceding year, should be applied towards the relief of the unhappy sufferers in the South Sea Company. The directors, in obedience to the order of the house, delivered inventories of their estates, which were confiscated by act of parliament, towards making good the damages sustained by the company, after a certain allowance was deducted from each, according to his conduct and circumstances.

The delinquents being thus punished by the forfeiture of their fortunes, the house converted their attention to means for repairing the mischiefs which the scheme had produced. This was a very difficult task, on account of the contending interests of those engaged in the South Sea Company, which rendered it impossible to relieve some but at the expence of others. Several wholesome resolutions were taken, and presented with an address to the king, explaining the motives of their proceedings. On the 29th of July, 1721, the parliament was prorogued for two days only. Then his majesty, going to the house of peers, declared that he had called them together again so suddenly, that they might resume the consideration of the state of public credit. The commons immediately prepared a bill upon the resolutions they had taken. The whole capital stock, at the end of the year 1720, amounted to about thirty-seven millions eight hundred thousand pounds. The stock allotted to all the proprietors did not exceed twenty-four millions five hundred thousand pounds: the remaining capital stock belonged to the company in their corporate capacity. It was the profit arising from the execution of the South Sea scheme; and out of this the bill enacted, that seven millions should be paid to the public. The present act likewise directed several additions to be made to the stock of the proprietors, out of that possessed by the company in their own right: it made a particular distribution of stock, amounting to two millions two hundred thousand pounds; and, upon remitting five millions of the seven to be paid to the public, annihilated two millions of their capital. It was enacted, that after these distributions, the remaining capital stock should be divided among all the proprietors. This dividend amounted to thirty-three pounds six shillings and eight pence per cent. and deprived the company of eight millions nine hundred thousand pounds. They had lent above eleven millions on stock unredeemed; of which the parliament discharged all the debtors, upon their paying ten per cent. Upon this article the company's loss exceeded six millions nine hundred thousand pounds; for many debtors refused to make any payment. The proprietors of the stock loudly complained of their being deprived of two millions; and the parliament, in the sequel, revived that sum which had been annihilated. While this affair was in agitation, petitions from counties, cities, and boroughs, in all parts of the kingdom, were presented to the house, crying for justice against the villainy of the directors. Pamphlets and papers were daily published on the same subject; so that the whole nation was exasperated to the highest pitch of resentment. Nevertheless, by the wise and vigorous resolutions of the parliament, the South Sea Company was soon in a condition to fulfil their engagements with the public: the ferment of the people subsided; and the credit of the nation was restored.

The Quakers having presented a petition to the house of commons, praying that a bill might be brought in for omitting in their solemn affirmation, the words, "In the presence of Almighty God," the house complied with their request; but the bill gave rise to a warm debate among the peers. Dr. Atterbury, bishop of Rochester, said he did not know why such a distinguishing mark of indulgence should be allowed to a set of people who were hardly Christians. He was supported by the archbishop of York, the earl of Strafford, and lord North and Grey. A petition was presented against the bill by the London clergy, who expressed a serious concern lest the minds of good men should be grieved and wounded, and the enemies of Christianity triumph, when they should see such condescension made by a Christian legislature, to a set of men who renounce the divine institutions of Christ; particularly that by which the faithful are initiated into his religion, and denominated Christians. The petition, though presented by the archbishop of York, was branded by the ministry as a seditious libel, and rejected by the majority.

The discontents occasioned by the public calamities once more gave the disaffected party hopes of succeeding: but in all their counsels they were weak, divided, and wavering. The duke of Orleans, regent of France, is said to be the first who gave the king information of a recent conspiracy carried on by many persons of the first distinction, joined by several malcontents of inferior quality. In consequence of this information, which was given in the beginning of May, 1722, a camp was formed in Hyde Park, and all military officers were ordered to repair to their respective stations. Lieutenant-general Macartney was dispatched to Ireland to bring over troops from that kingdom; and the states of Holland were called upon to be ready with their guaranty. The people thus excited by new terrors, every day expected an invasion, and looked where the vengeance of government was likely to fall.

The first person who was seized upon was Francis Atterbury, bishop of Rochester, a prelate who had long been odious in the estimation of the present government, and possessed of abilities to render him formidable to any ministry he opposed. His papers were seized, and himself committed to the Tower. Soon after the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Orrery, the lords North and Grey, and some others of inferior rank, were arrested and thrown into prison. Of all these, however, only the bishop, and Mr. Layer, a barrister, felt the severity of government, the proofs against the rest amounting to no convictive evidence. A bill was brought into the house of commons, impeaching bishop Atterbury, although he pleaded his privilege as a peer. This met with some opposition in that house, yet it was resolved by a great majority in the house of commons, that he should be deprived of his dignity and benefice, and should be banished the kingdom for ever. The bishop made no defence in the lower house, reserving all his force, which he intended to exert in the house of lords. In that house his cause had many friends; and his own eloquence, politeness, and ingenuity, procured him many more. His cause coming before that assembly, a long and warm debate ensued; in which the contest was more equally managed than the ministry expected. As there was little or no proof against him except what arose from intercepted letters, which were written in cyphers, the earl of Pawlet insisted that such could not be construed into treason or offence. The duke of Wharton having summed up the depositions, and shewn the insufficiency of them, concluded with saying, that let the consequences be what they may, he hoped the lustre of that house would never be tarnished by condemning a man without evidence. Lord Bathurst also spoke in the bishop's favour, observing, that if such extraordinary proceedings were countenanced, he saw nothing remaining for him and others, but to retire to their country houses, and there, if possible, quietly to enjoy their estates within their own families, since the most trifling correspondence, or any intercepted letter, might be made criminal. Then turning to the bench of bishops, he said, he could hardly account for the inveterate hatred and malice which some persons bore to the ingenious bishop of Rochester, unless it was, that, infatuated like the wild Americans, they fondly hoped to inherit not only the spoils, but even the abilities of the man they should destroy. Notwithstanding all that was said in the bishop's favour, the bill passed against him in May, 1723, several lords entering their protests against it; by which he was deprived of all offices, benefices, and dignities, and rendered incapable of enjoying any for the future: he was banished the realm, and subjected to the pains of death in case he should return, as were all persons who should correspond with him during his exile. It should be observed, that the other party said very little, being conscious of a majority in their favour. Among the members of the house of commons, who exerted themselves in behalf of the bishop, was the celebrated Dr. Freind, who was himself soon after taken into custody on suspicion of treasonable practices; but he was admitted to bail on Dr. Mead's becoming security for him. The sentence against the bishop of Rochester being confirmed, he was, on the 22nd of June, 1723, put on board the Aldborough man of war, which landed him at Calais, with his daughter, Mrs. Morrice, and her husband (a). The bishop continued in exile and poverty till he died, though it may not be improper to observe, that Dr. Sacheverel dying some time before him, left him by will five hundred pounds (b).

The fate of Christopher Layer, Esq. was more severe. Being brought to his trial at the bar of the King's Bench, on the 21st of November, 1722, he was convicted of having enlisted men for the pretender's service, of having endeavoured to stir up a rebellion, and he received sentence of death. The circumstances of this conspiracy are not clearly known. It is said, that the intention of the conspirators was, by introducing a number of foreign officers and soldiers into England unobserved, to prepare a junction with the duke of Ormond, who was to have landed in the river with a great quantity of arms provided for that purpose. However this be, Mr. Layer was reprieved from time to time, and many methods tried to make him discover his accomplices; but he continued stedfast in his trust, and suffered death at Tyburn on the 17th of May, 1723. His head was fixed on a pole at Temple Bar.

The session of parliament, which commenced on the 12th of November, 1724, was distinguished by a remarkable incident, in which the interests and security of the nation were more deeply concerned. This was the trial of Thomas Parker, earl of Macclesfield, lord high chancellor of Great Britain. This nobleman had connived at certain venal practices touching the sale of places, and the money of suitors deposited, with the masters of chancery, so as to incur the general reproach of the nation. He found it necessary to resign the great seal in the beginning of January, 1725 (c). On the 9th of the ensuing month, the king sent a message to the commons, importing, that his majesty, having reason to apprehend that the suitors in the court of chancery were in danger of losing a considerable sum of money, from the insufficiency of some of the masters, thought himself obliged in justice and compassion to the said sufferers, to take the most speedy and proper method the law would allow, for enquiring into the state of the master's accounts, and securing their effects for the benefit of the suitors; and his majesty having had several reports laid before him, in pursuance of the directions he had given, had ordered the reports to be communicated to the house, that they might have as full and as perfect a view of this important affair as the shortness of the time, and the circumstances and nature of the proceedings, would admit. These papers being taken into consideration, sir George Oxendon observed, that enormous abuses had crept into the high court of chancery: that the crimes and misdemeanors of the late lord chancellor were many and various, but might be reduced to the following heads: that he had embezzled the estates and effects of many widows, orphans, and lunatics: that he had raised the offices of masters in chancery to an exorbitant price; trusting in their hands large sums of money belonging to suitors, that they might be enabled to comply with his extraordinary demands; and that in several cases he had made divers irregular orders. He therefore moved, That Thomas, earl of Macclesfield, should be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors. Mr. Pulteney moved, That this affair might be left to the consideration of a select committee. Sir William Wyndham asserted, that in proceeding by way of impeachment upon reports from above, they would make a dangerous precedent; and seem to give up the most valuable of their privileges, the inquest after state criminals. The question being put, it was carried for the impeachment. The earl was accordingly impeached at the bar of the upper house: a committee was appointed to prepare articles; and a bill was brought in, to indemnify the masters in chancery from the penalties of the law, upon discovering what considerations they had paid for their admission to their respective offices. The trial lasted twenty days; during which the earl proved that such sums had been usually received by former lords chancellors. The earl was, however, convicted of fraudulent practices; and condemned in a fine of thirty thousand pounds, with imprisonment until that sum should be paid. He was immediately committed to the Tower, where he continued about six weeks; but upon producing the money he was discharged; and sir Peter King, now created baron of Oakham, succeeded him in the office of chancellor.

In this manner the corruption, venality and avarice of the times, had increased with the riches and luxury of the nation. Commerce introduced fraud, and wealth introduced prodigality. Religion, which might, in some measure, put a stop to these evils, was rather discouraged than promoted by the legislature. The houses of convocation, which had hitherto met purposely to inspect the morals of the people, and to maintain decency and dignity in the church, were now entirely discontinued. Their disputes among each other were assigned as the cause; but a ministry, studious of the morals of the people, would have permitted them to dispute, and kept up their zeal by their activity. But internal regulations were not what the ministry at that time attended to. The chief object of their attention was to gratify the sovereign with a continual round of foreign treaties and alliances. It was natural for a king born and bred in Germany, where all sovereignty is possessed upon such precarious tenures, to introduce the same spirit into the British constitution, however independent it might be as to the rest of Europe. This reign therefore was begun by treaties, and the latter part of it was burthened with them. The chief object of all was to secure to the king his German dominions, and to exclude the pretender from those of Britain. To effect both purposes, England paid considerable subsidies to many different states in Europe for the promise of their protection and assistance; but it most commonly happened, that the connection was changed, or a variance ensued, even before the stipulations on either side were capable of being executed. In this reign there were concluded no less than nine treaties. The barrier convention treaty, a defensive alliance with the emperor, the triple alliance, the convention treaty, the quadruple alliance, the congress of Cambray, the treaty of Hanover, the treaty of Vienna, and the convention with Sweden and Hesse Cassel. All these various and expensive negociations were mere political playthings; they amused for a while, and were since neglected.

It must, however, be owned, that the parliament made some new efforts to check the progress of vice and immorality, which now began to be diffused through every rank of life: but they were supported neither by the co-operation of the ministry, nor the voice of the people. The

(a) On the same day that bishop Atterbury landed at Calais, the famous lord Bolingbroke arrived there on his return to England, having, for some secret reasons, obtained his majesty's pardon. Dr. Atterbury being informed of this circumstance, could not help observing, with a smile, that "they were exchanged."

(b) Dr. Sacheverel died June 5, 1724.

(c) In consequence of the earl of Macclesfield's resignation, the great seal was committed to the custody of sir Joseph Jekyll, master of the rolls, sir Jeffery Gilbert, one of the barons of the exchequer, and sir Robert Raymond, one of the justices of the King's Bench.

treaties which had lately been concluded with Spain were already broken; but the spirit of commerce was so eager that no restrictions could bind it. Admiral Hosier was sent about the close of March, 1726, to the West Indies, with a view to intercept the Spanish galeons; but the Spaniards being apprized of his design, relanded their treasure. The admiral lay inactive on that station, until he became the jest of the Spaniards. He retired to Jamaica, where he found means to reinforce his crews; then he stood over to Carthagena. The Spaniards had by this time seized the English South-sea ship at La Vera-Cruz, together with all the vessels and effects belonging to that company. Hosier in vain demanded restitution: he took some Spanish ships by way of reprisal, and continued cruising in those seas until the greater part of his men perished deplorably by the diseases of that unhealthy climate; and his ships were totally ruined by the worms. This brave officer being restricted by his orders from obeying the dictates of his courage, seeing his best officers and men daily swept off by an outrageous distemper, and his ships exposed to inevitable destruction, is said to have died of a broken heart; while the people of England loudly clamoured against this unfortunate expedition, in which so many lives were thrown away, and so much money expended, without the least advantage to the nation. It seems to have been a mean, piratical scheme, to rob the court of Spain of its expected treasure, even while a peace subsisted between the two nations. The ministry of Great Britain indeed alledged, that the Spanish king had entered into engagements in favour of the pretender. In order to retaliate these hostilities, the Spaniards undertook the siege of Gibraltar, but with as little success on their side. In this dispute France offered her mediation, and such a reconciliation as treaties could procure was the consequence; a temporary reconciliation ensued, and both sides only watched the occasion to renew hostilities with advantage.

It was now two years since the king had visited his electoral dominions of Hanover; accordingly, on the 31st of May, 1727, he declared in council his intention of going to the continent. He therefore appointed the lords justices for the administration of the government, during his absence, and embarked at Greenwich on the 3rd of June, attended by the earl of Ilay and lord Townshend: on the 7th he arrived at Vaert in Holland, where he lay that night. On the 9th he arrived at Delden, between ten and eleven at night, to all appearance in perfect health, and supped there very heartily. He pursued his journey about four o'clock the next morning, but between eight and nine he ordered his coach to stop. It being perceived that one of his hands lay motionless, Monsieur Fabrice, who had formerly been servant to the king of Sweden, and who now attended king George, attempted to quicken the circulation by chaffing it between his own. As this had no effect, the surgeon, who followed on horseback, was called, and he also rubbed it with spirits. Soon after the king's tongue began to swell, and he had just strength enough to bid them hasten to Osnabruc. Then falling insensible into Fabrice's arms, he never recovered, but expired about eleven o'clock the next morning, June 11, 1727, aged sixty-seven years and fourteen days; and having reigned twelve years, ten months, and ten days (d). His body was conveyed to Hanover, where it was interred among his ancestors.

George the First was neither unpleasing in his person nor his countenance; nor did he disgust fastidious observers by a want of grace or of dignity in his manners and address. It must be allowed that his talents were not brilliant; but that his intellects were particularly weak or defective, it would be unjust to assert; though it does not appear that he had greatly improved them by scientific pursuits. His first entrance into public life was in the capacity of a warrior. At the early age of fifteen he served with reputation against the French; and he afterwards distinguished himself in the confederate army, which, under the conduct of the gallant Sobieski, compelled the Turks to relinquish the siege of Vienna. As a general, he was cool and cautious; and he prudently watched all opportunities of advantage. In the department of politics he was not destitute of skill. He was conversant in the arts of negociation; he understood the interests of different states, and the intricacies of the Germanic system; and he was vigilantly attentive to all the motions of the European powers. But, unfortunately for Great Britain, he rendered her strength and resources subservient to the benefit and preservation of his electorial territories. For these (particularly for his more recent acquisitions) he felt a constant alarm: these were the foundations of his frequent and multifarious treaties; these he was more anxious to secure against his jealous enemies, than his kingdom against the attempts of the pretender; and, when he equipped fleets and armies, he had an eye to the ultimate protection of his favourite possessions, under the pretence of resisting invasions for which this island was sufficiently prepared, and of guarding against insurrections which he did not dread. This conduct convinced the reflecting part of the nation, that the act of settlement was imperfect, in the want of a provision for preventing the subjection of the British and Hanoverian dominions to the same sovereign. In the government of his electorate, he was remarkable for his clemency and moderation, exercised over those who were slaves by prescription. He was sensible of the natural claims of the whole human race to freedom, and scorned to act as a tyrant or an oppressor. Such being his sentiments and his practice, he was gratified with the esteem, the reverence, and the affection of his German subjects. With the inhabitants of Britain he was less popular; and the predilection and prejudices which we have mentioned will amply account for this circumstance. In his administration of this kingdom he did not sufficiently attend to its true interests; and we have reason to lament, that he found, among the natives, many who were willing, from personal ambition, to second his views, and render this country, as it were, a province of Hanover. The influence of royalty will always command such compliant tools of state. The general disposition of George was grave and sedate; but he was not an enemy to mirth, or a stranger to cheerful indulgence. He was capable of the familiarity of private friendship, and of the easy relaxation of sovereign dignity. He was frank and sincere, generous and grateful, just and humane. He was observant of religious ordinances, and of moral decorum. To unchaste enjoyments, however, he is said to have been not averse; but in these and other gratifications he did not rush into excess. He seems to have been unreasonably severe in the capacity of a husband; for, either on suspicion or proof of the adulterous guilt of his wife (e), he subjected her to a state of perpetual confinement, in the castle of Ahlen in the electorate of Brunswic.

(d) He died in the palace of his only surviving brother, Ernest Augustus, bishop of Osnabruc, and duke of York; a prince of an amiable character, who died in the following year.

(e) This princess was named Sophia Dorothea, and was the daughter and heiress of George William, duke of Zell. By her George the First had only two children, viz. George Augustus, born October 30, 1683, who succeeded to his father's dominions; and a daughter, Sophia Dorothea, born March 16, 1687, who was married to Frederic William the Second, king of Prussia.

BOOK XIII.

COMPRIZING THE REIGN OF GEORGE THE SECOND.

CHAPTER I.

UPON the death of George the First, his son, George the Second, came to the throne. He was a person of inferior abilities to the late king, and strongly biassed with a partiality to his dominions on the continent. Upon his advancement to the kingly office, the business of government was chiefly conducted by lord Townshend, a man of extensive knowledge, and great skill in the interests of the different states of Europe; the duke of Newcastle, a nobleman of large connexions among the great, but rather of inferior abilities; and the earl of Chesterfield, a man of wit, insinuation, and address, though rather averse to the drudgery of business. But the chief person, and he who shortly after engrossed the greatest share of power, was sir Robert Walpole (f), who was formerly so actively employed in supporting the house of Hanover.

The house of commons, which had hitherto been distinguished by the appellations of Hanoverians and Jacobites, now altered their names with their principles, and the parties on either side went by the names of the Court and the Country. Both sides had been equally active in bringing in the Hanoverian family, and consequently neither was much afraid of the reproach of disaffection. The court party, who were listed under the banners of the ministry, were for favouring all their schemes, and for applauding all the measures of the crown. They were taught to regard foreign alliances and continental connections, as conducive to internal security; they considered England as unable or unfit to be trusted to defend herself, and paid the troops of other countries for the promises of future assistance. The two houses seemed to vie with each other in expressions of applause and affection to his majesty. The lords, in their address, hailed him as the best of kings, and true father of his country. The commons expressed the warmest sense of gratitude for the blessings they enjoyed in his reign, though it was not yet eight months old. They approved of all his transactions; promised to support him in all his undertakings; and declared they would cheerfully grant whatever supplies should be wanted for the public service. Having considered the estimates which were laid before them by order of his majesty, they voted two-and-twenty thousand nine hundred and fifty-five men for guards and garrisons; and fifteen thousand seamen for the service of the ensuing year. They granted two hundred and thirty thousand nine hundred and twenty-three pounds, for the maintenance of twelve thousand Hessian troops; a subsidy of fifty thousand pounds to the king of Sweden; and half that sum to the duke of Brunswick Wolfenbuttel (g). The expence of the year amounted to four millions, raised by a land tax of three shillings in the pound, a malt tax, and by borrowing of the Bank one million seven hundred and fifty thousand pounds, for which, annuities to the amount of seventy thousand pounds, to be raised by duties on coals imported into the city of London, were granted to that corporation.

All these sums, however, were not granted without question. The number of land forces occasioned a debate; and the Hessian auxiliaries were not allowed without dispute and opposition. When they deliberated on the loan of the Bank, Mr. W. Pulteney observed, that the shifting of funds was but perpetuating taxes, and putting off the evil day: that notwithstanding the great merit which some persons had built on the sinking fund, it appeared that the national debt had been increased since the setting up that pompous project. Some warm altercation passed between him and sir Robert Walpole on this subject. The lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of London, presented a petition, setting forth, that the duties already laid upon coals and culm, imported into London, affected the trade of that city only; that the inequality of the burthen was a great discouragement to their manufactures, and an hardship upon all the trading inhabitants. The petition was rejected, and the tax imposed. The house having addressed the king for a particular and distinct account of the distribution of two hundred and fifty thousand pounds, charged to have been issued for securing the trade and navigation of the kingdom, and preserving and restoring the peace of Europe, he declined granting their request, but signified in general, that part of the money had been issued and disbursed by his late majesty, and the remainder by himself, for carrying on the same necessary services, which required the greatest secresy. Such a message in the reign of William the Third would have raised a dangerous flame in the house of commons.

Of the foreign treaties and alliances sir Robert Walpole appears to have been the leader; and such as he could not convince by his eloquence, he persuaded by the more powerful argument of places and pensions. The other side, who went by the name of the country party, were entirely averse to continental connections. They complained that immense sums were lavished on subsidies which could never be useful; and that alliances were bought with money from nations that should rather contribute to England for her protection. These looked upon the frequent journies of the king to Hanover with a jealous eye, and sometimes hinted at a partiality shewn in the royal breast in its favour. These were joined by the high-flying Tories, who now began to perceive their own cause desperate; and as they were leagued with men who did not fear the reproach of Jacobitism, they gave and acquired greater confidence. As the court party generally alarmed the house of commons with imaginary dangers and concealed conspiracies; so they, on the country side, generally declaimed against the encroachments of the prerogative, and the overgrown power of the crown. The complaints of neither were founded in fact: the kingdom was in no danger of invasions from abroad, nor from plots at home; nor was the crown, on the other hand, gaining any accession of power, but rather every day losing somewhat of its authority by insensible diminution. The king, chiefly attentive to his foreign dominions, regarded but little his prerogatives at home; and he could admit of many limitations in England, to be possessed of plenary power in dominions which he probably more highly esteemed.

There seem to be two objects of controversy which, during the whole reign of George the Second, rose up in debate every session, and tried the strength of the opponents; these were the national debt, and the number of forces to be kept in pay. The government, at the accession of the present king owed more than thirty millions of money; and though there was a long continuance of profound peace, yet this sum was continually increasing. It

(f) This gentleman had arisen from low beginnings, through two successive reigns, into great consideration. He was considered as a martyr to his cause, in the reign of queen Anne; and when the Tory party could no longer oppress him, he still preserved that hatred against them with which he set out. Being raised in the beginning of this reign to the head of the treasury, he probably set off by endeavouring to serve his country; but soon meeting with strong opposition, his succeeding endeavours were rather employed in keeping his situation than in adorning it. To defend the declining prerogative of the crown, might perhaps have been the first object of his attention; but soon after those very measures, by which he pretended to secure it, proved the most effectual means to lessen it. By corrupting the house of commons, he encreased their riches and their power; and they were not averse to voting away those millions which he permitted them so liberally to share. As such a tendency in him naturally produced opposition, he was possessed of a most phlegmatic insensibility to reproach, and a calm dispassionate method of reasoning upon such topics as he desired should be believed. His discourse was fluent, but without dignity; and his manner convincing from its apparent want of art.

(g) Nothing, says Dr. Smollett, vol. ii. p. 472, could be a greater burlesque upon negociation than this treaty of alliance concluded with the petty duke of Brunswick Wolfenbuttel; who very gravely guarantees to his Britannick majesty the possession of his three kingdoms, and obliges himself to supply his majesty with five thousand men, in consideration of an annual subsidy of five-and-twenty thousand pounds for four years.

was much wondered at by the country party how this could happen; and it was the constant business of the court to give plausible reasons for the increase, and to furnish new matter of surprize to be debated upon in the ensuing session. Thus demands for fresh supplies were made every session of parliament, either for the purposes of securing friends upon the continent, of guarding the kingdom from internal conspiracies, or of enabling the ministry to act vigorously in conjunction with the powers in alliance abroad. It was vainly alledged, that those expences were incurred without prescience or necessity; and that the increase of the national debt, by multiplying and increasing taxes, would at last become an intolerable burthen. These arguments were offered, canvassed, and rejected; the court party was always victorious, and every demand which was made by the ministers was granted with cheerfulness, and even profusion.

The Spaniards were the first nation who shewed the futility of treaties to bind, when any advantage was to be procured by infraction. The extreme avidity of our merchants, and the natural jealousy of that nation, produced every day encroachments on our side, and as arbitrary seizures on theirs. The people of our West India islands had long carried on an illicit trade with the subjects of Spain upon the continent, but whenever detected were rigorously punished, and their cargoes confiscated to the crown. In this temerity of adventure on the one hand, and vigilance of pursuit and punishment on the other, it must often have happened that the innocent must suffer with the guilty, and many complaints were made, perhaps founded in justice, that the English merchants were plundered by the Spanish king's vessels upon the southern coasts of America, as if they had been pirates.

Other merchants complained by petition of the losses sustained by the Spaniards. The house, in a grand committee, deliberated on this subject, enquired into the particulars, examined evidence, and drew up an address to the king, desiring his majesty would be graciously pleased to use his utmost endeavours for preventing such depredations; for procuring just and reasonable satisfaction; and for securing to his subjects the free exercise of commerce and navigation to and from the British colonies in America. The king assured them he would use his best endeavours to answer the desires and expectations of his people, in an affair of so much importance; and they, in another address, thanked him for his gracious answer. They did not, however, receive such a satisfactory reply to a former address, touching the sum of sixty thousand pounds that had been stated in the public account, without specification of the particular uses to which it was applied. His majesty gave them to understand, that the money had been issued and disbursed for secret services; and that a distinct and particular account of the distribution of it could not be given, without a manifest prejudice to the public. A bill was prepared for the more effectual preventing bribery and corruption in elections for members of parliament; and it passed through the house without opposition: but their attention was chiefly employed upon the Spanish depredations, which had raised a great clamour through the whole kingdom, and excited very warm disputes in parliament; for they were generally reputed the fruits of negligence, incapacity, or want of vigour in the ministers. The commons having made further progress in the enquiry, and received fresh petitions from the merchants, passed some resolutions in which the Spaniards were accused of having violated the treaty between the two crowns; and with having treated inhumanly the masters and crews of ships belonging to Great Britain (h). They justified the instructions given to admiral Hosier, to seize and detain the flotilla and galleons of Spain, until justice and satisfaction should be rendered to his majesty and his allies; nay, even declared that such seizure would have been just, prudent, and necessary, tending to prevent an open rupture, and to preserve the peace and tranquillity of Europe. They again addressed the king to use his endeavours to procure satisfaction; and he promised to comply with their request.

Mr. Scroope, member for Bristol, moved for an address, entreating his majesty to order an account of the produce of the civil list revenues for one year to be laid before the house. The address was presented, the account produced, and the house, in a grand committee, took this affair into consideration. The courtiers affirmed that they fell short of the eight hundred thousand pounds settled upon his majesty, and Mr. Scroope proposed, that the sum of one hundred and fifteen thousand pounds should be granted to the king, on account of those deficiencies and arrears. The motion was vigorously opposed by Mr. Pulteney and other members. They expressed their surprize that it should be made so late in the session, when no further demand of money could be reasonably expected; and they said it was the more extraordinary, because it appeared in the former session, from the examination of the accounts then before the house, that the revenues of the civil list produced yearly a much greater sum than that for which they were given. Mr. Pulteney moved that the accounts and papers should be referred to the examination of a select committee, properly empowered to investigate the truth. The ministers opposed this motion; and the question being put, it passed in the negative. The majority voted the sum demanded: and, in a bill for settling the price of imported corn, they inserted the resolution for granting to his majesty the sum of one hundred and fifteen thousand pounds, on account of arrears due on the civil list revenues.

The house of lords having prepared a bill for the more effectual punishment of forgery, which was passed into a law, and ordered the judges to bring in another on the report of a committee appointed to consider the case of imprisoned debtors, at length deliberated upon the state of the nation, particularly the positive demand made by the court of Spain for the restitution of Gibraltar, grounded on a letter written by the late king to his catholic majesty. From a copy of the letter laid before the house, it plainly appeared that king George I. had consented to this restitution. A motion being made for a resolution, importing, that for the honour of his majesty, and the preservation and security of the trade and commerce of the kingdom, effectual care should be taken in the present treaty, that the king of Spain should renounce all claim and pretension to Gibraltar and Minorca, in plain and strong terms: a debate ensued, and the question being put, passed in the negative, though not without a protest. Then the majority resolved, that the house did entirely rely upon his majesty, that he would, for maintaining the honour and securing the trade of this kingdom, take effectual care, in the present treaty, to preserve his undoubted right to Gibraltar and Minorca. When the house examined the papers relating to the Spanish depredations, many severe reflections were uttered against the conduct of the ministry; and a motion was made, to resolve that Hosier's expedition was an unreasonable burthen on the nation: but this too, was rejected, and occasioned another protest. Nor did the clause in the corn-bill, for granting one hundred and fifteen thousand pounds to his majesty, pass through the house of peers without warm opposition. Divers lords alledged, that instead of a deficiency in the civil-list revenues, there was a considerable surplus: that this was a new grant, and a new burthen on the people: that the nation was loaded, not to complete, but to augment the sum designed for the civil list; and this at a time when the public debts were increased; when the taxes were heavily felt in all parts of the country; when the foreign trade of Britain was incumbered and diminished; when her manufactures were decayed, her poor multiplied, and she was surrounded by many other national calamities. They observed, that if the produce of the civil list revenue should not amount to the yearly sum of eight hundred thousand pounds, the deficiency must be made good to his majesty by the public; whereas no provision was made, by which, if the produce of these revenues should exceed that sum, the surplus could accrue to the benefit of the public: that, by this precedent, not only real deficiencies were to be made good, but also supplies were to be given for arrears standing out at the end of every year, which should come on before the supplies could be granted, though the supply given to make good arrears in one year, would certainly increase the surpluses in another: that the revenues of the civil list were variable in their own nature; and even when there is a deficiency in the produce, there might be arrears in the receipt: these might be easily encreased by the management of designing ministers, by private directions to receivers, and by artful methods of stating accounts. All these arguments, and other objections equally strong and plausible, against this unconscionable and unparliamentary motion, served only to evince the triumph of the ministry over shame and sentiment, their contempt of public spirit, and their defiance of national reproach (i).

(h) They examined the evidence of several who had been unjustly seized, and treated with great cruelty. One man, the master of a trading vessel, had been used by the Spaniards in a shocking manner; he gave in his evidence with great precision, informed the house of the manner in which they had plundered and stripped him, of their cutting off his ears, and their preparing to put him to death. "I then looked up (cried he), to my God for pardon, and to my country for revenge."

The king had, on the 24th of March, 1729, given the royal assent to five bills; and on the 14th of May, the same sanction was given to thirty other bills, including an act, enabling the queen to be regent in the kingdom during his majesty's absence, without taking the oaths; and another for the relief of insolvent debtors. At the same time two-and thirty private bills were passed: then the king expressed his approbation of the parliament, signified his intention to visit his German dominions, and ordered the chancellor to prorogue both houses. His majesty having appointed the queen regent of the realm, set out for Hanover, on the seventeenth of May, in order to remove a petty misunderstanding which had happened between that electorate and the court of Berlin. Some Hanoverian subjects had been pressed or decoyed into the service of Prussia; and the regents of Hanover had seized certain Prussian officers by way of reprisal. The whole united kingdom of Great Britain at this juncture enjoyed uninterrupted repose; and commerce continued to increase, in spite of all restriction and discouragement. The people of Ireland found themselves happy under the government of lord Carteret; and their parliament assembling in the month of September, approved themselves the fathers of their country. They established funds for the discharge of their national debt, and for maintaining the expence of government: they enacted wholesome laws for the encouragement of manufactures, trade, and agriculture; and they formed wise regulations in different branches of civil economy. Some time after this session, which was conducted with so much harmony and patriotism, lord Carteret returned to England, and was succeeded by the duke of Dorset in the government of that kingdom. In the month of May, Charles lord Townshend resigned the seals, which were given to colonel Stanhope, now created earl of Harrington; so that sir Robert Walpole now reigned without a rival. James, earl of Waldegrave was appointed ambassador to the court of France, which, about that time, was filled with joy by the birth of a Dauphin.

In the month of September, Victor Amadeus, king of Sardinia, resigned his crown to his son Charles Emanuel, prince of Piedmont. The father reserved to himself a revenue of one hundred thousand pistoles per annum, retired to the castle of Chamberry, and espoused the countess dowager of St. Sebastian, who declined the title of queen, but assumed that of marchioness of Somerive. Though the congress at Soissons proved abortive, conferences were begun at Seville, between the plenipotentiaries of England, France, and Spain; and a treaty was concluded on the 9th of November, not only without the concurrence of the emperor, but even contrary to his right, as established by the quadruple alliance. On this subject he communicated an Imperial commissorial decree to the states of the empire assembled in the diet at Ratisbon, which was answered by the French minister de Chavigny. In October, Peter II. czar of Muscovy, and grandson of Peter I. died in the fifteenth year of his age, at Moscow, and was succeeded on the Russian throne by the princess Anne Ivanowna, second daughter of John Alexowitz, elder brother of the first Peter, and widow of Frederic William duke of Courland.

The British parliament assembling on the 13th of January, the king gave them to understand, that the peace of Europe was now established by the treaty of Seville, built upon the foundation of former treaties, and tending to render more effectual what the contracting powers in the quadruple alliance were before engaged to see performed. He assured them, that all former conventions made with Spain in favour of the British trade and navigation were renewed and confirmed: that the free, uninterrupted exercise of their commerce was restored: that the court of Spain had agreed to an ample restitution and reparation for unlawful seizures and depredations: that all rights, privileges, and possessions, belonging to him and his allies, were solemnly re-established, confirmed, and guaranteed; and that not one concession was made to the prejudice of his subjects. He told them he had given orders for reducing a great number of his land forces, and for laying up great part of the fleet; and observed that there would be a considerable saving in the expence of the current year. After both houses had presented their addresses of thanks and congratulation to the king on the peace of Seville, the lords took that treaty into consideration, and it did not pass enquiry without severe animadversion (k).

A warm debate was excited by a bill which the courtiers brought in, to prevent any subjects of Great Britain from advancing sums of money to foreign princes of state, without having obtained licence from his majesty, under his privy seal, or some greater authority. The minister pretended that this law was proposed to disable the emperor, who wanted to borrow a great sum of the English merchants, from raising and maintaining troops to disturb the tranquillity of Europe. The bill contained a clause, empowering the king to prohibit by proclamation all such loans of money, jewels, or bullion: the attorney general was empowered to compel, by English bill, in the court of exchequer, the effectual discovery, on oath, of any such loans; and it was enacted, that in default of an answer to any such bill the court should decree a limited sum against the person refusing to answer. Mr. Daniel Pulteney argued strenuously against this bill, as a restraint upon trade that would render Holland the market of Europe, and the mart of money to the nations of the continent. He said, that by this general prohibition, extending to all princes, states or potentates, the English were totally disabled from assisting their best allies: that the bill would render the exchequer a court of inquisition; and that whilst it restrained our merchants from assisting the princes and powers of Europe, it permitted our stock-

(i) The peers that distinguished themselves in the opposition, were Beaufort, Strafford, Craven, Foley, Litchfield, Scarsdale, Gower, Mountjoy, Plymouth, Bathurst, Northampton, Coventry, Oxford, and Mortimer, Willoughby de Broke, Boyle, and Warrington.

(k) The lords in the opposition excepted to the article by which the merchants of Great Britain were obliged to make proof of their losses at the court of Spain. They said this stipulation was a hardship upon British subjects, and dishonourable to the nation: that few would care to undertake such a troublesome and expensive journey, especially as they had reason to apprehend their claims would be counterbalanced by the Spaniards; and, after all, they would have no more than the slender comfort of hoping to obtain that redress by commissaries which they had not been able to procure by plenipotentiaries. They thought it very extraordinary, that Great Britain should be bound to ratify and guarantee whatever agreement should be made between the king of Spain and the dukes of Parma and Tuscany, concerning the garrisons once established in their countries: that the English should be obliged to assist in effectuating the introduction of six thousand Spanish troops into the towns of Tuscany and Parma, without any specification of the methods to be taken, or the charge to be incurred in giving that assistance: that they should guarantee for ever, not only to Don Carlos, but even to all his successors, the possession of the estates of Tuscany and Parma; a stipulation which in all probability would involve Great Britain in endless quarrels and disputes, about a country with which they had no concern. They affirmed that the treaty of Seville, instead of confirming other treaties, was contradictory to the quadruple alliance, particularly in the article of introducing Spanish troops into Tuscany and Parma, in the room of neutral forces stipulated by the former alliance; and agreeing that they should there remain until Don Carlos and his successors should be secure and exempt from all events. They complained that these alterations, from the tenor of the quadruple alliance, were made without the concurrence of the emperor, and even without inviting him to accede; an affront which might alienate his friendship from England, and hazard the loss of such an ancient, powerful, and faithful ally: they declared that throughout the whole treaty there seemed to be an artful omission of any express stipulation, to secure Great Britain in her right to Gibraltar and Minorca. Such was the substance of the objections made to the peace: then lord Bathurst moved for a resolution, that the agreement on the treaty of Seville, to secure the succession of Don Carlos to the duchies of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia, with Spanish troops, was a manifest violation of the fifth article of the quadruple alliance, tending to involve the nation in a dangerous and expensive war, and to destroy the balance of power in Europe. The question was put, and the motion rejected. Such too was the fate of two other motions, to resolve that Great Britain's right of sovereignty, dominion, possession, and claim to Gibraltar and Minorca, were not ascertained by the treaty of Seville; and that the stipulations in that treaty for repairing the losses of the British merchants were insufficient and precarious. The majority, far from stigmatising this transaction, resolved, that the treaty did contain all necessary stipulations, for maintaining and securing the honour, dignity, rights, and possessions of the crown: that all due care was taken therein for the support of the trade of the kingdom, and for repairing the losses sustained by the British merchants. On these resolutions an address of approbation was founded: but when a motion was made for an address to his majesty, that he would order to be laid before the house a list of all pensions payable to the crown, it was immediately resolved in the negative. Divers contests of the same kind arose upon the mutiny-bill, the pension-bill, and the maintenance of the twelve thousand Hessians; but the ministry bore down all opposition, though their triumphs were clogged with vigorous protests, which did not fail to make impression upon the body of the people.

jobbers to trade in their funds without interruption. Being however supported by the whole weight of ministerial influence, the bill not only passed through the house, but was afterwards enacted into a law.

The subsidies were continued to the landgrave of Hesse Cassel and the duke of Brunswick Wolfenbuttel, in spite of all that could be urged against these extraneous incumbrances; and the supply for the ensuing year was granted according to the estimates which the ministry thought proper to produce, amounting to about two millions two hundred and eighty thousand pounds. It must be owned, however, for the credit of this session, that the house appropriated one million of the surplusses arising from the sinking fund towards the discharge of the national debt; and by another act extinguished the duties upon salt, by which expedient the subject was eased of a heavy burthen, not only in being freed from the duty, but also from a considerable charge of salaries given to a great number of officers employed to collect this imposition. They likewise encouraged the colony of Carolina with an act, allowing the planters and traders of that province to export rice directly to any part of Europe, southward of Cape Finisterre; and they permitted salt from Europe to be imported into the colony of New York. The term of the exclusive trade granted by act of parliament to the East India Company drawing towards a period, many considerable merchants and others made application for being incorporated and vested with the privilege of trading to those countries, proposing to lay that branch of trade open to all the subjects of Great Britain, on certain conditions. In consideration of an act of parliament for this purpose, they offered to advance three millions two hundred thousand pounds, for redeeming the fund and trade of the present East India Company. This proposal was rejected; and the exclusive privilege vested in the company was, by act of parliament, protracted to the year 1766, upon the following conditions: that they should pay into the exchequer the sum of two hundred thousand pounds, towards the supplies of the year, without interest or addition to their capital stock: that the annuity or yearly fund of one hundred and sixty thousand pounds, payable to them from the public, should be reduced to one hundred and twenty-eight thousand: that after the year 1766, their right to the exclusive trade should be liable to be taken away by parliament, on three years notice, and repayment of their capital.

On the 15th of May, 1730, the king went to the house of peers, and closed the session. In his speech he expressed his joy, that notwithstanding all the clamours which were raised, the parliament had approved of those matters which fell under their consideration; a circumstance which, he said, could not fail to inspire all mankind with a just detestation of those incendiaries, who, by scandalous libels, laboured to alienate the affections of his people; to fill their minds with groundless jealousies and unjust complaints, in dishonour of him and his government, and in defiance of the sense of both houses of parliament (l). The emperor was so much incensed at the insult offered him in the treaty of Seville, with respect to the garrisons of Tuscany and Parma, that he prohibited the subjects of Great Britain from trading in his dominions: he began to make preparations for war and actually detached bodies of troops to Italy, with such dispatch as had been very seldom exerted by the house of Austria. Yet the article of which he complained was not so much a real injury as an affront put upon the head of the empire; for the eventual succession to those Italian duchies had been secured to the infant, Don Carlos, by the quadruple alliance, and all that the emperor required, was, that the prince would receive the investiture of them as fiefs of the empire.

In Great Britain this year was not distinguished by any transaction of great moment. Seven chiefs of the Cherokee nations of Indians in America were brought to England by sir Alexander Cumin. Being introduced to the king, they laid their crown and regalia at his feet; and by an authentic deed acknowledged themselves subject to his dominion, in the name of all their compatriots, who had vested them with full power for this purpose. They were amazed and confounded at the riches and magnificence of the British court: they compared the king and queen to the sun and moon, the princes to the stars of heaven, and themselves to nothing. They gave their assent in the most solemn manner to articles of friendship and commerce, proposed by the lords commissioners for trade and plantations; and being loaded with presents of necessaries, arms, and ammunition, were re-conveyed to their own country, which borders on the province of South Carolina.

England was at this period infested with robbers, assassins, and incendiaries, the natural consequences of degeneracy, corruption, and the want of police in the interior government of the kingdom. This defect, in a great measure, arose from an absurd notion, that laws necessary to prevent those acts of cruelty, violence, and rapine, would be incompatible with the liberty of British subjects; a notion that confounds all distinctions between liberty and brutal licentiousness, as if that freedom was desirable, in the enjoyment of which people find no security for their lives or effects. The peculiar depravity of the times was visible even in the conduct of those who preyed upon the commonwealth. Thieves and robbers were now become more desperate and savage than ever they had appeared since mankind was civilized. In the exercise of their rapine, they wounded, maimed, and even murdered the unhappy sufferers, through a wantonness of barbarity. They circulated letters, demanding sums of money from certain individuals, on pain of reducing their houses to ashes, and their families to ruin; and even set fire to the house of a rich merchant in Bristol, who had refused to comply with their demand. The same species of villainy was practised in different parts of the kingdom; so that the government was obliged to interpose, and offer a considerable reward for discovering the ruffians concerned in such execrable designs.

In the speech with which the king opened the session of parliament on the 21st of January, 1731, he told them, that the present critical conjuncture seemed in a very particular manner to deserve their attention; that as the transactions then depending in the several courts of Europe were upon the point of being determined, the great event of peace or war might be very much affected by their first resolutions, which were expected by different powers with great impatience. He said, the continuance of that zeal and vigour with which they had hitherto supported him and his engagements must at this time be of the greatest weight and importance, both with regard to his allies, and to those who might be disposed, before the season of action, to prevent, by an accommodation, the fatal consequences of a general rupture. The former scene was repeated. Both houses, in their addresses, promised to support his majesty in all his engagements: yet the members in the opposition demonstrated the absurdity of promising to fulfil engagements, before they could possibly know whether or not they were for the service of Great Britain. Another bill was brought into the house of commons, to prevent pensioners from sitting as members of parliament; and, after a third reading, carried up to the lords for their concurrence. When the supply fell under consideration, the debates were renewed upon the subsidies to the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel and the duke of Wolfenbuttel, which, however, were continued: and every article was granted according to the estimates given in for the expence of the ensuing year. Two petitions being presented to the commons, representing the delays of justice, occasioned by the use of the Latin tongue in proceedings at law, a bill was brought in for changing this practice, and enacting, That all those processes and pleadings should be uttered in the English language. A great number of merchants from different parts of the kingdom having repeated their complaints of depredations and cruelties committed by the Spaniards in the West Indies, their petitions were referred to the consideration of a grand committee. Their complaints upon examination appeared to be well founded. The house presented an address to the king, desiring his majesty would be graciously pleased to continue his endeavour to prevent such depredations for the future; to procure full satisfaction for the damages already sustained;

(l) In the course of this session the commons passed a bill for making more effectual the laws in being, for disabling persons from being chosen members of parliament who enjoyed any pension during pleasure, or for any number of years, or any offices holden in trust for them, by obliging all persons hereafter to be chosen to serve for the commons in parliament, to take the oath therein mentioned. In all probability this bill would not have made its way through the house of commons, had not the minister been well assured it would stick with the upper house, where it was rejected at the second reading, though not without violent opposition.

tained; and to secure to the British subjects the full and uninterrupted exercise of their trade and navigation to and from the British colonies in America.

The house of peers proceeded to consider the state of the national debt: they read a bill for the free importation of wool from Ireland into England, which was fiercely opposed, and laid aside, contrary to all the rules of sound policy. On the 7th of May parliament was prorogued, after the king had given them to understand, that all apprehensions of war were now happily removed, by a treaty signed at Vienna between him and the emperor. He said it was communicated to the courts of France and Spain, as parties to the treaty of Seville, the execution of which it principally regarded; and that it was likewise submitted to the consideration of the states general. He observed, that the conditions and engagements into which he had entered on this occasion were agreeable to that necessary concern which the British nation must always have for the security and preservation of the balance of power in Europe: and that this happy turn, duly improved with a just regard to former alliances, yielded a favourable prospect of seeing the public tranquillity re-established.

In the month of January the duke of Parma died, after having made a will in which he declared his duchess was three months advanced in her pregnancy; entreating the allied powers of Europe to have compassion upon his people, and defer the execution of their projects until his consort should be delivered. In case the child should be still born, or die after the birth, he bequeathed his dominions and allodial estates to the Infant Don Carlos of Spain; and appointed five regents to govern the duchy. Notwithstanding this disposition, a body of Imperial troops immediately took possession of Parma and Placentia, under the command of general Stampa, who declared they should conduct themselves with all possible regularity and moderation, and leave the administration entirely to the regents whom the duke had appointed. They publicly proclaimed in the market place, that they took possession of these duchies for the infant, Don Carlos: and that if the duchess dowager should not be delivered of a prince, the said Infant might receive the investiture from the emperor whenever he would, provided she should come without an army. Though these steps seemed to threaten an immediate war, the king of Great Britain and the States general interposed their mediation so effectually with the court of Vienna, that the emperor desisted from the prosecution of his design; and on the 16th of March concluded at Vienna a treaty with his Britannic majesty, by which he consented to withdraw his troops from Parma and Placentia. He agreed, That the king of Spain might take possession of these places in favour of his son Don Carlos, according to the treaty of Seville. He likewise agreed, That the Ostend company, which had given such umbrage to the maritime powers, should be totally dissolved, on condition that the contracting powers concerned in the treaty of Seville should guarantee the pragmatic sanction, or succession of the Austrian hereditary dominions to the heirs female of the emperor, in case he should die without male issue. The Dutch minister residing at the Imperial court did not subscribe this treaty, because, by the maxims received in that republic, and the nature of her government, he could not be vested with full powers so soon as it would have been necessary: nevertheless the States General was by a separate article, expressly named as a principal contracting party.

On the 22nd of July a new treaty was signed at Vienna between the emperor and the kings of Great Britain and Spain, tending to confirm the former. In August a treaty of union and defensive alliance between the electorates of Saxony and Hanover, was executed at Dresden. The court of Spain expressing some doubts with regard to the pregnancy of the duchess of Parma, she underwent a formal examination by five midwives of different nations, in presence of the older duchess dowager, several ladies of quality, three physicians and a surgeon; and was declared with child: nevertheless, after having kept all Europe in suspense for six months, she owned she had been deceived; and general Stampa, with the Imperial forces, took formal possession of the duchies of Parma and Placentia. Spain and the great duke of Tuscany having acceded to the last treaty of Vienna, the crown of Great Britain engaged to equip an armament that should convoy Don Carlos to his new dominions. Accordingly, sir Charles Wager sailed with a strong squadron from Portsmouth on the 26th of August; and in September arrived at Barcelona, where being joined by the Spanish fleet and transports, they sailed together to Leghorn; from whence the admiral returned to England. Don Carlos passed through part of France, and embarking at Antibes on board of the Spanish gallies, arrived at Leghorn in December. Then the Imperial general withdrew his forces into the Milanese; and the Infant took possession of his new territories.

The parliament of Great Britain, meeting on the 13th of January, 1732, the king in his speech declared, that the general tranquillity of Europe was restored and established by the last treaty of Vienna; and Don Carlos was actually possessed of Parma and Placentia; and that six thousand Spaniards were quietly admitted and quartered in the duchy of Tuscany, to secure, by the express consent and agreement of the great duke, the reversion of his dominions; and that a family convention was made between the courts of Spain and Tuscany, for preserving mutual peace and friendship in the two houses.

An interval of peace succeeded, in which scarcely any events happened that deserve the remembrance of the historian. Such intervals are the seasons of happiness, for history is generally little more than the register of human contention and calamity. During this interval the disputes between the court and country party in the British parliament were carried on with unceasing animosity. Both sides, from moderate beginnings, at last fairly listed themselves in the cause, not of truth, but of party. Measures proposed by the ministry, though tending to the benefit of the nation, were opposed by their antagonists, who, on their side also, were abridged the power of carrying any act, how beneficial soever it might have been. A calm disinterested reader is now surprized at the heat with which many subjects at that time, of little importance in themselves, were discussed.

A society of men, in this interested age of seeming benevolence, had united themselves into a company, by the name of the Charitable Corporation. This company was first erected in the year 1707. Their professed intention was to lend money at legal interest to the poor, upon small pledges; and to persons of better rank upon an indubitable security of goods impawned. Their capital was at first limited to thirty thousand pounds; but, by licences from the crown, they increased it to six hundred thousand pounds, though their charter was never confirmed by act of parliament. In the month of October, George Robinson, esq. member for Marlow, the cashier, and John Thompson, warehouse-keeper of the corporation, disappeared in one day. The proprietors alarmed at this incident, held several general courts, and appointed a committee to inspect the state of their affairs. They reported, that for a capital of above five hundred thousand pounds, no equivalent was found; inasmuch as their effects did not amount to the value of thirty thousand, the remainder having been embezzled by means which they could not discover. The proprietors, in a petition to the house of commons, represented that by the most notorious breach of trust in several persons to whom the care and management of their affairs were committed, the corporation had been defrauded of the greatest part of their capital; and that many of the petitioners were reduced to the utmost degree of misery and distress; they therefore prayed, that as they were unable to detect the combinations of those who had ruined them, or to bring the delinquents to justice, without the aid of the power and authority of parliament, the house would vouchsafe to enquire into the state of the corporation, and the conduct of their managers; and give such relief to the petitioners as to the house should seem meet. The petition was graciously received, and a secret committee appointed to proceed on the enquiry. They soon discovered a most iniquitous scene of fraud, which had been acted by Robinson and Thompson, in concert with some of the directors, for embezzling the capital, and cheating the proprietors. Many persons of rank and quality were concerned in this infamous conspiracy: and even some of the first characters in the nation did not escape censure. Sir Robert Sutton and sir Archibald Grant were expelled the house of commons, as having had a considerable share in those fraudulent practices: a bill was brought in, to restrain them and other delinquents from leaving the kingdom, or alienating their effects (m).

During this session there was not any motion which produced

(m) In the mean time, the committee received a letter from Signor John Angelo Belloni, an eminent banker at Rome, giving them to understand,

duced such a warm contest as did that of sir Robert Walpole, when, after a long preamble, he proposed that the duties on salt, which about two years before had been abolished, should now be revived, and granted to his majesty, his heirs, and successors, for the term of three years. In order to sweeten this proposal, he declared that the land-tax for the ensuing year should be reduced to one shilling in the pound. All the members of the country party were immediately in commotion. They expressed their surprize at the grossness of the imposition. They observed, that two years had scarcely elapsed since the king, in a speech from the throne, had exhorted them to abolish some of the taxes that were the most burthensome to the poor: the house was then of opinion, that the tax upon salt was the most burthensome, and most pernicious to the trade of the kingdom, of all the impositions to which the poor were subjected, and therefore it was taken off: but that no good reason could be produced for altering their opinion so suddenly, and resolving to grind the faces of the poor, in order to ease a few rich men of the landed interest, they affirmed, that the most general taxes are not always the least burthensome: that after a nation is obliged to extend their taxes farther than the luxuries of their country, those taxes that can be raised with the least charge to the public, are the most convenient and easiest to the people: but they ought carefully to avoid taxing those things which are necessary for the sustenance of the poor. The price of all necessaries being thus enhanced, the wages of the tradesman and manufacturer must be increased; and where these are high the manufactures will be undersold by those of cheaper countries. Sir Robert Walpole endeavoured to obviate all these objections in a long speech, which was minutely answered and refuted in every article by Mr. Pulteney. Nevertheless, the question being put, the minister's motion was carried in the affirmative, and the duty revived: yet, before the bill passed, divers motions were made, and additional clauses proposed by the members in the opposition. New debates were raised on every new objection, and the courtiers were obliged to dispute their ground by inches.

The pension bill was revived, and for the third time rejected in the house of lords. A committee had been appointed to enquire into a sale of the estate which had belonged to the late earl of Derwentwater. It appeared by the report, that the sale had been fraudulent: a bill was prepared to make it void: Dennis Bond, esquire, and serjeant Birch, commissioners for the sale of the forfeited estates, were declared guilty of a notorious breach of trust, and expelled the house, of which they were members: George Robinson, esquire, underwent the same sentence, on account of the part he acted in the Charitable Corporation, as he and Thompson had neglected to surrender themselves, according to the terms of a bill which had passed for that purpose. During this session, five members of parliament were expelled for the most sordid acts of knavery; a sure sign of national degeneracy and dishonour. All the supplies were granted, and, among other articles, the sum of two-and-twenty thousand six hundred and ninety-four pounds, seven shillings, and sixpence, for the agio or difference of the subsidies payable to the crown of Denmark, in pursuance of the treaty subsisting between the late king and that monarch: but this was not obtained without a violent dispute (n).

Nor did the house of peers tamely submit to the measures of the ministry. The pension bill, being read, was again rejected, and a protest entered. A debate arose about the number of standing forces; and the earl of Chesterfield argued for the court motion. The earl of Oxford moved that they might be reduced to twelve thousand effective men. The earl of Winchelsea observed, that a standing army rendered ministers of state more daring than otherwise they would be, in contriving and executing projects that were grievous to the people: schemes that never could enter into the heads of any but those who were drunk with excess of power. The marquis of Tweedale, in reasoning against such a number as the ministry proposed, took occasion to observe, that not one shilling of the forfeited estates was ever applied to the use of the public: he likewise took notice, that the eighteen thousand men, demanded as a standing force, were modelled in such a manner, that they might be speedily augmented to forty thousand men on any emergency; nevertheless, victory declared for the minister. The parliament having granted every branch of the supply, towards the payment of which they borrowed a sum from the sinking fund, and passed divers other acts for the encouragement of commerce and agriculture, the king, on the first of June, gave the royal assent to the bills that were prepared, and closed the session, after having informed both houses that the States General had acceded to the treaty of Vienna: that he had determined to visit his German dominions, and to leave the queen regent in his absence. He accordingly set out for Hanover in the beginning of June, 1732. By this time the Pragmatic Sanction was confirmed by the diet of the empire, though not without a formal protest by the electors Palatine, Bavaria, and Saxony.

The most remarkable incident that distinguished this year in England was a very uncommon instance of suicide; an act of despair so frequent among the English, that in other countries it was objected to them as a national reproach. Though it may be generally termed the effect of lunacy proceeding from natural causes operating on the human mind, in some few instances it seems to have been the result of cool deliberation. Richard Smith, a bookbinder, and prisoner for debt within the liberties of the King's Bench, persuaded his wife to follow his example in making away with herself, after they had murdered their little infant. This wretched pair were in the month of April found hanging in their bed-chamber, about a yard's distance from each other; and in a separate apartment the child lay dead in a cradle. They left two papers enclosed in a short letter to their landlord, whose kindness they implored in favour of their dog and cat. They even left money to pay the porter who should carry the enclosed papers to the person for whom they were addressed. In one of these the husband thanked that person for the marks of friendship he had received at his hands; and complained of the ill offices he had undergone from a different quarter. The other paper, subscribed by the husband and wife, contained the reasons which induced them to act such a tragedy on themselves and their offspring. This letter was altogether surprising for the calm resolution, the good humour, and the propriety with which it was written. They declared, that they withdrew themselves from poverty and rags; evils that, through a train of unlucky accidents, were become inevitable. They appealed to their neighbours for the industry with which they had endeavoured to earn a livelihood. They justified the murder of their child, by saying, it was less cruelty to take her with them, than to leave her friendless in the world, exposed to ignorance and misery. They professed their belief and confidence in an Almighty God, the fountain of goodness and beneficence, who could not possibly take delight in the misery of his creatures: they, therefore, resigned up their lives to him without any terrible apprehensions; submitting themselves to those ways which, in his goodness, he should appoint after death. These unfortunate suicides had been always industrious and frugal, invincibly honest, and remarkable for conjugal affection.

Trustees having been appointed by charter to superintend a new settlement in Georgia, situated to the southward of Carolina in America, Mr. Oglethorpe, as general and governor of the province, embarked at Gravesend, with a number of poor families, to plant that colony. The dispute which had long subsisted between the king of Prussia and the young prince of Orange, touching the succession to the estates possessed by king William III. as head of the house of Orange, was at last accommodated stand, that Thompson was secured in that city, with all his papers, and confined to the castle of St. Angelo; and that the papers were transmitted to his correspondent at Paris, who would deliver them up, on certain conditions stipulated in favour of the prisoner. This letter was considered as an artifice to insinuate a favourable opinion of the pretender, as if he had taken measures for securing Thompson, from his zeal for justice, and affection for the English people. On this supposition, the proposals were rejected with disdain; and both houses concurred in an order that the letter should be burned at the Royal Exchange, by the hands of the common hangman. The lower house resolved, that it was an insolent and audacious libel, absurd, and contradictory; that the whole transaction was a scandalous artifice, calculated to delude the unhappy, and to disguise and conceal the wicked practices of the professed enemies to his majesty's person, crown, and dignity.

(n) Mr. Pulteney, who bore a considerable share in all these debates, became in a little time so remarkable as to be thought worthy of a very particular mark of his majesty's displeasure. The king, on the first of July, 1731, called for the council-book, and with his own hand struck the name of William Pulteney, esquire, out of the list of privy counsellors: his majesty further ordered him to be put out of all the commissions of the peace. The several lord lieutenants, from whom he had received deputations, were commanded to revoke them; and the lord chancellor and secretaries of state were directed to give the necessary orders for that purpose.

by a formal treaty signed at Berlin and Dieren. About this time, Mr. Dieden, plenipotentiary from the elector of Hanover, received, in the name of his master, the investiture of Bremen and Verden from the hands of the emperor.

The history of England at this period cannot be very interesting, as it chiefly consists in an annual revolution of debates in parliament. Debates, in which the same arguments perpetually recur on the same subjects. When the session was opened on the 16th of January, the king declared, that the situation of affairs both at home and abroad rendered it unnecessary for him to lay before the two houses any other reasons for calling them together, but the ordinary dispatch of the public business, and his desire of receiving their advice in such affairs as should require the care and consideration of parliament. The motion made in the house of commons, for an address of thanks implied, that they should express their satisfaction at the present situation of affairs both at home and abroad. The motion was carried, notwithstanding the opposition of those who observed, that the nation had very little reason to be pleased with the present posture of affairs; that the French were employed in fortifying and restoring the harbour of Dunkirk, contrary to the faith of the most solemn treaties: that the British merchants had received no redress for the depredations committed by the Spaniards: that the commerce of England daily decreased: that no sort of trade throve but the traffic of 'Change Alley, where the most abominable frauds were practised; and that every session of parliament opened a new scene of villainy and imposition.

The pension bill was once more revived, and lost again in the house of peers. While the commons deliberated upon the supply, sir Robert Walpole moved, that five hundred thousand pounds should be issued out of the sinking fund for the service of the ensuing year. Sir William Wyndham, Mr. Pulteney, and sir John Barnard, expatiated upon the iniquity of pillaging a secret deposit, solemnly appropriated to the discharge of the national debt; but all objections vanished before the powers of ministerial influence, which nothing now could check but the immediate danger of popular commotion. Such hazardous interposition actually defeated a scheme which had been adopted by the minister, and even before its appearance alarmed all the trading part of the nation.

The house having resolved itself into a committee, to deliberate upon the most proper methods for the better security and improvements of the duties and revenues charged upon tobacco and wines, all the papers relating to these duties were submitted to the perusal of the members: the commissioners of the customs and excise were ordered to attend the house, the avenues of which were crowded with multitudes of people; and the members in the opposition waited impatiently for a proposal, in which they thought the liberties of their country so deeply interested. In a word, there had been a call of the house on the preceding day. The session was frequent and full: and both sides appeared ready and eager for the contest, when sir Robert Walpole broached his design. He took notice of the arts which had been used to prejudice the people against his plan before it was known. He affirmed that the clamours occasioned by the prejudices had originally risen from smugglers and fraudulent dealers, who had enriched themselves by cheating the public; and that these had been strenuously assisted and supported by another set of men, fond of every opportunity to stir up the people of Great Britain to mutiny and sedition. He expatiated on the frauds that were committed in that branch of the revenue arising from the duties on tobacco; upon the hardships to which the American planters were subjected by the heavy duties payable on importation, as well as by the ill usage they had met with from their factors and correspondents in England, who, from being their servants, were now become their masters; upon the injury done to the fair trader; and the loss sustained by the public with respect to the revenue. He asserted that the scheme he was about to propose would remove all these inconveniencies, prevent numberless frauds, perjuries, and false entries, and add two or three thousand pounds per annum to the public revenue. He entered into a long detail of frauds practised by the knavish dealers in those commodities: he recited the several acts of parliament that related to the duties on wine and tobacco: he declared he had no intention to promote a general excise: he endeavoured to obviate some objections that might be made to his plan, the nature of which he at length explained. He proposed to join the laws of excise to those of customs: that the further subsidy of three farthings per pound charged upon imported tobacco should be still levied at the custom house, and payable to his majesty's civil-list as heretofore: that then the tobacco should be lodged in warehouses, to be appointed for that purpose by the commissioners of the excise: that the keeper of each warehouse, appointed likewise by the commissioners, should have one lock and key, and the merchant importer have another: and that the tobacco should be thus secured until the merchant shall find vent for it, either by exportation or home consumption: that the part designed for exportation should be weighed at the custom house, discharged of the three farthings per pound which had been paid at its first importation, and then exported without further trouble: that the portion destined for home consumption should, in the presence of the warehouse-keeper, be delivered to the purchaser, upon his paying the inland duty of four pence per pound weight, to the proper officer appointed to receive it; by which means the merchant should be eased of the inconvenience of paying the duty upon importation, or granting bonds and finding sureties for the payment, before he had found a market for the commodity: and all penalties and forfeitures, so far as they formerly belonged to the crown, should for the future be applied to the use of the public: that appeals in this, as well as in all other cases relating to the excise, should be heard and determined by two or three of the judges, to be named by his majesty: and in the country, by the judges of assize upon the next circuit, who should hear and determine such appeals in the most summary manner, without the formality of proceedings in courts of law and equity.

Such was the substance of the famous excise scheme, in favour of which sir Robert Walpole moved, that the duties and subsidies on tobacco should from and after the 26th day of June, cease and determine. The debate which ensued was managed and maintained by all the able speakers on both sides of the question. In the course of this debate, sir Robert Walpole took notice of the multitudes which had beset all the approaches of the house. He said it would be an easy task for a designing seditious person, to raise a tumult and disorder among them: that gentlemen might give them what name they should think fit, and affirm they were come as humble suppliants; but he knew whom the law called sturdy beggars: and those who brought them to that place, could not be certain but that they might behave in the same manner. This insinuation was resented by sir John Barnard, one of the members for the city of London, who observed that merchants of character had a right to come down to the Court of Requests, and lobby of the house of commons, in order to solicit their friends and acquaintance against any scheme or project which they might think prejudicial to their commerce: that when he came into the house, he saw none but such as deserved the appellation of sturdy beggars, as little as the honourable gentleman himself, or any gentleman whatever. At length, after a vehement dispute, the motion was carried by a majority of sixty-one voices. Several resolutions were founded on the proposal: and to these the house agreed, though not without another violent contest. The resolutions produced a bill, against which petitions were preferred by the lord mayor, aldermen, the common council of London, the cities of Coventry and Nottingham. A motion was made that counsel should be heard for the city of London; but it was rejected by the majority, and the petitions were ordered to lie upon the table. Had the minister encountered no opposition but that which appeared within doors, his project would have certainly been carried into execution; but the whole nation was alarmed, and clamoured loudly against the excise bill. The populace still crowded around Westminster Hall, blocking up all the avenues to the house of commons. They even insulted the persons of those members who had voted for the ministry on this occasion; and sir Robert Walpole began to be in fear of his life. He, therefore, thought proper to drop the design, by moving, that the second reading of the bill might be postponed till the 12th of June, 1733. Then, complaint being made of the insolence of the populace, who had mal-treated several members, divers resolutions were taken against those tumultuous crowds, and their abettors; these resolves were communicated to the lord mayor of London, the sheriff of Middlesex, and the high bailiff of Westminster.

Westminster. Some individuals were apprehended in the Court of Requests, as having fomented the disturbances; but they were soon released (o). After the miscarriage of the excise scheme, the house unanimously resolved to enquire into the frauds and abuses in the customs: and a committee of twenty-one persons was chosen by ballot for this purpose.

The subsequent debates of this session were occasioned by a bill to prevent the infamous practice of stock-jobbing, which, with great difficulty, made its way to the house of lords, who proposed some amendments, in consequence of which it was laid aside; and succeeded by another bill establishing a lottery, to raise five hundred thousand pounds for the relief of those who had suffered by the Charitable Corporation. After having undergone some alterations it passed through both houses, and obtained the royal assent. The king by a message to parliament, had signified his intention to give the princess royal in marriage to the prince of Orange, promising himself their concurrence and assistance, that he might be enabled to bestow such a portion with his eldest daughter as should be suitable to the occasion. The commons immediately resolved, that out of the monies arising from the sale of lands in the island of St. Christopher's, his majesty should be empowered to apply four score thousand pounds as a marriage portion with his daughter; and a clause to this effect was inserted in the bill, for enabling his majesty to apply five hundred thousand pounds out of the sinking fund for the service of the current year.

The opposition in the house of lords was extremely violent. The debates chiefly turned upon the pension bill, the number of land forces, and a motion for an account of the produce of the forfeited estates which had belonged to the directors of the South Sea Company. The ministry opposed the latter with all their vigour; yet, after a vehement debate, the motion was carried, and the directors of that company were ordered to lay the account before the house. From this it appeared that vast sums of money arising from the forfeited estates had been distributed among the proprietors, by way of dividend, even before recourse was had to parliament for directions in what manner that produce should be applied. A violent contest ensued, in the course of which the house divided, and of forty-seven peers who voted on the occasion, forty-six were such as enjoyed preferment in the church, commissions in the army, or civil employments under the government. On the 11th of June, the king gave the royal assent to the bills that were prepared, and closed the session with a speech, in which he took notice of the wicked endeavours that had been lately used to inflame the minds of the people, by the most unjust misrepresentations.

In November 1733, the prince of Orange arrived at Greenwich, in order to espouse the princess royal; but the marriage was postponed on account of his being taken ill; and he repaired to Bath, to drink the waters for the recovery of his strength. Henrietta, the young duchess of Marlborough, dying about this time, the title devolved to her sister's son, the earl of Sunderland. Lord King resigning his office of chancellor, it was conferred upon Mr. Talbot, solicitor general, together with the title of Baron. It was not till the 14th of March, 1734, that the nuptials of the prince of Orange and the princess royal were solemnized; and this match was attended with addresses of congratulation to his majesty from different parts of the kingdom.

The subject which of all others employed the eloquence and abilities of both sides to the most vigorous exertion, was a motion for repealing the septennial bill, and bringing back triennial parliaments, as settled at the Revolution. In the course of the debate the country party reflected with great severity on the measures of the late reign, and the conduct of the present minister. It was alledged, that the septennial bill was an encroachment on the rights of the people, and that there was no method to overturn a wicked ministry, but by frequent changes of parliament. Sir William Wyndham concluded an excellent speech, that spoke him the unrivaled orator, the uncorrupted Briton, and the unshaken patriot, in words to this effect: "Let us suppose a man abandoned to all notions of virtue and honour, of no great family, and but a mean fortune, raised to be chief minister of state, by the concurrence of many whimsical events; afraid, or unwilling, to trust any but creatures of his own making; lost to all sense of shame and reputation; ignorant of his country's true interest; pursuing no aim but that of aggrandizing himself and his favourites; in foreign affairs trusting none but those who, from the nature of their education, cannot possibly be qualified for the service of their country, or give weight and credit to their negociations. Let us suppose the true interest of the nation, by such means, neglected or misunderstood, her honour tarnished, her importance lost, her trade insulted, her merchants plundered, and her sailors murdered; and all these circumstances overlooked, lest his administration should be endangered. Suppose him next possessed of immense wealth, the plunder of the nation, with a parliament chiefly composed of members whose seats are purchased, and whose votes are bought at the expence of the public treasure. In such a parliament, suppose all attempts made to enquire into his conduct, or to relieve the nation from the distress which had been entailed upon it by his administration. Suppose him screened by a corrupt majority of his creatures, whom he retains in daily pay, or engages in his particular interest, by distributing among them those posts and places which ought never to be bestowed upon any but to the good of the public. Let him plume himself upon his scandalous victory, because he has obtained a parliament like a packed jury, ready to acquit him at all adventures. Let us suppose him domineering with insolence over all the men of ancient families, over all the men of sense, figure, or fortune in the nation; as he has no virtue of his own, ridiculing it in others, and endeavouring to destroy or corrupt it in all. With such a minister, and such a parliament, let us suppose a case, which I hope will never happen: a prince upon the throne, uninformed, ignorant, and unacquainted with the inclinations and true interest of his people, weak, capricious, transported with unbounded ambition, and possessed with insatiable avarice. I hope such a case will never occur; but, as it possibly may, could any greater curse happen to a nation, than such a prince on the throne, advised, and solely advised, by such a minister, and that minister supported by such a parliament. The nature of mankind cannot be altered by human laws: the existence of such a prince or such a minister we cannot prevent by act of parliament; but the existence of such a parliament I think we may prevent; as it is much more likely to exist, and may do more mischief while the septennial law remains in force, than if it were repealed: therefore, I am heartily for its being repealed." Notwithstanding the warmth of the opposition, the ministry, exerting all their strength, were victorious, and the motion was suppressed by the majority. However, as the country party seemed to grow more powerful on this occasion than formerly, it was thought adviseable to dissolve the parliament, which was done on the 16th of April, 1734, and another was convoked by the same proclamation.

A war had lately broken out on the continent, and the king watched the progress of it with the greatest anxiety. With an exception of the case of Stanislaus, king of Poland, who was completely dispossessed of his sovereignty, the tide of success was greatly in favour of the arms of the house of Bourbon; particularly in Italy, where the kingdom of Naples was reduced by Don Carlos, who also made considerable progress in the conquest of Sicily, while the French and Piedmontese gained some advantages in Lombardy.

A treaty between George and the emperor having been concluded, without consulting the king of France, who had long been the ally of England, the friendship of the courts of London and Versailles had begun to decline. So little respect indeed did the French court pay to the British nation, at this juncture, that in the month of November an edict was published at Paris, commanding all the British subjects in France, who were not actually in employment, from the age of eighteen to fifty, to quit the kingdom in fifteen days, or inlist in some of the Irish regiments, on pain of being treated as vagabonds, and sent to the gallies. This edict was executed with the utmost rigour. The prisons of Paris were crowded with the subjects of Great Britain, who were surprized and cut off from all communication with their friends, and must have perished by cold and hunger, had not they been relieved by the active charity of the Jansenists. The earl of Waldegrave, who then resided at Paris, as ambassador from the king of Great Britain, made such vigorous remonstrances to the French ministry, upon this unheard-of outrage against a nation with which they had been so long in alliance, that they thought proper to set the prisoners at liberty, and publish another edict, by which the meaning of the former was explained away. Though the king had augmented his forces during the summer, it did not appear that he inclined to take part in the war; but this state of tranquillity was attended with burthensome expence.

After a vehement contest for seats, the new parliament assembled, on the 14th of January, 1735; and Mr. Onslow was chosen speaker. The king, in his speech, told them, that, notwithstanding the applications of the emperor for succours, it was deemed more adviseable to keep up a respectable force, and mediate between the belligerent powers, than to embark actively in the war; which, it was hoped, would soon be terminated by amicable interposition. The addresses were not unanimously voted; for, in each house, the leaders of the opposition endeavoured, though unsuccessfully, to generalize the terms, and limit the promises of support. The number of seamen, voted on the demand of the court, amounted to thirty thousand men, and that of the army to twenty-five thousand seven hundred. These estimates excited great opposition; but the minister carried his point with very little difficulty. A new subsidiary treaty with the king of Denmark was warmly and justly condemned; but it was sanctioned, as usual, by superiority of numbers (p).

On the 13th of February, a petition was presented to the peers by the duke of Bedford, from the dukes of Hamilton, Queensberry, and Montrose, the earls of Dundonald, Marchmont, and Stair, complaining, that "undue methods and illegal practices" had been used in the late election of the sixteen peers of Scotland, and requesting that they might be permitted to furnish proofs of this assertion. They affirmed, that a list of sixteen peers to be chosen for North Britain had been framed by persons in high trust; that electors had been engaged to vote for the king's list (as it was termed), by ample promises of pensions and offices, by actual gratuities, and other means of allurement; and that a battalion of soldiers stood under arms, as it were to overawe the electors. Earl Cholmondeley objected to the insufficiency of these statements, and moved, that the house could not proceed to an enquiry without stronger grounds. The earl of Chesterfield and lord Bathurst deprecated a refusal of enquiry as unjust and dishonourable: but the majority agreed to earl Cholmondeley's motion, as well as to another for the rejection of the petition.

With the laudable intention of discovering what concern the court had in the steps which led to the present war on the continent, the earl of Chesterfield and lord Bathurst moved, that the king's instructions to his minister in Poland, previous to the death of the late sovereign of that realm, and also those which he had given to his representatives at the courts of France and Spain, with regard to the execution of the treaty of Seville, should be communicated to the house: but the ministry strongly opposed the production of these papers. More effectually to guard against the presence of any part of the army in the places of parliamentary election, a bill was prepared by the judges in compliance with the desire of the lords of opposition; but from the alterations made in it by the courtiers, it was not so complete as the other party wished. To a bill calculated for the improvement of a law in Scotland, corresponding with the English act of Habeas Corpus, the house refused to agree.

On the 15th of May, when the king prorogued the parliament, he informed them, that the scheme of accommodation, which he and the states general had concerted, had not met with the acquiescence of the contending powers. He soon after re-visited the electorate; and the queen resumed the regency.

As Portugal was now threatened with disturbance from Spain, a considerable fleet was sent to the coast of the former kingdom. A misunderstanding had arisen from the rescue of a criminal by the servants of the Portuguese ambassador at the court of Madrid, from the consequent imprisonment of the domestics by order of Philip, and from the similar treatment of the attendants of the Spanish ambassador at Lisbon. This trivial dispute was followed by mutual threats; and, as the king of Portugal was too weak to cope with his royal neighbour, he sought the interposition of the king of England, who dispatched sir John Norris to his assistance. The Spaniard remonstrated against the appearance of a British fleet in that quarter, as tending to injure the commerce of Spain; but the expedition intimidated that court into a reconciliation with the Portuguese.

The chance of war continued adverse to the emperor, both in Italy and on the Rhine: but the arrival of a Russian army in Germany, the expected co-operation of Augustus, and the prospect of aid from Britain and Holland, gave him fresh hopes; and the same circumstances discouraged the French king, who, by the advice of cardinal Fleury, entered into a secret negociation with the court of Vienna.

On the 13th of January, 1736, in a speech to the British parliament, the king, (who had returned to England in the autumn,) adverting to the terms of the French king's negociation, observed, that they did not materially differ from the plan adjusted between him and the Dutch; and that this prospect of peace had induced him to give orders for the reduction of the forces of the realm. After the usual addresses, the supplies were voted with little debate. The seamen allowed were fifteen thousand, and the land forces eighteen thousand; but these were too numerous for a time of peace; and the king was informed, that the house expected a more economical system in the maintenance of that army which should in future be established.

The extraordinary consumption of gin by the lower ranks of people, tending to the ruin of their health, the diminution of their industry, and the depravation of their morals, gave rise to a bill for enhancing the price of that mischievous beverage. It was moved, that every gallon of spirits should be subject to an impost of twenty shillings, exclusive of former duties; and that all retailers of such liquors should take out an annual licence, for which fifty pounds should be paid. Great opposition was made to the progress of this bill; but in spite of all the efforts of the ministers, the distillers, and the West India merchants, the motion was adopted, and the bill passed both houses. Several other bills were productive of dispute. One for the restraint of bequests of landed property to corporations of any kind, received some qualification in its progress, and at length subdued all opposition: and a bill for the more effectual prevention of smuggling, though condemned as violent and oppressive, passed into a law.

When the king had ordered a prorogation of parliament, on the 20th of May, he prepared for another voyage to his German dominions, assigning the task of government to the queen, rather than to his son Frederic, prince of Wales, of whose popularity, arising from his amiable qualities, he seems to have been jealous (q).

While the king was absent in Germany, various infractions of order, and petty riots, occurred in Great Britain. The most extraordinary outrage was perpetrated at Edinburgh. At the execution of a smuggler, captain Porteous, commandant of the city guard, was so irritated at the insults offered to the soldiery by the people, that he ordered his men to fire, without the permission of the civil magistrate. This order proved fatal to several of the spectators; and the captain, being tried for murder, was condemned to death. The queen, too lenient to such an offender, granted him a reprieve, but the people were determined he should not reap the benefit of it. They remembered that pardons had been granted to divers military delinquents in that country who had been condemned by legal trial. They seemed to think those were encouragements to oppression: they were fired by a national jealousy: they were stimulated by the relations and friends of those who had been murdered; and they resolved to wreak their vengeance on the author of that tragedy, by depriving him of life on the very day which the judges had fixed for his execution. Thus determined, they assembled in different bodies, about ten o'clock at night, on the 7th of September. They blocked up the gates of the city, to prevent the admission of the troops that were quartered

(p) It was in vain urged, that this practice of treating with the European states on every alarm, and subsidising them into an attention to the balance of power, in which they were more interested than Great Britain, had been carried to an absurd excess; and that such conduct might ultimately subject this country to the whole charge of maintaining this equipoise, as she was always so ready to offer her treasures, that other powers would regularly expect to be pensioned by her, for no other service than that which was immediately connected with their own defence.

in the suburbs. They surprized and disarmed the town-guards: they broke open the prison doors; dragged Porteous from thence to the place of execution; and, leaving him hanging by the neck on a dyer's pole, quietly dispersed to their several habitations. This exploit was performed with such conduct and deliberation as seemed to be the result of a plan formed by some persons of consequence: it therefore became the object of a very severe enquiry.

The king being indisposed, in consequence of some fatigue he underwent during a storm in his return from the continent, deferred the meeting of parliament; and when the protracted interval had elapsed, the session was opened by commission, on the 1st of February, 1737. The chief subject of contention that presented itself in the course of this session, was a motion which Mr. Pulteney made for an address to his majesty, that he would be pleased to settle one hundred thousand pounds a year upon the prince of Wales. He represented that such provision was conformable to the practice of ancient times: that what he proposed had been enjoyed by his present majesty in the life-time of his father; and that a settlement of this nature was reasonable and necessary, to ascertain the independence of the apparent heir to the crown. The motion was vigorously opposed by sir Robert Walpole, as an encroachment on the prerogative; as an officious intermeddling in the king's family affairs; and as an effort to set his majesty and the prince at variance. But a misunderstanding, it seems, had already happened in the royal family. The minister, in the midst of his harangue, told the house, by his majesty's command, that on the preceding day the king had sent a message to the prince, importing, that his majesty had given orders for settling a jointure upon the princess of Wales, suitable to her high rank and dignity, which he would in a proper time, lay before parliament, in order to be rendered more certain and effectual: that although his royal highness had not thought fit, by any application to his majesty, to desire that his allowance of fifty thousand pounds might be rendered less precarious, the king, to prevent the bad consequences which he apprehended might follow from the undutiful measures which his majesty was informed the prince had been advised to pursue, would grant to his royal highness, for his majesty's life, the said fifty thousand pounds per annum, to be issued out of the civil list revenues, over and above the prince's revenues, arising from the duchy of Cornwall, which his majesty thought a very competent allowance, considering his own numerous issue, and the great expence which did and must necessarily attend an honourable provision for the whole royal family: that the prince, by a verbal answer, desired their lordships to assure his majesty that he did, and ever should, retain the utmost duty for his royal person: that he was very thankful for any instance of his majesty's goodness to him or to the princess, and particularly for his majesty's gracious intention of settling a jointure upon her royal highness; but, that as to the message, the affair was now out of his hands, and, therefore, he could give no answer to it; that his royal highness afterwards used many dutiful expressions towards his majesty; adding, "Indeed, my lords, it is in other hands, and I am sorry for it;" or words to that effect. Sir Robert Walpole then endeavoured to demonstrate, that the annual sum of fifty thousand pounds was as much as the king could afford to allow for the prince's maintenance; and he expatiated upon the bad consequences that might ensue, if the son should be rendered altogether independent of the father.

These suggestions did not pass unanswered. Sir Robert Walpole had asserted, that the parliament had no right to interfere in the creation or maintenance of a prince of Wales; and the supporters of the motion observed, that the allowance of fifty thousand pounds was not sufficient to defray the prince's yearly expences, without allotting one shilling for acts of charity and munificence; and that the several deductions for land taxes and fees reduced it to forty-three thousand pounds. They affirmed, that his whole income, including the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall, did not exceed fifty-two thousand pounds a-year, though by his majesty's own regulation, the expence of the prince's household amounted to sixty-three thousand. They proved, that the produce of the civil-list exceeded nine hundred thousand pounds, a sum above one hundred thousand pounds a year more than was enjoyed by his late majesty. They observed, that the parliament allowed one hundred thousand pounds for the maintenance of the prince of Wales: that the article of secret service money had prodigiously increased in the late reign; and by an account which happened to be laid before the parliament, it appeared that vast sums of money had been given for purposes which nobody understood, and to persons whom nobody knew. The debate was fierce and long: and ended in a division, by which the motion was rejected. A motion of the same nature was made by lord Carteret in the house of peers, and gave rise to a very keen dispute, maintained by the same arguments, and issuing in the same termination.

The last disputes of this session were excited by a bill sent down from the lords for punishing the magistrates and city of Edinburgh, on account of the murder of captain John Porteous. In the beginning of the session lord Carteret recapitulated the several tumults and riots which had lately happened in different parts of the kingdom. He particularly insisted upon the atrocious murder of captain Porteous, as a flagrant insult upon the government, and a violation of the public peace, so much the more dangerous, as it seemed to have been concerted and executed with deliberation and decency. He suspected that some citizens of Edinburgh had been concerned in the murder, not only from this circumstance, but likewise because, notwithstanding the reward of two hundred pounds, which had been offered by proclamation for the discovery of any person who acted in that tragedy, not one individual had as yet been detected. He seemed to think that the magistrates had encouraged the riot, and that the city had forfeited its charter; and he proposed a minute inquiry into the particulars of the affair. He was seconded by the duke of Newcastle and the earl of Ilay: though this last nobleman differed in opinion from him with respect to the charter of the city, which he said, could not be justly forfeited by the fault of the magistracy. The lords resolved, That the magistrates and other persons from whom they might obtain the necessary information concerning this riot should be ordered to attend; and, That an address should be presented to his majesty, desiring that the different accounts and papers relating to the murder of captain Porteous might be submitted to the perusal of the house. These documents being accordingly examined, and all the witnesses arrived, including three Scottish judges, a debate arose about the manner in which these last should be interrogated, whether at the bar, at the table, or on the wool-sacks. Some Scottish lords asserted, that they had a right to be seated next to the judges of England: but after a long debate this claim was rejected, and the judges of Scotland appeared at the bar in their robes. A bill was brought in to disable Alexander Wilson, esquire, lord provost of Edinburgh, from enjoying any office or place of magistracy in the city of Edinburgh, or elsewhere in Great Britain; for imprisoning the said Alexander Wilson; for abolishing the guard of that city; and for taking away the gates of the Nether Bow Port, so as to open a communication between the city and the suburbs, in which the king's troops are quartered. The duke of Argyle, in arguing against this bill, said he could not think of a proceeding more harsh or unprecedented than the present, as he believed there was no instance of the whole weight of parliamentary indignation, for such he called a proceeding by a bill ex post facto, falling upon any single person, far less upon any community, for crimes that were within the reach of the inferior courts of justice: for this reason he observed, that if the lord provost and the citizens of Edinburgh should suffer in the terms of the present bill, they would suffer by a cruel, unjust, and fantastical proceeding; a proceeding of which the worst use might be made, if ever the nation should have the misfortune to fall under a partial, self-interested administration. He told them he sat in the parliament of Scotland when that part of the treaty of union relating to the privileges of the royal burghs was settled on the same footing as religion, that is, they were made unalterable by any subsequent parliament of Great Britain. Notwithstanding the eloquence and warmth of his remonstrance, the bill was sent down to the house of commons, where it produced a violent contest. The commons set on foot a severe scrutiny into the particular circumstances that preceded and attached the murder of Porteous: from the examination of the witnesses it appeared that no freeman or citizen of Edinburgh was concerned in the riot, which was chiefly composed of country people, excited by the relations of some unhappy persons whom Porteous and his men had slain at the execution of the smuggler: and these were assisted by 'prentice boys, and the lowest class of vagabonds that happened to be at Edinburgh: that the lord provost had taken all the precautions to prevent mischief that his reflection suggested: that he even exposed his person to the rage of the multitude, in his endeavours to disperse them; and that if he had done amiss, he erred from want of judgement, rather than from the want of inclination to protect the unhappy Porteous. It likewise appeared, that Mr. Lindsay, member for the city of Edinburgh, had gone in person to general Moyle, commander of the forces in North Britain, informed him of the riot, implored his immediate assistance, and promised to conduct his troops into the city; and that his suit was rejected, because he could not produce a written order from the magistracy, which he neither could have obtained in such confusion, nor ventured to carry about his person through the midst of an enraged populace. The Scottish members exerted themselves with uncommon vivacity in defence of their capital. They were joined by sir John Barnard, lord Cornbury, Mr. Shippen, and Mr. Oglethorpe. Lord Polwarth declared, that if any gentleman would shew where one argument in the charge against the lord provost and the city of Edinburgh had been proved, he would that instant give his vote for the commitment of the bill. He said, if gentlemen would lay their hands on their hearts, and ask themselves whether they would have voted in this manner had the case of Edinburgh been that of the city of Bristol, York, or Norwich, he was persuaded they would have required that every tittle of the charge against them should have been fully and undeniably proved. Some amendments and mitigations being inserted in the bill, it passed the house, was sent back to the lords, who agreed to the alterations, and then received the royal assent. On the 21st of June the king made a short speech to both houses, and the lord chancellor prorogued the parliament.

The disagreement between the king and the prince of Wales was at length inflamed into an open rupture. The prince did not give the least intimation, either to the king or to the queen, of the pregnancy of the princess, till she had entered the last month of that state. In the week preceding her delivery, he twice removed her from Hampton Court, (where his majesty then resided,) to St. James's Palace; and another precipitate and clandestine removal of the princess took place, "under the pains and certain indication of immediate labour, to the imminent danger both of her and the child," according to the expressions contained in a message from the king. These circumstances gave such offence at court, that Frederic was commanded, on the 10th of September, to quit the palace, as soon as the princess could be removed without inconvenience. In consequence the prince retired to Kew. By submissive apologies, he endeavoured to appease the wrath of his father; but his connection with the opposition obstructed a reconciliation. The queen, who was soon after seized with her last indisposition, so far yielded to the paternal resentment of his majesty, that she declined an interview with the prince, who was particularly shocked at the thoughts of losing his mother before he had recovered her favour and regard. She died on the 20th of November, 1737, in the fifty-fifth year of her age, amidst the general regret of the public (r).

Ever since the treaty of Utrecht, the Spaniards in America had insulted and distressed the commerce of Great Britain, and the British merchants had attempted to carry on an illicit trade into their dominions. A right which the English merchants claimed by treaty of cutting logwood in the Bay of Campeachy, gave them frequent opportunities of pushing in contraband commodities upon the continent; so that, to suppress the evil, the Spaniards were resolved to annihilate the claim. This liberty of cutting logwood had often been acknowledged, but never clearly ascertained; in all former treaties, it was considered as an object of too little importance to make a separate article in any negociation. The Spanish vessels appointed for protecting the coast continued their severities upon the English; many of the British subjects were sent to dig in the mines of Potosi, and deprived of all means of conveying their complaints to those who might be able to send them redress. One remonstrance followed another to the court of Madrid of this violation of treaty; but the only answer given were promises of enquiry, which produced no reformation. Our merchants complained loudly of those outrages; but the minister, sir Robert Walpole, vainly expected from negociations that redress which was only to be obtained by arms.

The fears discovered by the court of Great Britain only served to increase the insolence of the Spaniards; and their guard ships continued to seize not only all the guilty, but the innocent, whom they found sailing along the Spanish main. At length the complaints of the English merchants were loud enough to interest the house of commons; their letters and memorials were produced, and their grievances enforced by counsel at the bar of the house. It was soon found that the money which Spain had agreed to pay to the court of Great Britain was with-held, and no reason assigned for the delay. The minister, therefore, to gratify the general ardour, and to atone for his former deficiencies, assured the house that he would put the nation into a condition of war. Soon after letters of reprisal were granted against the Spaniards; and this being considered on both sides as an actual commencement of hostilities, both diligently set forward their armaments by sea and land. In this threatening situation, the French minister at the Hague declared that his master was obliged by treaty to assist the king of Spain; so that the alliances which but twenty years before had taken place were now quite reversed. At that time France and England were combined against Spain; at present France and Spain were united against England: such little hopes can statesmen place upon the firmest treaties, where there is no superior power to compel the observance.

A rupture between England and Spain being now unavoidable, the people, who had long clamoured for war, began to feel uncommon alacrity at its approach; and the ministry finding it inevitable, began to be as earnest in preparation. Orders were issued for augmenting the land forces, and raising a body of marines. War was declared, and soon after two rich Spanish prizes were taken in the Mediterranean.

Admiral Vernon, a man of more courage than experience, of more confidence than skill, was sent commander of a fleet to the West Indies, to distress the enemy in that part of the globe. He had asserted in the house of commons, that Porto Bello, a fort and harbour on the isthmus of Darien in South America, could be easily destroyed; and that he himself would undertake to reduce it with six ships only. A project which appeared so wild and impossible was ridiculed by the ministry; but as he still insisted upon the proposal, they complied with his request, hoping that his want of success might repress the confidence of his party. In this, however, they were disappointed; for with six ships only, he attacked and demolished all the fortifications of the place, and came away victorious, with scarcely the loss of a man. This victory was magnified at home in all the strains of panegyric, and the trial was far superior to the value of the conquest.

As the war began thus successfully, it inspired the commons to prosecute it with all imaginable vigour. The minister was granted such supplies as enabled him to equip a very powerful navy. They voted a subsidy to the king of Denmark, and empowered the king to defray some other expences not mentioned in the estimates of the year. As the preparations for war increased in every part of the kingdom, the domestic debates and factions seemed to subside; and indeed it seems to have been the peculiar felicity of this nation, that every species of activity takes its turn to occupy the people. In a nation like this, arts and luxury, commerce and war, at certain intervals, must ever be serviceable. This vicissitude turns the current of wealth from one determined channel, and gives it a diffusive spread over the face of the country: it is at one time diverted to the laborious and frugal, at another to the brave, active, and enterprizing.

During the greatest part of the winter in the beginning of 1740, the poor had been grievously afflicted in consequence of a severe frost, which began on the 24th of December, 1739, and continued till the 20th of February. The river Thames was covered with such a crust of ice, that a multitude of people dwelled upon it in tents, and a great number of booths were erected for the entertainment of the populace. The navigation was entirely stopped: the watermen and fishermen were disabled from earning a livelihood: the fruits of the earth were destroyed by the cold, which was so extreme, that many persons were chilled to death; and this calamity was the more deeply felt, as the poor could not afford to supply themselves with coal and fuel, which were advanced in price, in proportion to the severity and continuance of the frost. The lower class of labourers, who worked in the open air, were now deprived of all means of subsistence: many kinds of manufacture were laid aside, because it was found impossible to carry them on. The price of all sorts of provision rose almost to a dearth: even water was sold in the streets of London. In this season of distress, many wretched families must have perished by cold and hunger, had not those of opulent fortunes been inspired with a remarkable spirit of compassion and humanity. Nothing can more redound to the honour of the English nation, than did those instances of benevolence and well conducted charity which were then exhibited. The liberal hand was not only opened to the professed beggar, and the poor that owned their distress; but uncommon pains were taken to find out and relieve those more unhappy objects, who from motives of false pride, or ingenuous shame, endeavoured to conceal their misery. These were assisted almost in their own despite. The solitary habitations of the widow, the fatherless, and the unfortunate, were visited by the beneficent, who felt for the woes of their fellow creatures; and, to such as refused to receive a portion of the public charity, the necessaries of life were privately conveyed in such a manner as could least shock the delicacy of their dispositions.

(r) Queen Caroline was a princess of distinguished merit. Her sagacity and good sense were conspicuous; and she improved her understanding by sedulous cultivation. Literature and philosophy charmed her with their allurements, and engaged her willing attention. She was the patroness of men of learning and ability, whom she eagerly admitted to her conversation and friendship. Her wit, taste, and information, imparted to the British court an attractive vivacity and brilliancy. Her manners were courteous and polite; her disposition, candid and friendly; and her beneficence manifested the goodness of her heart. Her conjugal virtues were deserving of praise; but, like queen Mary, she was too obsequious to her husband, particularly in her treatment of her son. She has been accused of avarice and ambition; but those charges appear to be ill-founded; nor does the imputation of her want of humanity rest on a more substantial basis.

While vigorous preparations were making in other departments, a squadron was equipped for distressing the enemy in the South Sea. It set sail in September 1740, under the command of commodore Anson. This fleet was destined to sail through the streights of Magelhaens, and steering northwards along the coasts of Chili and Peru, to co-operate occasionally with admiral Vernon across the isthmus of Darien. The delays and mistakes of the ministry frustrated that part of the scheme, which was originally well laid. The fleet consisted of five ships of the line, a frigate, and two store-ships, with about fourteen hundred men. Having reached the coasts of Brazil, he refreshed his men for some time on the island of St. Catharine, a spot that enjoys all the fruitfulness and verdure of the luxurious tropical climate. From thence he steered downward into the cold and tempestuous regions of the south; and in about five months after, meeting a terrible tempest, he doubled Cape Horn. By this time his fleet was dispersed, and his crew deplorably disabled with the scurvy; so that with much difficulty he gained the delightful island of Juan Fernandez. There he was joined by one ship, and a vessel of seven guns. From thence advancing northward, he landed on the coast of Chili, and attacked the city of Paita by night. In this bold attempt he made no use of his shipping, nor even disembarked all his men, a few soldiers, favoured by darkness, sufficed to fill the whole town with terror and confusion. The governor of the garrison, and the inhabitants, fled on all sides; accustomed to be severe, they expected severity. In the mean time, a small body of the English kept possession of the town for three days, stripping it of all its treasures and merchandize to a considerable amount, and then setting it on fire. Soon after this small squadron advanced as far as Panama, situated on the isthmus of Darien, on the western side of the great American continent. The commodore now placed all his hopes in taking one of those valuable Spanish ships, which trade from the Philippine Islands to Mexico. Not above one or two at the most of these immensely rich ships went from one continent to the other in a year; they were, therefore, very large, in order to carry a sufficiency of treasure, and proportionably strong to defend it. In hopes of meeting with one of these, the commodore, with his little fleet, traversed the great Pacific Ocean; but the scurvy once more visiting his crew, several of his men died, and almost all were disabled. In this exigence having brought all his men into one vessel, and set fire to the other, he steered for the island of Tinian, which lies about half way between the new world and the old. In this charming abode he continued for some time, till his men recovered their health, and his ship was refitted for sailing. Thus refreshed he set forward for China, where he laid in proper stores for once more traversing back the immense ocean in which he had just before suffered such difficulties. Having accordingly taken some Dutch and Indian sailors on board, he again steered towards America, and at length, after various toils, discovered the Spanish galleon he had so long ardently expected. This vessel was built as well for the purposes of war as of merchandize. It mounted sixty guns, and had five hundred men, while the crew of the commodore did not amount to half that number. However, the victory was on the side of the English, and they returned home with their prize, in June, 1744, which was estimated at three hundred and thirteen thousand pounds sterling, while the different captures that had been made before amounted to as much more. Thus, after a voyage of three years, conducted with amazing perseverance and intrepidity, the public sustained the loss of a small fleet; but a few individuals became possessed of immense riches.

In the mean time the English conducted other operations against the enemy with amazing activity. When Anson set out it was with a design of acting a subordinate part to a formidable armament designed for the coasts of New Spain, consisting of twenty-nine ships of the line, and almost an equal number of frigates, furnished with warlike stores, nearly fifteen thousand seamen, and as many land forces. Lord Cathcart was appointed to command the land forces, but he dying on the passage, the command devolved upon general Wentworth, whose abilities were supposed to be unequal to the trust reposed in him. The ministry, without any visible reason, detained the fleet in England, until the season for action in America was nearly over. In the country where they were to carry on their operations, the periodical rains began about the end of April, 1741, and the change in the climate always brings on epidemical diseases. Having at length arrived on the coasts of New Spain, before the wealthy city of Carthagena, they landed their forces, in order to form the siege of this important fortification (s).

To carry on the siege with safety, the troops were landed on the island Tierra Bomba, near the mouth of the harbour, which had been previously fortified by all the arts of engineering. The land forces erected a battery on shore, with which they made a breach in the principal fort, while Vernon, who commanded the fleet, sent a number of ships into the harbour, to divide the fire of the enemy, and to co-operate with the army on shore. The breach being deemed practicable, a body of troops were commanded to storm; but the Spaniards deserted the forts, which, if possessed of courage, they might have defended with success. The troops, upon gaining this advantage, were advanced a good deal nearer to the city; but there they met a much greater opposition than they had expected. It was found, or asserted, that the fleet could lie near enough to batter the town, and that nothing remained but to attempt one of the forts by scaling. The leaders of the fleet and the army began mutually to accuse each other, each asserting the probability of what the other denied. At length, Wentworth, stimulated by the admiral's reproach, resolved to try the dangerous experiment, and ordered that fort St. Lazare should be attempted by scalade. Nothing could be more unfortunate than this undertaking; the forces marching up to the attack, their guides were slain, and they mistook their way. Instead of attempting the weakest part of the fort, they advanced to where it was strongest, and where they were exposed to the fire of the town. Colonel Grant, who commanded the granadiers, was killed in the beginning. Soon after it was found that the scaling ladders were too short; the officers were perplexed for want of others, and the troops stood exposed to the whole fire of the enemy, without knowing how to proceed. After bearing a dreadful fire for some hours with great intrepidity, they at length retreated, leaving six hundred men dead on the spot. The terrors of the climate soon began to be more dreadful than those of war; the rainy season began with such violence, (s) This city, which lies within sixty miles of Panama, serves as a magazine for the merchandize of Spain, which is conveyed from Europe thither, and from thence transported by land to Panama, to be exchanged for the native commodities of the new world. The taking of Carthagena, therefore, would have obstructed the whole trade between Old Spain and the New.

that it was impossible for the troops to continue encamped; and the mortality of the season now began to attack them in all its frightful varieties. To these calamities, sufficient to quell any enterprize, was added the dissension between the land and sea commanders, who blamed each other for every failure, and became frantic with mutual recrimination. They only, therefore, at last could be brought to agree in one mortifying measure, which was to reimbark the troops, and to withdraw them as quickly as possible from this scene of slaughter and contagion.

The fortifications nearer the harbour being demolished, the troops were conveyed back to Jamaica; and this island which of itself is sufficiently unhealthy, was considered as a paradise to that from which they had just escaped. This fatal miscarriage, which tarnished the British glory, was no sooner known in England, than the kingdom was filled with murmurs and discontent. The loudest burst of indignation was directed at the minister, they who once praised him for successes he did not merit, condemned him now for a failure of which he was guiltless.

To this cause of complaint, several others were added. The inactivity of the English fleet at home was among the principal. Sir John Norris had twice sailed to the coasts of Spain, at the head of a very powerful squadron, without taking any effectual step to annoy the enemy. The Spanish privateers, become numerous and enterprizing, annoyed our commerce with great success, having taken, since the commencement of the war, four hundred and seven ships belonging to the subjects of Great Britain. The English, though at an immense expence in equipping fleets, seemed to lie down unrevenged under every blow, and suffered one loss after another without reprisal. This universal discontent had a manifest influence upon the general election which followed soon after; and the complaints against the minister became so general, that he began to tremble for his safety. All the adherents of the prince of Wales, who continued to live retired from court, as a private gentleman, concurred in the opposition. Obstinate struggles were maintained in all parts of the kingdom; and such a national spirit prevailed, that the country interest now at last seemed ready to preponderate. In this situation, the minister finding the strength of the house of commons turned against him, tried every art to break that confederacy, which he knew he had not strength to oppose. The first attempt was by endeavouring to disengage the prince from his party, by promises of royal emoluments (t). Walpole being disappointed in his endeavours to gain the prince, plainly perceived that his power was at an end; but he still feared more for his person. The resentment of the people had been raised against him to an extravagant height; and their leaders taught them to expect very signal justice to their supposed oppressors. The first occasion he had to find the house of commons turned against him was in debating upon some disputed elections. In the first of these, which was heard at the bar of the house, he carried his point by a majority of six only, and this he looked upon as a defeat rather than a victory. The inconsiderable majority that appeared on his side, which had long been used to carry every question with ease, plainly proved that his friends were no longer able to protect him. A petition, presented by the electors of Westminster, complaining of an undue election, which had been carried on by the unjust influence of the ministry, and which they begged to set aside, was presented to the house. Sir Robert laboured with all his art to over-rule their petition, the house entered into a discussion, and carried it against him by a majority of four voices. He resolved to try his strength once more in another disputed election, that of Chippenham in Wiltshire, and had the mortification to see the majority against him augmented to sixteen. He then declared he would never sit more in that house. The next day the king adjourned both houses of parliament, till the 18th of February, 1742; and in the interim sir Robert Walpole was created earl of Oxford, and resigned all his employments.

Nothing could give the people more general satisfaction than this minister's deposition. It was now universally expected that his power being abridged, his punishment was to follow; and mankind prepared themselves for some tragical event with vindictive satisfaction. Every person now flattered himself, that every domestic grievance would be redressed; that commerce would be protected abroad; that the expensive subsidies to foreign states would be retrenched; and that the house of commons would be unanimous in every popular measure. But they found themselves miserably deceived. Those who clamoured most against him, when put into power, began exactly to adopt all his measures.

At no time of his life did this minister acquit himself with such art as on the present occasion. The country party consisted of Tories, reinforced by discontented Whigs; the former implacable in their resentments against him, could not be mollified; the latter, either soured by disappointment, or incited by ambition, only wished his removal. To these therefore Walpole applied, and was willing to grant them that power they aimed at, in return for which he only demanded impunity. The offer was accepted with pleasure; their Tory friends were instantly abandoned; and a breach thus ensuing, the same opposition still continued against the new ministry that had obtained against the old.

The place of chancellor of the exchequer was bestowed on Mr. Sandys, who was likewise appointed a lord of the treasury. Lord Harrington was declared president of the council; and in his room lord Carteret became secretary of state. Mr. Pulteney was sworn of the privy council; and afterwards created earl of Bath. The reconciliation between the king and the prince of Wales took place soon after; and the change in the ministry was celebrated by rejoicings over the whole nation.

But this transport was of short duration: it soon appeared that those who declaimed most loudly for the liberties of the people, had adopted new measures with their new employments. The new converts were branded, as betrayers of the interests of their country; but particularly the resentment of the people fell upon the earl of Bath, who had long declaimed against that very conduct he now seemed earnest to pursue. He had been the idol of the people, and considered as one of the most illustrious champions that had ever defended the cause of freedom; but allured perhaps with the hope of governing in Walpole's place, he was contented to give up his popularity for ambition. The king, however, treated him with that neglect which he merited: he was laid aside for life, and continued a wretched survivor of all his former importance.

The war with Spain had now continued for several years, and was attended with but indifferent fortune. Some unsuccessful expeditions had been carried on in the West Indies, under admiral Vernon, commodore Knowles, and others; and the failure of these was still more aggravated by the political writers of the day; a class of men who had risen up during this and the preceding administration: at first they were employed against Walpole, and were afterwards taken into pay by him. Dull, and without principle, they made themselves agreeable to the public by impudence and abuse; they embarrassed every operation, and embittered every misfortune. These had for some time disgusted the nation at their operations by sea, and taught them to wish for better fortune by land. The people became ripe for renewing their victories in Flanders, and the king desired nothing with so much ardour. It was resolved therefore to send a powerful body of men into the Netherlands, to join in the quarrels that were beginning on the continent; and immense triumphs were expected from such an undertaking, which the king resolved to conduct in person. An army of sixteen thousand men was consequently transported to Flanders, and the war with Spain became but a secondary consideration.

That the reader may be enabled to form a just idea of the origin of the troubles on the continent, it will be necessary to go back for some years, and trace the measures of the several courts of Europe. After the death of the duke of Orleans, who had been regent of France, the cardinal De Fleury undertook to settle the great confusion in which that luxurious prince had left the kingdom. His moderation and prudence were equally conspicuous; he was sincere, frugal, modest, and simple: under him therefore France repaired her losses, and enriched herself by commerce; he only left the state to its own natural methods of thriving, and he saw it every day assuming its former health and vigour.

(t) The bishop of Oxford was accordingly sent to him, with an offer, that if he would write a letter of submission to the king, he and all his counsellors should be taken into favour; fifty thousand pounds should be added to his revenue, two hundred thousand should be granted him to pay his debts, and suitable provision should be made in due time for all his followers. This to a person already involved in debt, from the scantiness of his pension and the necessity of keeping up his dignity, was a tempting offer. However, the prince generously disdained it, declaring he would accept of no conditions dictated to him under the influence of a minister whose measures he disapproved.

During the long interval of peace, which this minister's counsels had procured for Europe, two powers, till now unregarded, began to attract the notice and jealousy of the neighbouring nations. Peter the Great had already civilized Russia, and this newly-created extensive empire began to influence the councils of other nations, and to give laws to the northern kingdoms. The other power that came into notice, was that of the king of Prussia, whose dominions were populous, and whose forces were well maintained and ready for action. The other states were but little improved for the purposes of renewing the war. The empire remained under the government of Charles the Sixth, who had been placed on the throne by the treaty of Utrecht. Sweden continued to languish, being not yet recovered from the destructive projects of her darling monarch Charles the Twelfth. Denmark was powerful enough, but inclined to peace; and part of Italy still remained subject to those princes who had been imposed upon it by foreign treaties. All those states, however, continued to enjoy a profound peace, until the death of Augustus, king of Poland, by which a general flame was once more kindled in Europe. The emperor, assisted by the arms of Russia, declared for the elector of Saxony, son of the deceased king. On the other hand, France declared for Stanislaus, who long since had been nominated king of the Poles by Charles the Twelfth of Sweden, and whose daughter the king of France had since married. In order to forward his pretensions, Stanislaus repaired to Dantzig, where the people gladly received him. But his triumph was short; ten thousand Russians appearing before the place, the Polish nobility dispersed, and Stanislaus was besieged by this small body of forces. But though the city was taken, the king escaped with some difficulty by night; and fifteen hundred men that were sent to his assistance, were made prisoners of war. France, however, resolved to continue her assistance to him, and this it was supposed would be most effectually done by distressing the house of Austria.

The views of France were seconded by Spain and Sardinia, both having hopes to grow more powerful by a division of the spoils of Austria. A French army therefore soon over-ran the empire, under the command of the old marshal Villars; while the duke de Montemar, the Spanish general, was equally victorious in the kingdom of Naples. Thus the emperor had the mortification to see his own dominions ravaged, and a great part of Italy torn from him, for having attempted to give a king to Poland. These rapid successes of the French, and their allies, compelled the emperor to demand a peace (u).

The emperor dying in the year 1740, the French began to think this a favourable opportunity of exerting their ambition once more. Regardless of treaties, particularly that called the Pragmatic Sanction, by which the reversion of all the late emperor's dominions was settled upon his daughter, they caused the elector of Bavaria to be crowned emperor. Thus the queen of Hungary, daughter of Charles the Sixth, descended from an illustrious line of emperors, saw herself stripped of her inheritance, and left for a whole year deserted by all Europe, and without any hopes of succour. She had scarcely closed her father's eyes, when she lost Silesia, by an irruption of the young king of Prussia, who seized the opportunity of her defenceless state to renew his ancient pretensions to that province, of which it must be owned his ancestors had been unjustly deprived. France, Saxony, and Bavaria, attacked the rest of her dominions; England was the only ally that seemed willing to espouse her helpless condition. Sardinia and Holland soon after came to her assistance; and, last of all, Russia acceded to the union in her favour.

It may now be demanded, what cause Britain had to intermeddle in these continental schemes. It can only be answered, that the interests of Hanover, and the security of that electorate, depended upon the nicely balancing the different interests of the empire; and the English ministry were willing to gratify the king. Lord Carteret, who had now taken up that place in the royal confidence which had formerly been possessed by Walpole, by pursuing those measures soothed the wishes of his master, and opened a more extensive field for his own ambition. He expected to receive honour from victories which he seemed certain of obtaining; and desired to engage in measures which must be injurious to the nation, even though attended with desired success.

When the parliament met, his majesty informed the houses that he had strictly adhered to his engagements, and that he had sent a body of English forces into the Netherlands, which he had augmented with sixteen thousand Hanoverians, to make a diversion upon the dominions of France, in the queen of Hungary's favour (v). The people now saw, with indignation, their former defenders turned against themselves; patriotism they began to consider as an empty name, and knew not on whom to rely, since the boldest professors of liberty were purchased at so easy a rate. But however these continental measures might injure the real interests of the nation, they for that time served to retrieve the queen of Hungary's desperate affairs. She soon began to turn the scale of victory on her side. The French were driven out of Bohemia. Her general, prince Charles, at the head of a large army, invaded the dominions of Bavaria. Her rival, the nominal emperor, was obliged to fly before her; and abandoned by his allies, and stripped even of his hereditary dominions, retired to Francfort, where he lived in obscurity.

The French, who had begun as allies, were now under the necessity of sustaining the whole burden of the war, and accordingly faced their enemies, invading them on every side of their dominions. The troops sent to the queen of Hungary's assistance by England were commanded by the earl of Stair, an experienced general, who had learned the art of war under the famous prince Eugene. The chief object which he had in view in the beginning was to effect a junction with the queen's army, commanded by prince Charles of Lorrain, and thus to out number the enemy in the field. The French, in order to prevent this junction, assembled, in 1743, an army of sixty thousand men upon the river Mayne, under the command of marshal Noailles, who posted his troops on the east side of that river. The British forces, to the number of forty thousand, pushed forward on the other side into a country, where they found themselves entirely destitute of provisions, the French having cut off all means of their being supplied with any. The king of England arrived at the camp, while his army was in this deplorable situation; wherefore he resolved to penetrate forward to join twelve thousand Hanoverians and Hessians who had reached Hanau. With this view he decamped; but, before his army had marched three leagues, he found the enemy had enclosed him on every side, near the village of Dettingen.

The most mortifying prospects now presented themselves: if he fought the enemy, it must be at the greatest disadvantage; if he continued inactive, there was a certainty of being starved; and as for a retreat, that was impossible. They passed a defile, which they should have been contented to guard; and, under the conduct of the duke of Gramont, their horse charged the English foot with great fury. They were received, however, with intrepidity and resolution; so that they were obliged to give way, and repass the Mayne with precipitation, with the loss of about five thousand men. The king of England, with great personal courage, exposed himself to a severe fire of the enemies' cannon, and in the midst of the engagement encouraged his troops by his presence and example. The English had the honour of the day; but were soon obliged to leave the field of battle, which was taken possession of by the French, who treated the wounded English with great clemency. Though the English were victorious upon this occasion, yet the earl of Stair, who was commander in chief, did not assume any honour from such a victory. He was unwilling to share any glory, which was so precariously obtained, and snatched rather from the enemy's mistake, than gained by his conduct. He there-

(u) Peace was accordingly made; but Stanislaus, on whose account the war was begun, was neglected in the treaty. It was stipulated, that he should renounce all claim to the crown of Poland, for which the emperor gratified France with the duchy of Lorraine, and some other valuable territories.

(v) When the supplies came to be considered, by which this additional number of Hanoverian troops was to be paid by England for defending their own cause, it produced most vehement debates in both houses of parliament. It was considered as an imposition upon the nation, as an attempt to pay foreign troops for fighting their own battles, and the ministry were pressed by their own arguments against such measures before they came into power. They were not ashamed, however, upon this occasion, boldly to defend what they so violently impugned; and at length, by the strength of numbers, not by reason, they carried their cause.

fore solicited for leave to resign; which obtaining, the troops were led into quarters, and desisted from further operations that campaign.

The French notwithstanding went on with vigour. They opposed prince Charles, and interrupted his attempts to pass the Rhine. They gained also some successes in Italy; but their chief hopes were placed upon a projected invasion of England. From the violence of the parliamentary disputes in England, the court of France had been persuaded that the people were ripe for a revolution, and only wanted the presence of a pretender to effectuate the change (w). An invasion therefore was actually projected; and Charles, the son of the old pretender, departed from Rome in the disguise of a Spanish courier, for Paris, where he had an audience of the French king.

The Stuart family had long been the dupes of the court of France; but it was thought there were now serious resolutions formed in their favour. The troops destined for the expedition amounted to fifteen thousand men; preparations were made for embarking them at Dunkirk, and some of the nearest ports to England, under the eye of the young pretender. The duke de Roquefuille, with twenty ships of the line, was to see them safely landed in England, and the famous count Saxe was to command them when they had effected their landing. The whole project, however, was disconcerted by sir John Norris, who, with a superior fleet, pressed forward to attack them. The French fleet was obliged to put back; a very violent gale of wind damaged their transports beyond redress; and the French, frustrated in their scheme of a sudden descent, openly declared war on the 20th of March, 1744.

Although fortune seemed to favour England at this juncture, yet she was not equally propitious on some other occasions. The English ministry had sent out a powerful squadron of ships into the Mediterranean to overawe those states which might be inclined to assist either France or Spain. This fleet had been conducted by admiral Lestock; but admiral Matthews, a younger officer, was sent out to take the superior command, which produced a misunderstanding between the commanders. An opportunity soon offered for these officers to discover their mutual animosity, which, as is usual on all such occasions, tended to the detriment of their country, and their own disgrace. The combined fleets of France and Spain, to the number of four and thirty sail, were seen off Toulon, and a signal was made by the English admiral to prepare for engagement. It happened that his signals were not perfectly exact; for he had hung out that for forming the line of battle, which at the same time shewed the signal for engaging. This was a sufficient excuse for Lestock in refusing to come up with alacrity; so that after some vain efforts to attack the enemy in conjunction, Matthews resolved to engage as well as he could. One ship of the line belonging to the Spanish squadron struck to captain Hawke; but was by the admiral's order burned the next day. Captain Cornwall was killed in the engagement, after continuing to give command, even after his leg was shot off by the discharge of a cannon. The pursuit was continued for three days, at the end of which time Lestock seemed to come up with some vigour; but just then Matthews gave orders for discontinuing the pursuit, and sailed for Port Mahon to repair the damage which his part of the fleet had sustained. The victory was claimed by the English; and the French and Spaniards were not less pleased with their own good fortune. In England, however, this disputed success was considered as the most mortifying defeat, and the complaints of the people knew no bounds (x).

The proceedings in the Netherlands were as unfavourable to the English as their enemies could wish. The French had assembled a formidable army of one hundred and twenty thousand men, the chief command of which was given to count Saxe (y). To oppose this able and experienced general, the English were headed by the duke of Cumberland, who neither possessed such talents for war, nor was able to bring such a formidable body of men into the field. The French therefore bore down all before them. They besieged Fribourg, and in the beginning of the succeeding campaign invested the strong town of Tournay. Although the allies, under the command of the duke of Cumberland, were inferior in number, they resolved, if possible, to save this town by hazarding a battle. They accordingly marched against the enemy, and took post in sight of the French, who were encamped on an eminence, the village of St. Antoine on the right, a wood on the left, and the town of Fontenoy before them. This advantageous situation did not repress the ardour of the English, who began the attack about two of the clock in the morning of the 30th of April, 1745, and, pressing forward, bore down all opposition. They were for near an hour victorious, and confident of success, while Saxe, who commanded the enemy, was at that time sick of the same disorder of which he afterwards died. However he was carried about to all the posts in a litter, and assured his attendants, that, notwithstanding all unfavourable appearances, the day was his own. A column of the English, without any command, but by mere mechanical courage, had advanced upon the enemies' lines, which opening, formed an avenue on each side to receive them. It was then that the French artillery on three sides began to play on this forlorn body, which, though they continued for a long time unshaken, were at last obliged to retreat about three o'clock in the afternoon. This was one of the most bloody battles that had been fought in this age: the allies left on the field of battle nearly twelve thousand men, and the French bought their victory with nearly an equal number of slain (z). The duke of Cumberland returned to England on the 12th of October.

The ministry of England was by this time changed, the lords Harrington, Chesterfield, and Mr. Pelham, being placed at the head of affairs: these enjoyed some share of popularity, and the operations of war were no longer thwarted by a turbulent opposition. The admirals Rowley and Warren had retrieved the honour of the British flag, and made several rich captures at sea. The fortress of Louisburg, in the island of Cape Breton, on the coast of North America, a place of great consequence to the British commerce, surrendered to general Peperell, while a short time after two French East India ships, and a Spanish ship from Peru, laden with treasure, put into the harbour, supposing it still their own, and were taken.

While the continent of Europe and the isles of America were thus exposed to the ravages of war, and subjected to such vicissitudes of fortune, Great Britain underwent a dangerous convulsion in her own bowels. The son of the chevalier de St. George, fired with ambition, and animated with the hope of ascending the throne of his ancestors, resolved to make an effort for that purpose, which, though it might not be crowned with success, should at least astonish all Christendom. The Jacobites in England and Scotland had promised, that if he would land in Britain at the head of a regular army, they would supply him with provisions, carriages, and horses, and a great number of them declared they would take up arms, and join his standard: but they disapproved of his coming over without forces, as a dangerous enterprize, that would in all probability end in the ruin of himself and all his adherents. This advice, including an exact detail of his father's interest, with the disposition of his particular friends in every town and country, was transmitted to London in January, in order to be forwarded to prince Charles: but the person with whom it was entrusted could find no safe method of conveyance; so that he sent it back to Scotland, from whence it was dispatched to France; but before it reached Paris, Charles had left that kingdom. Had the (w) Several needy adventurers, who wished for a revolution, some men of broken fortunes, and all the Roman catholics of the kingdom, endeavoured to confirm the court of France in these sentiments.

(x) On their return to England both admirals were tried by a court martial. Matthews, who had fought with intrepidity, was declared for the future incapable of serving in his majesty's navy. Lestock, who had kept at a distance, was acquitted with honour, having entrenched himself within the punctilios of discipline. He barely did his duty. How much more noble would it have been for Lestock to have acted with vigour, when he knew the honour of his country was at stake!

(y) Count Saxe was natural son to the late king of Poland, and had been long a soldier of fortune. He had been bred from a youth in camps, and had shewn very early instances of cool intrepidity. He had in the beginning of the war offered his services to several crowns; and among others, it is said, to the king of Great Britain; but his offers were rejected. By long habit this general had learned to preserve an equal composure in the midst of battle, and seemed as serene in the thickest fire as in the drawing-room at court.

(z) This blow, by which Tournay was taken by the French, gave them such a manifest superiority all the rest of the campaign, that they kept the fruits of their victory during the whole continuance of the war. The duke of Bavaria, whom they had made emperor under the title of Charles the Seventh, was lately dead; but though his pretensions were the original cause of the war, that was by no means discontinued at his decease. The grand duke of Tuscany, husband to the queen of Hungary, was declared emperor in his room; and though the original cause of the quarrel was no more, the dissensions still continued as fiercely as ever.

paper come to his hands in due time, perhaps he would not have embarked in the undertaking, though he was stimulated to the attempt by many concurring motives. Certain it is, he was cajoled by the sanguine misrepresentations of a few adventurers, who hoped to profit by the expedition. They assured him, that the whole nation was disaffected to the reigning family: that the people could no longer bear the immense load of taxes, which was daily increasing; and that the most considerable persons of the kingdom would gladly seize the first opportunity of crowding to his standard. On the other hand, he knew the British Government had taken some effectual steps to alienate the friends of his house from the principles they had hitherto possessed. Some of them had accepted posts and pensions: others were preferred in the army; and the parliament were so attached to the reigning family, that he had nothing to hope from their deliberations. He expected succours from the court of France; but he foresaw that delay would diminish the number of his adherents in Great Britain; and, therefore, resolved to seize the present occasion, which he thought propitious to his design: Scotland was indeed unfurnished with troops; king George was in Germany; the duke of Cumberland at the head of the British army, was employed in Flanders, and great part of the Highlanders were ripe for insurrection (a).

The young pretender being furnished with a sum of money, and a supply of arms, on his private credit, wrote letters to his friends in Scotland, explaining his design and situation, intimating the place where he intended to land, communicating a private signal, and assuring them he should be with them by the middle of June. These precautions being taken, he embarked on board of a small frigate at Port St. Lazaire, accompanied by the marquis of Tullibardine, sir Thomas Sheridan, sir John Macdonald, with a few other Irish and Scottish adventurers; and setting sail on the 14th of July, was joined off Belleisle by the Elizabeth, a French ship of war, mounted with sixty-six guns, as his convoy. Their design was to sail round Ireland, and land in the western part of Scotland; but falling in with the Lion, an English ship of the line, a very obstinate and bloody action ensued. The Elizabeth was so disabled that she could not prosecute the voyage, and with difficulty reached the harbour of Brest; but the Lion was shattered to such a degree, that she floated like a wreck upon the water. The disaster of the Elizabeth was a great misfortune to the adventurer, as by her being disabled he lost a great quantity of arms, and about one hundred able officers, who were embarked on board of her for the benefit of his expedition. Prince Charles, in the frigate, continued his course to the western isles of Scotland. After a voyage of eighteen days he landed on a little island between Barra and South-Uist, two of the Hebrides: then he reimbarked, and in a few days arrived at Borodale in Arnsacy, on the confines of Lochnannach, where he was in a little time joined by a considerable number of Highlanders, under their respective chiefs or leaders. On the 19th of August, the marquis of Tullibardine erected the pretender's standard at Glensinnan. Some of those, however, on whom Charles principally depended, now stood aloof, either fluctuating in their principles, astonished at the boldness of the undertaking, or startled at the remonstrances of their friends, who did not fail to represent, in aggravated colours, all the danger of embarking in such a desperate enterprize. Prince Charles having assembled about twelve thousand men, encamped in the neighbourhood of Fort William: and immediately hostilities were commenced. A handful of Keppoch's clan, commanded by major Donald Mac Donald, even before they joined the pretender, attacked two companies of new raised soldiers, who, with their officer, were disarmed after an obstinate dispute: another captain of the king's forces, falling into their hands, was courteously dismissed with one of the pretender's manifestos, and a passport for his personal safety. The lords of the regency issued a proclamation, offering a reward of thirty thousand pounds to any person who should apprehend the prince adventurer. The same price was set upon the head of the elector of Hanover, in a proclamation published by the pretender. A courier was dispatched to Holland, to hasten the return of his majesty, who arrived in England about the latter end of August. A requisition was made of the six thousand Dutch auxillaries; and several British regiments were recalled from the Netherlands. A loyal address was presented to the king by the city of London; and the merchants of his metropolis resolved to raise two regiments at their own expence. Orders were issued to keep the trained bands in readiness; to array the militia of Westminster; and instructions to the same effect were sent to all the lords lieutenants of the counties throughout the kingdom. The principal noblemen of the nation made a tender of their services to their sovereign; and some of them received commissions to levy regiments towards the suppression of the rebellion. Bodies of volunteers were incorporated in London, and many other places; associations were formed, large contributions raised in different towns, counties, and communities; and a great number of eminent merchants in London agreed to support the public credit, by receiving, as usual, Bank notes in payment, for the purposes of traffic. The Protestant clergy of all denominations exerted themselves with extraordinary ardour, in preaching against the religion of Rome and the pretender; and the friends of the government were encouraged, animated, and confirmed in their principles, by several spiritual productions published for the occasion.

In a word, the bulk of the nation seemed unanimously bent upon opposing the pretender, who nevertheless had already made surprising progress. His arrival in Scotland was no sooner confirmed, than sir John Cope, who commanded the troops in that kingdom, assembled what force he could bring together, and advanced against the rebels. Understanding, however, that they had taken possession of a strong pass, he changed his route, and proceeded northwards as far as Inverness, leaving the capital and the southern parts of North Britain wholly exposed to the incursions of the enemy. The Highlanders forthwith marched to Perth, where the chevalier de St. George was proclaimed king of Great Britain, and the public money seized for his use: the same steps were taken at Dundee and other places. Prince Charles was joined by the noblemen who assumed the title of duke of Perth, the viscount Strathallan, lord Nairn, lord George Murray, and many persons of distinction, with their followers. The marquis of Tullibardine, who had accompanied him from France, took possession of Athol, as heir of blood to the titles and estate which his younger brother enjoyed in consequence of his attainder; and met with some success in arming the tenants, for the support of that cause which he avowed. The rebel army being considerably augmented, though very ill provided with arms, crossed the Forth in the neighbourhood of Stirling, and advanced towards Edinburgh, where they were joined by lord Elcho, son of the earl of Wemys, and other persons of distinction. On the 16th of September Charles summoned the town to surrender. The inhabitants were divided by faction, and distracted by fear; the place was not in a posture of defence, and the magistrates would not expose the people to the uncertain issue of an assault. Several deputations were sent from the town to the pretender, in order to negociate terms of capitulation. In the mean time, one of the gates being opened for the admission of a coach, Cameron of Lochiel, one of the most powerful of the Highland chiefs, rushed into the place with a party of his men, and secured it without opposition. Next morning the whole rebel army entered, and their prince took possession of the royal palace of Holyrood House in the suburbs. Then he caused his father to be proclaimed at the market-cross; there also the manifesto was read, in which the chevalier de St. George declared his son Charles regent of his dominions, promised to dissolve the union, and redress the grievances of Scotland. His being in possession of the capital encouraged his followers, and added reputation to his arms: but the treasure belonging to the two banks of that kingdom had been previously conveyed into the castle, a strong fortress, with a good garrison, under the command of general Guest, an old officer of experience and capacity.

During these transactions, sir John Cope marched back from Inverness to Aberdeen, where he embarked with his troops, and on the 17th of September landed at Dunbar, about twenty miles to the eastward of Edinburgh. Here he was joined by two regiments of dragoons, which had retired with precipitation from the capital at the approach of the Highland army. With this reinforcement, his troops amounted to nearly three thousand men; and he began his march to Edinburgh, in order to give battle to the enemy. On the 20th of the month, he encamped in the neighbourhood of Preston-pans, having the village of Tranent in his front, and the sea in his rear. Early next morning he was attacked by the young pretender, at the head of about two thousand four hundred Highlanders half armed, who charged them sword in hand with such impetuosity, that in less than ten minutes after the battle began, the king's troops were broken and totally routed. The dragoons fled in the utmost confusion at the first onset; the general officers having made some unsuccessful efforts to rally them, thought proper to consult their own safety by an expeditious retreat towards Coldstream on the Tweed. All the infantry were either killed or taken; and the colours, artillery, tents, baggage, and military chest, fell into the hands of the victor, who returned in triumph to Edinburgh (b). Prince Charles bore his good fortune with moderation. He prohibited all rejoicings for the victory he had obtained: the wounded soldiers were treated with humanity; and the officers were sent into Fife and Angus, where they were left at liberty on their parole; which the greater part of them shamefully broke in the sequel. From this victory the pretender reaped manifold and important advantages. His followers were armed, his party encouraged, and his enemies intimidated. He was supplied with a train of artillery, and a considerable sum of money, and saw himself possessed of all Scotland, except the fortresses, the reduction of which he could not pretend to undertake without proper implements and engineers. After the battle he was joined by a small detachment from the Highlands; and some chiefs, who had hitherto been on the reserve, began to exert their influence in his favour. But he was not yet in a condition to take advantage of that consternation which his late success had diffused through the kingdom of England.

(a) Their natural principles were on this occasion stimulated by the suggestions of revenge. At the beginning of the war, a regiment of those people had been formed, and transported with the rest of the British troops to Flanders. Before they were embarked, a number of them deserted with their arms, on pretence that they had been decoyed into the service, by promises and assurances that they should never be sent abroad; and this was really the case. They were overtaken by a body of horse, persuaded to submit, brought back to London pinioned like malefactors, and tried for desertion. Three were shot to death in terrorem; and the rest were sent in exile to the plantations. Those who suffered were persons of some consequence in their own country; and their fate was deeply resented by the clans to which they belonged. It was considered as a national outrage: and the Highlanders, who are naturally vindictive, waited impatiently for an opportunity of vengeance.

Charles continued to reside in the palace of Holyrood-house (c); and took measures for cutting off the communication between the castle and the city. General Guest declared that he would demolish the city, unless the blockade should be raised, so as that provision might be carried into the castle. After having waited the return of an express which he had found means to dispatch to court, he began to put his threats in execution, by firing upon the town. Some houses were beaten down, and several persons killed even at the market cross. The citizens, alarmed at this disaster, sent a deputation to the prince, entreating him to raise the blockade; and he complied with their request. He levied a regiment in Edinburgh and the neighbourhood. He imposed taxes; seized the merchandize that was deposited in the king's warehouses at Leith, and other places; and compelled the city of Glasgow to accommodate him with a large sum, to be repaid when the peace of the kingdom should be re-established. The numbers of his followers daily increased: and he received considerable supplies of money, artillery, and ammunition, by single ships that arrived from France, where his interest seemed to rise in proportion to the success of his arms. The greater and richer part of Scotland was averse to his family and pretensions: but the people were unarmed and undisciplined, consequently passive under his dominion. By this time, however, the prince pretender was joined by the earl of Kilmarnock, the lords Elcho, Balmerino, Ogilvy, Pitsligo; and the eldest son of lord Lovat had begun to assemble his father's clan, in order to reinforce the victor, whose army lay encamped at Duddingston, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh (d). While Charles resided at Edinburgh, the marquis de Guilles arrived at Montrose, as envoy from the French king, with several officers, some cannon, and a considerable quantity of small arms for the use of that adventurer (e).

While the young pretender endeavoured to improve the advantage he had gained, the ministry of Great Britain took every possible measure to retard his progress. Several powerful chiefs in the Highlands were attached to the government, and exerted themselves in its defence. The duke of Argyle began to arm his vassals; but not before he had obtained the sanction of the legislature. Twelve hundred men were raised by the earl of Sunderland: the lord Rae brought a considerable number to the field: the Grants and Monroes appeared under their respective leaders for the service of his majesty: sir Alexander Macdonald declared for king George, and the laird of Macleod sent two thousand hardy Highlanders from Skie, to strengthen the same interest. These gentlemen, though supposed to be otherwise affected, were governed and directed by the advice of Duncan Forbes, president of the college of Justice at Edinburgh; a man of extensive knowledge, agreeable manners, and unblemished integrity. He procured commissions for raising twenty independent companies, and some of these he bestowed upon individuals who were either attached by principle, or engaged by promise, to the pretender. He acted with indefatigable zeal for the interest of the reigning family; and greatly injured an opulent fortune in their service. He confirmed several chiefs who began to waver in their principles: some he actually converted by the energy of his arguments, and brought over to the assistance of the government, which they had determined to oppose: others he persuaded to remain quiet, without taking any share in the present troubles. Certain it is, this gentleman, by his industry and address, prevented the insurrection of ten thousand Highlanders, who would otherwise have joined the pretender; and, therefore, he may be said to have been one great cause of that adventurer's miscarriage. The earl of Loudoun repaired to Inverness, where he completed his regiment of Highlanders; directed the conduct of the clans who had taken arms in behalf of his majesty; and, by his vigilance, over-awed the disaffected chieftains of that country, who had not yet openly engaged in the rebellion. Immediately after the defeat of Cope, six thousand Dutch troops (f) arrived in England, and three battalions of guards, with seven regiments of infantry, were recalled from Flanders, for the defence of the kingdom. They forthwith began their march to the North, under the command of general Wade, who received orders to assemble an army, which proceeded to Newcastle. The parliament meeting on the 16th of October, his majesty gave them to understand, that an unnatural rebellion had broke out in Scotland, towards the suppression of which he craved their advice and assistance. He found both houses cordial in their addresses, and zealous in their attachment to his person and government. The commons forthwith suspended the Habeas Corpus act; and several

(b) Never was a victory more complete, or obtained at a smaller expence; for not above fifty of the rebels lost their lives in the engagement. Five hundred of the king's troops were killed on the field of battle, and among these colonel Gardiner, a gallant officer, who disdained to save his life at the expence of his honour. When abandoned by his own regiment of dragoons, he alighted from his horse, joined the infantry, and fought on foot, until he fell covered with wounds, in sight of his own threshold.

(c) While he resided at Edinburgh, some of the presbyterian clergy continued to preach in the churches of that city, and publicly prayed for king George, without suffering the least punishment or molestation. One minister in particular, of the name of Mac Vicar, being solicited by some Highlanders to pray for their prince, promised to comply with their request, and performed his promise in words to this effect: "And as for the young prince, who is come hither in quest of an earthly crown, grant, O Lord, that he may speedily receive a crown of glory."

(d) Kilmarnock and Balmerino were men of broken and desperate fortune: Elcho and Ogilvie were sons to the earls of Wemys and Airly! so that their influence was far from being extensive. Pitsligo was a nobleman of a very amiable character, as well as of great personal interest; and great dependence was placed upon the power and attachment of lord Lovat, who had entered into private engagements with the chevalier de St. George, though he still wore the mask of loyalty to the government, and disavowed the conduct of his son when he declared for the pretender. This old nobleman is the same Simon Fraser whom we have had occasion to mention as a partizan and emissary of the court of St. Germain, in the year 1703. He had renounced his connexions with that family; and, in the rebellion, immediately after the accession of king George I. approved himself a warm friend to the Protestant succession. Since that period he had been induced, by disgust and ambition, to change his principles again, and was, in secret, an enthusiast in Jacobitism. He had greatly augmented his estate, and obtained a considerable interest in the Highlands, where, however, he was rather dreaded than beloved. He was bold, enterprising, vain, arbitrary, rapacious, cruel, and deceitful: but his character was chiefly marked by a species of low cunning and dissimulation, which, however, overshot his purpose, and contributed to his own ruin.

(e) He solicited, and is said to have obtained of the chevalier de St. George, the patent of a duke, and a commission for being lord lieutenant of all the Highlands.

(f) They were composed of the forces who had been in a garrison at Tournay and Dendermond when those places were taken, and engaged by capitulation, that they should not perform any military function before the first day of January in the year 1747; so they could not have acted in England without the infringement of a solemn treaty.

persons were apprehended on suspicion of treasonable practices. Immediately after the session was opened, the duke of Cumberland arrived from the Netherlands, and was followed by another detachment of dragoons and infantry. The trained bands of London were reviewed by his majesty: the county regiments were completed: the volunteers, in different parts of the kingdom, employed themselves industriously in the exercise of arms; and the whole English nation seemed to rise up as one man against this formidable invader. The government, being apprehensive of a descent from France, appointed admiral Vernon to command a squadron in the Downs, to observe the motions of the enemy by sea, especially in the harbours of Dunkirk and Boulogne; and his cruisers took several ships laden with soldiers, officers, and ammunition, destined for the service of the pretender in Scotland.

This enterprising youth, having collected about five thousand men, resolved to make an irruption into England, which he accordingly entered by the west border on the 6th of November. Carlisle was invested, and in less than three days surrendered: the keys were delivered to him at Brampton, by the mayor and aldermen on their knees. Here he found a considerable quantity of arms: his father was proclaimed king of Great Britain, and himself regent, by the magistrates in their formalities. General Wade being apprized of his progress, decamped from Newcastle, and advanced across the country as far as Hexham, though the fields were covered with snow, and the roads almost impassable. There he received intelligence that Carlisle was reduced, and forthwith returned to his former station. In the mean time orders were issued for assembling another army in Staffordshire, under the command of sir John Ligonier. Prince Charles, notwithstanding this formidable opposition, determined to proceed. He had received assurances from France, that a considerable body of troops would be landed on the southern coast of Britain, to make a diversion in his favour; and he never doubted but he should be joined by all the English malcontents, as soon as he could penetrate into the heart of the kingdom. Leaving a small garrison in the castle of Carlisle, he advanced to Penrith, marching on foot in the Highland garb, at the head of his forces; and continued his route through Lancaster and Preston to Manchester, where, on the 29th, of the month, he established his head-quarters. There he was joined by about two hundred Englishmen, who were formed into a regiment, under the command of colonel Townley. The inhabitants seemed to receive him with marks of affection; and his arrival was celebrated by illuminations, and other public rejoicings. His supposed intention was to prosecute his march by the way of Chester into Wales, where he hoped to find a great number of adherents: but all the bridges over the river Mersey being broke down, he chose the route to Stockport, and forded the river at the head of his division, though the water rose to his middle. He passed through Macclesfield and Congleton; and on the 4th of December entered the town of Derby, in which his army was quartered, and his father proclaimed with great formality. He had now advanced within one hundred miles of the capital, which was filled with terror and confusion. Wade lingered in Yorkshire: the duke of Cumberland had assumed the command of the other army assembled in the neighbourhood of Litchfield. He had marched from Stafford to Stone; so that the rebels, in turning off from Ashborne to Derby, had gained a march between him and London. Had Charles proceeded in his career with that expedition which he had hitherto used, he might have made himself master of the metropolis, where he would have been certainly joined by a considerable number of his well wishers, who waited impatiently for his approach: yet this exploit could not have been atchieved without hazarding an engagement, and running the risque of being enclosed within three armies, each greatly superior to his own in number and artillery. Orders were given for forming a camp on Finchley Common, where the king resolved to take the field in person, accompanied by the earl of Stair, field marshal and commander in chief of the forces in South Britain. Some Romish priests were apprehended: the militia of London and Middlesex were kept in readiness to march: double watches were posted at the city gates, and signals of alarm appointed. The volunteers of the city were incorporated into a regiment: the practitioners of the law, headed by the judges, the weavers of Spital Fields, and other communities, engaged in associations; and even the managers of the theatres offered to raise a body of their dependents for the service of the government. Notwithstanding these precautions and appearances of unanimity, the trading part of the city, and those concerned in the money corporations, were overwhelmed with fear and dejection. They reposed very little confidence in the courage or discipline of their militia and volunteers: they had received intelligence that the French were employed in making preparations at Dunkirk and Calais for a descent upon England: they dreaded an insurrection of the Roman catholics, and other friends of the house of Stuart; and they reflected that the Highlanders, of whom by this time they had conceived a most terrible idea, were within four days march of the capital. This state of suspense was of short duration. The young pretender found himself miserably disappointed in his expectations. He had now advanced into the middle of the kingdom, and except a few that joined him at Manchester, not a soul appeared in his behalf. The Welch took no step to excite an insurrection in his favour: the French made no attempt towards an invasion: his court was divided into factions: the Highland chiefs began to murmur, and their clans to be unruly: he saw himself with a handful of men hemmed in between two considerable armies, in the middle of winter, and in a country disaffected to his cause. He knew he could not proceed to the metropolis without hazarding a battle, and that a defeat would be attended with the inevitable destruction of himself and all his adherents; and he had received information that his friends and officers had assembled a body of forces in the north, superior in number to those by whom he was attended. He called a council at Derby; and proposed to advance towards London: the proposal was supported by lord Nairn with great vehemence; but, after violent disputes, the majority determined that they should retreat to Scotland with all possible expedition. Accordingly, they abandoned Derby on the 6th of December, early in the morning, and measured back the route by which they had advanced. On the 9th their vanguard arrived at Manchester: on the 12th they entered Preston, and continued their march northwards. The duke of Cumberland, who was encamped at Meriden, when first apprized of their retreat, detached the horse and dragoons in pursuit of them; while general Wade began his march from Ferrybridge into Lancashire, with a view of intercepting them in their route: but at Wakefield he understood that they had already reached Wigan: he, therefore, repaired to his old post at Newcastle, after having detached general Oglethorpe, with his horse and dragoons, to join those who had been sent off from the duke's army. They pursued with such alacrity, that they overtook the rear of the rebels, with which they skirmished, in Lancashire. The militia of Cumberland and Westmoreland were raised and armed by the duke's order, to harrass them in their march. The bridges were broken down, the roads damaged, and the beacons lighted to alarm the country. Nevertheless, they retreated regularly with their small train of artillery. They were overtaken at the village of Clifton, in the neighbourhood of Penrith, by two regiments of dragoons. These alighted, and lined the hedges, in order to harrass part of the enemy's rear-guard, commanded by lord John Murray; who, at the head of the Macphersons, attacked the dragoons sword in hand, and repulsed them with some loss. On the 19th of the month, the Highland army reached Carlisle, where the majority of the English in the service of the pretender were left, at their own desire. Charles, having reinforced the garrison of the place, crossed the rivers Eden and Solway into Scotland, having thus accomplished one of the most surprising retreats that ever was performed. But the most remarkable circumstance of this expedition, was the moderation and regularity with which those ferocious people conducted themselves in a country abounding with plunder. No violence was offered; no outrage committed; and they were effectually restrained from the exercise of rapine. Notwithstanding the excessive cold, the hunger, and the fatigue to which they must have been exposed, they left behind no sick, and lost a very few stragglers; but retired with deliberation, and carried off their cannon in the face of their enemy. The duke of Cumberland invested Carlisle with his whole army on the 21st of December, and on the 30th the garrison surrendered on a sort of capitulation made with the duke of Richmond. The prisoners, amounting to about four hundred, were imprisoned in different gaols in England, and the duke returned to the metropolis.

The

The pretender proceeded by the way of Dumfries to Glasgow, from which last city he exacted severe contributions, on account of its attachment to the government, for whose services it had raised a regiment of nine hundred men, under the command of the earl of Home. Having continued several days at Glasgow, he advanced towards Stirling, and was joined by some forces which had been assembled in his absence by lords Lewis Gordon and John Drummond, brothers to the dukes of Gordon and Perth. This last nobleman had arrived from France in November, with a small reinforcement of French and Irish, and a commission as general of these auxiliaries. He fixed his head quarters at Perth, where he was reinforced by the earl of Cromartie, and other clans, to the number of two thousand, and was accommodated with a small train of artillery. They had found means to surprize a sloop of war at Montrose, with the guns of which they fortified that harbour. They had received a considerable sum of money from Spain. They took possession of Dundee, Dumblaine, Downcastle, and laid Fife under contribution. The earl of Loudoun remained at Inverness, with about two thousand Highlanders in the service of his majesty. He convoyed provisions to Fort Augustus and Fort William: he secured the person of lord Lovat, who still temporized, and at length this cunning veteran accomplished his escape. The laird of Macleod, and Mr. Monroof Culcairn, being detached from Inverness towards Aberdeenshire, were surprized and routed by lord Lewis Gordon at Inverary; and that interest seemed to preponderate in the north of Scotland. Prince Charles being joined by lord John Drummond, invested the castle of Stirling, in which general Blakeney commanded: but his people were so little used to enterprizes of this kind, that they made very little progress in their operations.

A considerable body of forces was by this time assembled at Edinburgh, under the conduct of general Hawley, who determined to relieve Stirling Castle, and advance to Linlithgow on the 13th of January, 1746: next day his whole army rendezvoused at Falkirk, while the rebels were cantoned about Bannockburn. On the 17th of the month, they began their march in two columns to attack the king's forces, and had forded the water of Carven, within three miles of Hawley's camp, before he discovered their intention. Such was his obstinacy, self-conceit, or contempt of the enemy, that he slighted the repeated intelligence he had received of their motions and designs, firmly believing they durst not hazard an engagement. At length, perceiving they had occupied the rising ground to the southward of Falkirk, he ordered his cavalry to advance, and drive them from the eminence; while his infantry formed, and were drawn up in order of battle. The Highlanders kept up their fire, and took aim so well, that the assailants were broke by the first volley: they retreated with precipitation, and fell in amongst the infantry, which were likewise discomposed by the wind and rain beating with great violence in their faces, wetting their powder, and disturbing their eye-sight. Some of the dragoons rallied, and advanced again to the charge, with part of the infantry which had not been engaged: then the pretender marched up at the head of his corps de reserve, consisting of the regiment of lord John Drummond, and the Irish piquets. These reinforcing the Camerons and the Stuarts in the front line, immediately obliged the dragoons to give way a second time; and they again disordered the foot in their retreat. They set fire to their camp and abandoned Falkirk with their baggage and train, which last had never reached the field of battle. The rebels followed the first blow, and great part of the royal army, after one irregular discharge, turned their backs, and fled in the utmost consternation. In all probability few or none of them would have escaped, had not general Huske, and brigadier Cholmondeley, rallied part of some regiments, and made a gallant stand, which favoured the retreat of the rest to Falkirk, from whence they retired in confusion to Edinburgh, leaving the field of battle, with part of their tents and artillery to the rebels: but their loss of men did not exceed three hundred, including sir Robert Monro, colonel Whitney, and some other officers of distinction. It was at this period, that the officers who had been taken at the battle of Preston Pans, and conveyed to Angus and Fife, finding themselves unguarded, broke their parole, and returned to Edinburgh, on pretence of their having been forcibly released by the inhabitants of those parts.

General Hawley, who had boasted that, with two regiments of dragoons, he would drive the rebel army from one end of the kingdom to the other, incurred abundance of censure for the disposition he made, as well as for his conduct before, and after the action; but he found means to vindicate himself to the satisfaction of his sovereign. Nevertheless, it was judged necessary that the army in Scotland should be commanded by a general in whom the soldiers might have some confidence; and the duke of Cumberland was chosen for this purpose. He was beloved by the army, and it was suggested, that the appearance of a prince of the blood in Scotland might have a favourable effect upon the minds of the people in that kingdom; he, therefore, began to prepare for his northern expedition. Meanwhile, the French minister at the Hague having represented to the States General, that the auxiliaries which they had sent into Great Britain were part of the garrison of Tournay and Dendermonde, and restricted by the capitulation from bearing arms against France for a certain term, the States thought proper to recall them, rather than come to an open rupture with his most Christian majesty. In the room of those troops six thousand Hessians were transported from Flanders to Leith, where they arrived in the beginning of February, under the command of their prince, Frederic of Hesse, son-in-law to his Britannic majesty. By this time the duke of Cumberland had put himself at the head of the troops in Edinburgh, consisting of fourteen battalions of infantry, two regiments of dragoons, and twelve hundred Highlanders from Argyleshire, under the command of colonel Campbell.

On the 31st of January, his Royal Highness began his march to Linlithgow; and the enemy who had renewed the siege of Stirling Castle, not only abandoned that enterprize, but crossed the Forth with precipitation. Their prince found great difficulty in maintaining his forces, that part of the country being quite exhausted. He hoped to be reinforced in the Highlands, and receive fresh supplies of all kinds from France and Spain: he, therefore, retired by Badenoch towards Inverness, which the earl of Loudoun abandoned at his approach. The fort was surrendered to him almost without opposition, and here he fixed his head-quarters. His next exploit was the siege of Fort Augustus, which he in a little time reduced. The duke of Cumberland having secured the important posts of Stirling and Perth, with the Hessian battalions, advanced with the army to Aberdeen, where he was joined by the duke of Gordon, the earls of Aberdeen and Findlater, the laird of Grant, and other persons of distinction.

While he remained in this place refreshing his troops, and preparing magazines, a party of the rebels surprized a detachment of Kingston's horse, and about seventy Argyleshire Highlanders, at Keith, who were either killed or taken. Several advanced parties of that militia met with the same fate in different places. Lord George Murray invested the castle of Blair, which was defended by sir Andrew Agnew, until a body of Hessians marched to its relief, and obliged the rebels to retire. The prince pretender ordered all his forces to assemble, in order to begin his march for Aberdeen, to attack the duke of Cumberland: but, in consequence of a remonstrance from the clans, who declined leaving their families at the mercy of the king's garrison in Fort William, he resolved previously to reduce that fortress, the siege of which was undertaken by brigadier Stapleton, an engineer in the French service: but the place was so vigorously defended by captain Scott, that in the beginning of April they thought proper to relinquish the enterprize. The earl of Loudoun had retired into Sutherland, and took post at Dornoch, where his quarters were beat up by a strong detachment of the rebels, commanded by the duke of Perth: a major and sixty men were taken prisoners; and the earl was obliged to take shelter in the Isle of Skye. These little checks were counterbalanced by some advantages which his majesty's arms obtained. The sloop of war which the rebels had surprized at Montrose was retaken in Sutherland, with a considerable sum of money, and a great quantity of arms on board, which she had brought from France for the use of the pretender. In the same county, the earl of Cromartie fell into an ambuscade, and was taken by the militia of Sutherland, who likewise defeated a body of the rebels at Goldspie. This action happened on the very day which had been rendered famous by the victory obtained at Culloden.

In the beginning of April, the duke of Cumberland began his march from Aberdeen, and on the 12th passed the the deep and rapid river Spey, without opposition from the rebels, though a detachment of them appeared on the opposite side. His royal highness proceeded to Nairn, where he received intelligence, that the enemy had advanced from Inverness to Culloden, about the distance of nine miles from the royal army, with intention to give him battle. The design of Charles was to march in the night from Culloden, and surprize the duke's army at day-break: for this purpose the English camp had been reconnoitered; and on the night of the 15th the Highland army began to march in two columns. Their design was to surround the enemy, and attack them at once on all quarters: but the length of the columns embarrassed the march, so that the army was obliged to make many halts: the men had been under arms during the whole preceding night, were faint with hunger and fatigue, and many of them overpowered with sleep. Some were unable to proceed; others dropped off unperceived in the dark; and the march was retarded in such a manner, that it would have been impossible to reach the duke's camp before sun-rise. The design being thus frustrated, the prince pretender was with great reluctance prevailed upon by his general officers to measure back his may to Culloden; at which place he had no sooner arrived, than great numbers of his followers dispersed in quest of provision; and many, overcome with weariness and sleep, threw themselves down on the heath, and along the park walls. Their repose, however, was soon interrupted in a very disagreeable manner. The prince, receiving intelligence that his enemies were in full march to attack him, resolved to hazard an engagement, and ordered his troops to be formed for that purpose. On the 16th of April, the duke of Cumberland having made the proper dispositions, decamped from Nairn early in the morning, and after a march of nine miles perceived the Highlanders drawn up in order of battle, to the number of four thousand men, in thirteen divisions, supplied with some pieces of artillery. The royal army, which was much more numerous, the duke immediately formed into three lines, disposed in excellent order: and about one o'clock in the afternoon the cannonading began. The artillery of the rebels was ill served, and did very little execution; but that of the king's troops made dreadful havoc among the enemy. Impatient of this fire, their front line advanced to the attack, and about five hundred of the clans charged the duke's left wing with their usual impetuosity. One regiment was disordered by the weight of this column; but two battalions advancing from the second line, sustained the first, and soon put a stop to their career, by a severe fire that killed a great number. At the same time, the dragoons under Hawley, and the Argyleshire militia pulled down a park wall that covered their right flank, and the cavalry falling in among the rebels, sword in hand, completed their confusion. The French picquets on their left, covered the retreat of the Highlanders by a close and regular fire; and then retired to Inverness, where they surrendered themselves prisoners of war. An entire body of the rebels marched off the field with their pipes playing, and the pretender's standard displayed; the rest were routed with great slaughter; and their prince was, with reluctance prevailed upon to retire. In less than thirty minutes they were totally defeated, and the field covered with the slain (g). The vanquished adventurer rode off the field accompanied by the duke of Perth, lord Elcho, and a few horsemen: he crossed the water of Nairn, and retired to the house of a gentleman in Strutharrick, where he conferred with old lord Lovat; then he dismissed his followers, and wandered about, a wretched and solitary fugitive, among the isles and mountains for the space of five months, during which he underwent such a series of dangers, hardships, and misery, as no other person ever out lived. Thus, in one short hour, all his hope vanished, and the rebellion was entirely extinguished. When the news of the battle arrived in England, the nation was transported with joy, and extolled the duke of Cumberland as a hero and deliverer. Both houses of parliament congratulated his majesty on the auspicious event. They decreed, in the most solemn manner, their public thanks to his Royal Highness, which were transmitted to him by the speakers; and the commons, by bill, added five and twenty thousand pounds per annum to his former revenue.

Immediately after the decisive action at Culloden, the duke took possession of Inverness, where six-and-thirty deserters, convicted by a court-martial, were ordered to be executed: then he detached several parties to ravage the country. One of these apprehended the lady Mackintosh, who was sent prisoner to Inverness. They did not plunder her house, but drove away her cattle, though her husband was actually in the service of government. The castle of lord Lovat was destroyed. The French prisoners were sent to Carlisle and Penrith: Kilmarnock, Balmerino, Cromartie, and his son the lord Macleod were conveyed by sea to London; and those of an inferior rank were confined in different prisons. The marquis of Tullibardine, together with a brother of the earl of Dunmore, were seized, and transported to the Tower of London, to which the earl of Traquaire had been committed on suspicion: in a few months after the battle of Culloden, Murray the pretender's secretary, was apprehended; and the eldest son of lord Lovat, having surrendered himself, was imprisoned in the castle of Edinburgh. In a word, all the gaols of Great Britain, from the capital northwards, were filled with those unfortunate captives; and great numbers of them were crowded together in the holds of ships, where they perished in the most deplorable manner, for want of necessaries, air, and exercise. Some rebel chiefs, escaped in two French frigates, which had arrived on the coast of Lochaber about the end of April, and engaged three vessels belonging to his Britannic majesty, which they obliged to retire. Others embarked on board of a ship on the coast of Buchan; and were conveyed to Norway, from thence they travelled to Sweden. In the month of May, the duke of Cumberland advanced with the army into the Highlands, as far as Fort Augustus, where he encamped; and sent off detachments on all hands, to hunt down the fugitives, and lay waste the country with fire and sword. The castles of Glengary and Lochiel were plundered and burned: every house, hut, or habitation, met with the same fate, without distinction: all the cattle and provision were carried off: the men were either shot upon the mountains, like wild beasts, or put to death in cold blood, without form of trial: the women, after having seen their husbands and fathers murdered, were subjected to brutal violation, and then turned out naked, with their children, to starve on the barren heaths. One whole family was enclosed in a barn, and consumed to ashes. Those ministers of vengeance were so alert in the execution of their office, that in a few days there was neither house, cottage, man, nor beast, to be seen in the compass of fifty miles: all was ruin, silence, and desolation.

The humane reader cannot reflect upon such a scene without grief and horror: what then must have been the sensation of the fugitive prince, when he beheld these spectacles of woe, the dismal fruit of his ambition? He was now surrounded by armed troops, that chased him from hill to dale, from rock to cavern, and from shore to shore. Sometimes he lurked in caves and cottages, without attendants, or any other support but that which the poorest peasant could supply. Sometimes he was rowed in fisher-boats from isle to isle, among the Hebrides, and often in sight of his pursuers. For some days he appeared in woman's attire, and even passed through the midst of his enemies unknown. But, understanding his disguise was discovered, he assumed the habit of a travelling mountaineer, and wandered about among the woods and heaths, with a matted beard and squalid looks, exposed to hunger, thirst, and weariness, and in continual danger of being apprehended. He was obliged to trust his life to the fidelity of above fifty individuals, and many of these were in the lowest paths of fortune. They knew that a price of thirty thousand pounds was set upon his head; and that, by betraying him, they should enjoy wealth and affluence: but they detested the thought of obtaining riches on such infamous terms, and ministered to his necessities with the utmost zeal and fidelity, even at the hazard of their own destruction. One day, having walked from morning till night, he ventured to enter a house, the owner of which he well knew was attached to the opposite party. As he entered, he addressed the master of the house in the following manner: "The son of your king comes to beg a little bread and a few cloaths. I know your present attachment to my adversaries, but I believe you have sufficient honour not to abuse my confidence, or take advantage of my distressed situation. Take these rags that have for some time been my only covering; you may probably restore them to me one day when I shall be seated on the throne of Great Britain." The master of the house was touched with pity at his distress; he assisted him as far as he was able, and never divulged the secret. There were few of those who even wished his destruction, would choose to be the immediate actors in it, as it would subject them to the resentment of a numerous party. In the course of these peregrinations, he was more than once hemmed in by his pursuers, in such a manner as seemed to preclude all possibility of escaping: yet he was never abandoned by his hope and recollection: he still found some expedient that saved him from captivity and death; and through the whole course of his distresses maintained the most amazing equanimity and good humour. At length a privateer of St. Malo, hired by the young Sheridan and some other adherents, arrived in Lochnannach; and on the 20th of September, this unfortunate prince embarked in the habit which he wore for disguise. He was clad in a short coat of black frieze, threadbare, over which was a common Highland plaid, girt round him by a belt, from whence depended a pistol and a dagger. He had not been shifted for many weeks. His eyes were hollow, his visage wan, and his constitution greatly impaired by famine and fatigue. He was accompanied by Cameron of Lochiel, and his brother, with a few other exiles. They set sail for France on the 10th of August, 1746, and after having passed unseen, by means of a thick fog, through a British squadron commanded by admiral Lestock, and been chased by two English ships of war, arrived in safety at Roseau, near Morlaix, in Bretagne. Perhaps he would have found it still more difficult to escape, had not the vigilance and eagerness of the government been relaxed, in consequence of a report, that he had already fallen among some persons that were slain by a volley from one of the duke's detachments.

(g) The road, as far as Inverness, was strewed with dead bodies; and a great number of people, who, from motives of curiosity, had come to see the battle, were sacrificed to the undistinguishing vengeance of the victors. Twelve hundred rebels were slain or wounded on the field, and in the pursuit. The earl of Kilmarnock was taken; and in a few days lord Balmerino surrendered to a country gentleman, at whose house he presented himself for this purpose. The glory of the victory was sullied by the barbarity of the soldiers. They had been provoked by their former disgraces to the most savage thirst of revenge. Not contented with the blood which was so profusely shed in the heat of action, they traversed the field after the battle, and massacred those miserable wretches who lay maimed and expiring: nay, some officers acted a part in this cruel scene of assassination, the triumph of low illiberal minds uninspired by sentiment, untinctured by humanity.

Having thus explained the rise, progress, and extinction of the rebellion, it will be necessary to take a retrospective view of the proceedings against the rebellious. In June, an act of attainder was passed against the principal persons who had embarked in that desperate undertaking; and courts were opened in different parts of England, for the trial of the prisoners. Seventeen officers of the rebel army were executed at Kennington Common in the neighbourhood of London, and suffered with great constancy under the dreadful tortures which their sentence prescribed: nine were put to death, in the same manner, at Carlisle: six at Brumpton, seven at Penrith, and eleven at York: of these a considerable number were gentlemen, and had acted as officers; about fifty had been executed as deserters in different parts of Scotland: eighty-one suffered the pains of the law as traitors. A few obtained pardons, and a considerable number were transported to the plantations. Bills of indictment for high-treason were found by the county of Surrey against the earls of Kilmarnock and Cromartie, and lord Balmerino. These noblemen were tried by their peers in Westminster Hall, the lord chancellor presiding as lord high steward for the occasion. The two earls confessed their crimes, and in pathetic speeches recommended themselves to his majesty's mercy. Lord Balmerino pleaded not guilty: he denied his having been at Carlisle at the time specified in the indictment, but this exception was over-ruled: then he moved a point of law in arrest of judgement, and was allowed to be heard by his counsel. They might have expatiated on the hardships of being tried by an ex post facto law, and claimed the privilege of trial in the country where the act of treason was said to have been committed. The same hardship was imposed upon all the imprisoned rebels: they were dragged in captivity to a strange country, far from their friends and connexions, destitute of means to produce evidence in their favour, even if they had been innocent of the charge. Balmerino waved this plea, and submitted to the court, which pronounced sentence of death upon him and his two associates. Cromartie's life was spared; but the other two were beheaded, on the 18th of August, on Tower Hill (h). In November, Mr. Radcliffe, the titular earl of Derwentwater, who had been taken in a ship bound to Scotland, was arraigned on a former sentence, passed against him in the year 1716: he refused to acknowledge the authority of the court, and pleaded that he was a subject of France, honoured with a commission in the service of his most christian majesty. The identity of his person being proved, a rule was made for his execution, and on the 8th of December he suffered decapitation, with the most perfect composure and serenity. Lord Lovat, now turned of fourscore, was impeached by the commons, and tried in Westminster Hall before the lord high steward. John Murray, secretary to the prince pretender, and some of his own domestics appearing against him, he was convicted of high treason, and condemned. Notwithstanding his age, infirmities, and the recollection of his conscience, which was supposed to be not altogether void of offence, he died like an old Roman, exclaiming, "Dulce et decorum pro patria mori." He surveyed the crowd with attention, examined the axe, jested with the executioner, and laid his head upon the block with the utmost indifference. From this last scene of his life one would have concluded, that he had approved himself a patriot from his youth, and never deviated from the paths of virtue. Thus ended the last effort of the family of the Stuarts for re-ascending the throne of England.

When the people had in some measure recovered from their consternation on account of the rebellion, the legislature undertook to establish several regulations in Scotland, which were equally conducive to the happiness of the people and the tranquillity of the united kingdoms. The Highlanders had till this time continued to wear the old military dress of their ancestors, and never went without arms. In consequence of this, they considered themselves as a body of people distinct from the rest of the nation, and were ready upon the shortest notice to second the insurrections of their chiefs. But their habits were now reformed by an act of the legislature, and they were compelled to wear cloaths of the common fashion. That, however, which contributed most to their real felicity, was the abolition of that hereditary jurisdiction which the chiefs exerted over them. The power of their chieftains was totally destroyed, and every subject in that part of the kingdom was granted a participation of the common liberty.

During the time that England was thus convulsed at home, the flames of war continued to rage upon the continent with increasing violence. The arms of France were crowned with repeated success, and almost the whole of the Netherlands were reduced under the dominion of the Gallic sovereign. The Dutch negociated, supplicated, and evaded the war; but they found themselves every day stripped of some of those strong towns which formed a barrier to their dominions, and which they had been put in possession of by the victories of the duke of Marlborough. They now lay almost defenceless, and ready to receive the terms of the conquerors, their national bravery being quite overcome by the spirit of commerce and luxury.

The Dutch were at this time divided by factions which had subsisted for above a century in their republic. The one declared for the prince of Orange and a stadtholder, the other opposed this election, and desired rather friendship than to be at variance with France. The prevalence of either of these factions to its utmost extent was equally fatal to freedom; for, if a stadtholder were elected, the constitution would become altered from a republic to a kind of limited monarch; if, on the contrary, the opposite party prevailed, the people must submit to a kind of aristocracy, supported by French power, and liable to its control. Of the two evils they chose the former: the people of several towns, inflamed almost to sedition, compelled their magistrates to declare the prince of Orange stadtholder, captain-general, and admiral of the United Provinces. The vigorous consequences of this resolution immediately appeared. All commerce with the French was prohibited; the Dutch army was augmented, and orders were issued to commence hostilities against the French by sea and land. Thus the war, which had begun but in a single country, was now diffused over all Europe; and like a pestilential disease prevailed in different parts of this great political constitution, remitting and raging in rotation.

(h) Kilmarnock was a nobleman of fine personal accomplishments; he had been educated in revolutionary principles, and engaged in the rebellion, partly from the desperate situation of his fortune, and partly from resentment to the government, on his being deprived of a pension which he had for some time enjoyed. He was convinced of his having acted criminally, and died with marks of penitence and contrition. Balmerino had been bred to arms, and acted upon principle: he was gallant, brave, rough, and resolute; he eyed the implements of death with the most careless familiarity, and seemed to triumph in his sufferings.

The king of Sardinia, who had some years before joined France against England, now changed sides, and declared against the ambitious power of France. Italy felt all the terrors of intestine war, or more properly surveyed, while foreigners were contending with each other for her usurped dominions. The French and Spaniards on one side, and the Imperialists and the king of Sardinia on the other, ravaged those beautiful territories by turns, and gave laws to a country that had once swayed the sceptre over the greater part of the then known world.

On the 30th of September, the English landed a body of forces at Quimperley Bay, ten miles from Port l'Orient, upon which sea port they made an unsuccessful attempt, though the place was but weakly defended, and drew off their troops in a panic. The next day general Sinclair advanced into the country, skirmishing with the enemy in his route; and arrived at the village of Plemure, within half a league from Port l'Orient, summoned that place to surrender. He was visited by a deputation from the town, which offered to admit the British forces on condition that they should be restrained from pillaging the inhabitants, and touching the magazines; and that they should pay a just price for their provisions. These terms being rejected, the inhabitants prepared for a vigorous defence; and the English general resolved to besiege the place in form, though he had neither time, artillery, nor forces sufficient for such an enterprize. This strange resolution was owing to the declaration of the engineers, who promised to lay the place in ashes in the space of four-and-twenty hours. All his cannon amounted to no more than a few field-pieces; and he was obliged to wait for two iron guns, which the sailors dragged up from the shipping. Had he given the assault on the first night after his arrival, when the town was filled with terror and confusion, and destitute of regular troops, in all probability it would have been easily taken by scalade: but the reduction of it was rendered impracticable by his delay. The ramparts were mounted with cannon from the ships in the harbour: new works were raised with great industry: the garrison was reinforced by several bodies of regular troops; and great numbers were assembling from all parts; so that the British forces were in danger of being surrounded in an enemy's country. Notwithstanding these discouragements, they opened a small battery against the town, which was set on fire in several places by their bombs and red hot bullets: they likewise repulsed part of the garrison which had made a sally to destroy their works: but their cannon producing no effect upon the fortifications, the fire from the town daily increasing, the engineers owning they could not perform their promise, and admiral Lestock declaring, in repeated messages, that he could no longer expose the ships on an open coast at such a season of the year, general Sinclair abandoned the siege. Having caused the two iron pieces of cannon and the mortars to be spiked, he retreated in good order to the sea-side, where his troops were re-embarked, having sustained very inconsiderable damage since their first landing. He expected reinforcements from England, was resolved to wait a little longer for their arrival, in hopes of being able to annoy the enemy more effectually. In the beginning of October the fleet sailed to Quiberon Bay, where they destroyed the Ardent, a French ship of war of sixty-four guns; and a detachment of the forces being landed, took possession of a fort on the peninsula; while the little islands of Houat and Heydic were reduced by the sailors. In this situation the admiral and general continued till the 17th of the month, when the forts being dismantled, and the troops re-embarked, the fleet sailed from the French coast; the admiral returned to England, and the transports with the soldiers proceeded to Ireland, where they arrived in safety.

The French gained a considerable victory at Roucroux in Flanders, although it procured them no real advantage, and cost them as many lives as they destroyed of the enemy. Another victory, which they obtained at La Feldt, served to depress the allied army still lower. But the taking of Bergen op Zoom, the strongest fortification of Dutch Brabant, reduced the Dutch to a state of desperation. These victories gained by the French were, however, counterbalanced with almost equal disappointments. In Italy, the marshal Belleisle's brother attempted to penetrate, at the head of thirty-four thousand men, into Piedmont, but was routed, and himself slain. An unsuccessful fleet was sent out for the recovery of Cape Breton. Two more were fitted out, the one to make a descent upon the British colonies in America, and another to carry on the operations in the East Indies; but these were attacked by Anson and Warren, and nine of their ships taken. Soon after this, commodore Fox, with six ships of war, took above forty French ships richly laden from St. Domingo; and this loss was soon after followed by another defeat, which the French fleet sustained from admiral Hawke, in which seven ships of the line, and several frigates were taken.

In this manner victory, defeat, negociation, treachery, and rebellion, succeeded each other in quick succession for some years, till all sides began to think themselves getting more feeble, and gaining no solid advantage; and consequently growing tired of the war, they came to the resolution that a negociation should be set on foot. The contending powers therefore agreed to assemble a congress at Aix la Chapelle, in the beginning of 1748, where the earl of Sandwich and sir Thomas Robinson assisted as plenipotentiaries from the king of Great Britain. Though the preliminary articles were signed in the spring, the definitive treaty was not completed till October the 7th, 1748. This famous treaty was begun upon the conditions of restoring all conquests made during the war. From thence great hopes were expected of conditions both favourable and honourable to the English; but the treaty still remains a lasting mark of precipitate counsels and English disgrace. By this it was agreed, that all prisoners on each side should be mutually restored, and all conquests given up. That the duchies of Parma, Placentia, and Guastalla, should be ceded to Don Philip, heir-apparent to the Spanish throne, and to his heirs; but in case of his succeeding to the crown of Spain, and then these dominions should revert to the house of Austria. It was confirmed that the fortifications of Dunkirk towards the sea should be demolished; that the English ships annually sent with slaves to the coast of New Spain should have this privilege for four years. That the king of Prussia should be confirmed in the possession of Silesia, which he had lately conquered; and that the queen of Hungary should be secured in her patrimonial dominions. But one article of the treaty was more displeasing to the English than all the rest. It was stipulated that the king of Great Britain should immediately, after the ratification of the articles, send two persons of rank and distinction to France as hostages, until restitution should be made of Cape Breton, and all other conquests which England had made during the war. This was a mortifying clause; but to add to the general error of negociation, no mention was made of the searching the vessels of England in the American seas, upon which the war was originally begun. The limits of their respective possessions in North America were not ascertained; nor did they receive any equivalent for those forts which they restored to the enemy. The treaty of Utrecht had long been the object of reproach to those by whom it was made; but, with all its faults, the treaty now concluded was by far more despicable and erroneous. Yet such was the spirit of the times, that the treaty of Utrecht was branded with universal contempt, and the treaty of Aix la Chapelle was extolled with the highest strains of panegyric. But the people were wearied with repeated disgrace, and only expecting an accumulation of misfortunes by a continuance of the war, they were glad of any peace that promised a pause to their disappointments.

CHAP. II.

WHILE the inhabitants of Great Britain were solacing themselves with the pleasing thoughts of a termination of the war, the king, who had passed some months on the continent, returned to the personal government of his realm. He was received with popular acclamations; and the peace which he had concluded, though not entirely satisfactory, was celebrated with great festivity (i).

(i) Splendid fire-works were exhibited in St. James's Park, at Dublin, at the Hague, and other places, which were highly calculated to work upon the minds of the populace.

When

When the parliament met on the 29th of November, 1748, the king in his speech observed, that, by the late negociation, he had secured the rights and interests of his people, and had obtained for his associates in the war, the most favourable terms that the posture of affairs would allow: he intimated that he had made some progress in the diminution of the public expences; requested supplies for the execution of engagements already contracted; and recommended a reduction of the national debt, an encouragement of commerce, and an attention to all the arts of peace.

The prince of Wales, not being satisfied with the conduct of the ministry, nor with the treatment which he had received from his father, who had never yet complimented him with the honours of the regency, or admitted him to any share in the government, had manifested an intention of opposing, by the medium of his friends and servants, the parliamentary proceedings of the court. His revival of the ancient powers annexed to the dukedom of Cornwall, by which he would have acquired great influence in the elections for that county, alarmed the ministers; and they resolved to counteract his schemes and pretensions.

Notwithstanding the secession of the prince's friends from the court, a very considerable majority, in both houses, continued to support the administration. When it was proposed in the lower house, that the address of thanks for the harangue of the sovereign should convey a strong approbation of the terms of the peace, the partizans of Frederic, among whom the earl of Egmont was the principal speaker, condemned such praise as undeserved, and vilified the treaty as premature, imperfect, and dishonourable: but the courtiers defended it as the best which could be obtained under the existing circumstances; and the address passed without amendment.

Vehement debates were occasioned when the pecuniary demands of the court were brought forward; but all the objections of the antiministerialists were overpowered. The statement of the debts contracted in various departments produced just complaints of the profusion of the government, which had been so liberally supplied by the nation. For liquidating these debts, answering the engagements of the crown to foreign powers, maintaining the army and navy, and other purposes, above eight millions were granted. An extraordinary demand of a hundred thousand pounds, for the use of the queen of Hungary, aroused a lively indignation at the rapacity of that princess, and the subserviency of the court of England to her will.

Great alarm was excited by the production of a bill for the regulation of the navy; the chief purport of which was to render half-pay officers amenable to martial law. Some admirals and many captains petitioned against this bill; but, after a spirited debate, their request to be heard by counsel against the noxious clauses was exploded. A clause which prohibited the disclosure of the opinions or proceedings of a court-martial by the members of it, gave great disgust, as it tended to encourage partiality and injustice; but the house refused to amend it. The clause, however, which related to half-pay officers, the ministry consented to relinquish. Some innovations in the mutiny-bill were debated with vehemence; and frequent divisions attended its progress. The exorbitant power of the commander in chief, who was allowed to select the members of a court-martial, and to revise and alter the sentence; the demand of an oath of secrecy from the persons composing the court; and the extension of military law to officers on half-pay; were condemned in strong terms. Pitt, in his ministerial character, controverted the objections which were made on this occasion.

The affairs of commerce and navigation too were diligently examined, that proper steps might be taken for the improvement of those departments: but the effect of this investigation did not appear before the next session. Several motions were made for the production of papers relative to the late peace; but the courtiers contrived to hinder their being produced. At length the parliament was prorogued on the 13th of June; and the king said, that the powers concerned in the late war had expressed themselves "in so clear and friendly a manner, as left no room to doubt of their sincere disposition to render the peace lasting in all parts:" and he intimated his joy on finding public credit in so flourishing a condition, at the end of an expensive "though necessary" war.

While the European powers were cultivating the arts of peace, the Algerines insulted the British nation by the seizure of a packet, which they plundered of money and other property, nearly to the amount of a hundred thousand pounds, before they dismissed her. Keppel was sent with a small squadron, to demand restitution of the spoils of the vessel; but no satisfaction was obtained, nor was any resentment testified for the refusal of it. The delay of the usual presents to the rapacious dey had induced him to pillage the British ship; and the English court, with mean condescension to a contemptible state, and from motives of sordid policy, renewed the tribute granted to the African pirates. An envoy from the dey arrived in England in the autumn, and pacified the king by presents and apologies. Some indignities were also offered to the king, in the messenger he had sent to treat for the redemption of British captives in the empire of Morocco, and who, refusing to comply with the barbarians's demand of pretended arrears, was subjected to degradation and ignominious restraint. A new treaty of amity was afterwards concluded between the king and the Moorish tyrant.

The spirit of opposition to the court of England, which had revived in the last session of parliament, was strengthened by the endeavours of the prince of Wales, who met with some success in the extension of his parliamentary influence. But his party did not embarrass or interrupt the measures of government. His scheme, however, respecting the duchy of Cornwall was still under the consideration of his friends.

On the 16th of November, the parliament again met, when the king, in his speech, extolled the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, and the pacific disposition of the several courts, and recommended a reduction of the national debt. The address met with considerable opposition in the lower house, because it congratulated the king on the "complete re-establishment of a general peace," and on the "good disposition" of the contracting parties for preserving it. The earl of Egmont condemned that criminal complaisance which did not scruple to assert known falsehoods; alledging, that the dispute between this kingdom and Spain was still undecided; that the queen of Hungary and the king of Sardinia were not sincerely disposed to the maintenance of a peace that had been forced upon them; and that the French were watching every opportunity of encroachment. Various other arguments were used against the address; but, after a vehement debate, it passed without alteration.

A considerable diminution of the annual supplies, which were now lowered to a sum scarcely exceeding four miltions one hundred thousand pounds, took place: but, out of the grants which composed it, one million was assigned to the payment of a loan of the preceding session. The chief debate which occurred in the course of these grants related to the army, which the court wished to retain without ulterior reduction. The annual bill for the regulation of the army underwent some alterations favourable to the wishes of those who aimed at the restraint of royal and military influence. It was ordained, that the oath of secrecy should not prevent a full disclosure from the members of a court-martial, when they should be required to give evidence in the courts of common law (k). It was also provided by the bill, that no sentence of a martial tribunal should be liable to be revised more than once.

The execution of that article of the treaty which related to Dunkirk had hitherto been delayed by the French; and the prince recommended to the earl of Egmont to make a motion for a perfect account of that harbour and town; but Pelham objected to the interference of the noble lord, and held out the prospect of a strict compliance with the treaty on the part of France (l).

Pelham adjusted the scheme for the reduction of the national debt with prudence and address. When the commons took this subject into consideration, he proposed, that the proprietors of the stocks, for which an interest of four per cent. was now paid, should continue to receive that proportion for another year, and should then have only three and a half for seven years; from which period the interest should be reduced to three per cent. As the (k) This qualification of an odious clause was not only supported by the earl of Egmont and his confederates, but even by the attorney and solicitor general; while it was opposed by Pelham and Pitt.

(l) The opposition of the minister to this motion exposed him to the censure of being the dupe of the French court; but he was defended by Pitt, and found no difficulty in baffling the proposal.

duties appropriated to the payment of the present interest, would, in consequence of the reduction, furnish a considerable surplus, he proposed, that the excess should be added to the sinking fund. The house, after some cavils from the prince's party, adopted the suggestions of the minister, and a bill was prepared on that basis. The Bank, East India, and South Sea corporations testified a great reluctance to the acceptance of terms which tended to such a manifest diminution of their income; and many persons who had scarcely a sufficient revenue from the funds for the support of life, and had no other dependence, complained of what they deemed a breach of faith in the government. The majority of the proprietors accepted the proposals of the minister, but the three companies remained for some time obstinate, though they at last acquiesced (m).

Several bills for the advancement of commerce passed the two houses in this session. One of these related to the cultivation of the fisheries on the British coast, by which the Dutch had long profited in consequence of the neglect of the natives. This bill established a society for the direction of that important concern; and granted privileges and bounties to the promoters of it. Three bills also were passed which promoted the importation of Persian, Chinese, and American raw silk; and another for the improvement of the trade to Africa.

A contested election for Westminster had attracted the notice of the public, from the extraordinary zeal of the two parties, and the confusion and disturbance with which it was accompanied. The candidates were lord Trentham and sir George Vandeput; the former of whom, having been appointed one of the commissioners of the admiralty, had offered himself for re-election, for which he obtained a majority of votes. The demand of a scrutiny having delayed the return, notice was taken in the house of commons, of the neglect of answering the writ; and the high bailiff being summoned to appear at the bar, received orders to expedite the business, with an assurance of the house against all who should obstruct him in the discharge of his duty. Though the scrutiny proved favourable to the ministerial candidate, by which it appeared that he had a majority of a hundred and seventy-six legal votes, his opponent, by protracting the decision, kept him out of the house for the whole session; which was closed on the 12th of April, 1750, with the usual acknowledgements from the throne.

Among the grants of this session, considerable sums had been assigned for the support and enlargement of the colony of Nova Scotia, to which fresh migrations were made this year. The colonists were exposed to the insults of the Indians, whom the provincials of Canada had instigated to harrass them; and the French inhabitants of Nova Scotia were inclined to co-operate with the savages. The British governor having sent an armed party towards Chignecto, the Indians and their associates retired beyond a line which they pretended to be the boundary of the Canadian territories, though it included the greater part of the British province. In another expedition, the confederates were defeated by major-general Lawrence; but petty hostilities continued; notwithstanding which the settlement began to flourish (n).

By the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, the French had engaged to evacuate the neutral islands; but so little attention had been paid to this engagement by the marquis de Caylus, the governor of the French Antilles, that the earl of Albemarle remonstrated, in the name of his sovereign, against the delay of execution. Renewed orders, at his desire, were immediately sent to the West Indies; but the Gallic encroachments were not altogether discontinued. The king having made another voyage to the continent, amused himself with a German negociation. He now wished to secure the reversion of the imperial crown to Joseph, the son of Maria Theresa. He offered subsidies to those princes who would engage to vote for the young archduke. Several of these petty sovereigns were inclined to accept his proposals; and the elector of Bavaria, for the annual sum of forty thousand pounds (of which, as usual, the subjects of Great Britain were to pay the greater part,) agreed to keep six thousand foot ready for the service of the maritime powers, and to vote for the succession of Joseph. The king of Prussia, however, opposed this scheme, and threatened the confederates with formidable obstructions.

Another negociation was carried on with the court of Spain, at the conclusion of which, on the 24th of September, 1750, it was agreed, that no greater duties should be paid by the British merchants, than they had been accustomed to pay under Charles II. of Spain; that they might procure salt without hindrance in the island of Tortuga; and that the Spanish king should pay one hundred thousand pounds to the South Sea company, on surrendering their claims to the assiento of negroes. The imperfection, however, of this new treaty with Spain occasioned discontent in England. The dispute respecting the Spanish claim of search, of which the English parliament insisted on the dereliction, as a necessary preliminary to peace, was not even mentioned in this treaty; and this omission gave great dissatisfaction to the merchants. When the new session commenced on the 17th of January, 1751, the earl of Egmont, sir John Hynde Cotton, and Dr. Lee, the civilian, reflected on the conduct of the ministers. As the proposed address of thanks for the opening speech congratulated the king on the conclusion of the treaty, the earl moved, that such an instance of unnecessary complaisance should be omitted, as inconsistent with the dignity of the house. Pitt opposed the motion, and in speaking of the negociations with Spain, affirmed, that we could not expect the claim of search to be relinquished, till we should have reduced that nation to the lowest state (o). The earl of Egmont's motion was rejected by a great majority.

The grant of a subsidy to the elector of Bavaria was vehemently opposed, as an absurd and unjustifiable profusion of the public money; but it was vindicated by Pitt as conducive to the interest of the nation, by weakening the influence of the French court in the empire, promoting the security of the house of Austria, and preserving the equipoise of European power; and the house sanctioned the measure.

A petition from many of the electors of Westminster, and another from the unsuccessful candidate, against the return of lord Trentham, as illegal, the commons instituted an inquiry into the affair. The high bailiff was subjected to an examination; and, having mentioned the delays and obstructions which had been studiously encouraged, he was desired to name the authors of those practices, and state the means which had been employed. After a long debate, arising from the objections of many of the members to these interrogations, he named three individuals. One of these (Crowle, a professor of the law,) suffered the stigma of a reprimand from the house, which he was obliged to receive kneeling. Another was committed to Newgate; and a third, (Murray, brother to lord Elibank,) being accused of having acted in a riotous and seditious manner, was ordered to be conducted to the same place of confinement (p). During the imprison-

(m) The national debt at the end of the war, which was concluded at the peace of Aix la Chapelle, amounted to seventy-one millions three hundred and forty thousand three hundred and ninety-seven pounds sixteen shillings and one farthing.

(n) The lords of trade and plantations published an advertisement, on the 7th of March, 1749, for the better peopling and settling of the province of Nova Scotia, promising to grant fifty acres of land (in fee simple, free from quit rents or taxes for ten years, at the expiration of which no person was to pay more than one shilling per annum for every fifty acres so granted) to every private soldier or seaman, and ten acres over and above to every such soldier or seaman having a family for every head in their families; eighty acres to every officer under the rank of an ensign in the land service, and lieutenant in the sea service, and fifteen acres for each person in their families; two hundred acres to each ensign, three hundred to every lieutenant, four hundred to every captain and six hundred to every officer above the rank of captain in the land service; four hundred to every lieutenant, and six hundred to every captain in the sea service, and thirty acres for every person in their families. All such persons to be subsisted on their passage, and for twelve months after their arrival. Pursuant to this notification, numbers of settlers went over, settlements were made, and Halifax, now the capital, was laid out. The same conditions that were offered to private soldiers and seamen, were offered also to artificers, necessary in building or husbandry; and those proposed to ensigns were to extend likewise to surgeons.

(o) He said, he did not forget, that he had formerly concurred in the address against the Spanish claim; but he was then (he observed) young and sanguine, and did not coolly reflect on every thing which he affirmed or recommended.

(p) To increase the mortification of this offender, it was resolved, after a spirited renewal of debate, that he should receive his sentence kneeling. To this indignity he refused to submit; and it was immediately voted by the inflamed house, that his refusal was "a high and most dangerous contempt of the authority and privilege" of the commons. He was now sent to Newgate, with an order for the preclusion of all access to him, and the prohibition of the use of pen, ink, and paper; and a committee was appointed to consider of the proper mode of chastising him for his contemptuous behaviour: but the result of this investigation was an assertion, that close imprisonment was the only punishment with which this species of contempt had ever been treated by the commons. He remained in strict confinement till the prorogation released him.

ment of Mr. Murray, the petitioners relinquished their opposition to the return of Trentham; and the commons made no enquiry into the merits of the election.

In consequence of the death of his royal highness Frederic prince of Wales, a bill was brought in for the purpose of settling a regency, which was productive of a violent debate. His royal highness having contracted an abscess in the lungs, was carried off on the 20th of March, 1751, in the forty-fifth year of his age (q). As the eldest son of the deceased prince was only in the thirteenth year of his age, the king had frequent consultations with his ministers on the adjustment of a regency, depending on the probable accession of his grandson to the throne, before he should be of proper age for the exercise of royal power. The debates on this subject were long and violent, but the ill consequences which might have arisen out of its operation were done away by the length of the king's life.

This session was distinguished by a bill for the reformation of the calendar. Although it may be unnecessary to inform our scientific readers, yet it may be proper to mention, for the satisfaction of the less learned part of the community, that, between the twelve months of the calendar established by Julius Cæsar, and the real solar year, there was an inequality of almost eleven minutes; and that hence arose a difference of one day in about a hundred and thirty-three years. For this variation an allowance was made, by ordaining, that eleven days should be omitted in the following year (between the 2nd and 14th days of September;) and it was also provided, that the year, instead of beginning at Lady-day, should commence on the first day of January. Thus the British style, after a long interval of inconvenient difference, coalesced with that which had prevailed on the continent from the time of pope Gregory the Thirteenth (r). The bill which proposed this computation met with some obstruction from prejudice and superstition; but, being promoted by the more enlightened members of the house, it passed into a law (s). The session was closed on the 25th of June, with a desire, that the members would not suffer the good laws which were enacted to lose their effect for want of due execution.

The divisions in the cabinet terminated in the triumph of the two ministerial brothers over the duke of Bedford and his friends. The earl of Sandwich, his chief adviser, was dismissed from the presidency of the admiralty, in which he had succeeded the duke; and his grace resigned the office of secretary of state, to which he had been appointed on the retreat of the earl of Chesterfield (t). Lord Trentham also relinquished his official situation; and the other adherents of the duke were removed. These were joined by some of the partizans of the deceased prince of Wales; but their views of opposition gave no alarm to the court party.

The king still pursued his favourite scheme of elevating the archduke Joseph; but it was opposed and counteracted by Frederic king of Prussia. The king of Poland, in his electoral capacity, acceded to the proposition; and became, by a new treaty, a subsidiary to Great Britain and the states general for the annual sum of forty-eight thousand pounds! but various difficulties yet remained to be overcome. At the next meeting of parliament, the 14th of November, 1751, the king informed the assembly of his engagements with the Saxon elector, and intimated, that the death of his son-in-law, the prince of Orange, (which had happened in the preceding month,) had made no alteration in the affairs of the Dutch republic, or in his union with that state; and recommended the adoption of some provisions for the suppression of robbery and violence. The addresses for this speech were voted without opposition.

The first business of the commons related to the bold North Briton who had defied the house. Lord Coke moved that Mr. Murray should be recommitted to prison; and, after a short debate, in which Pelham concurred with the mover, the house agreed to the proposition: but it appeared that the offender had quitted the kingdom (u). The supplies now granted did not amount to quite four millions. The subsidy consequent on the late convention with the elector of Saxony, was opposed by sir John Hynde Cotton and others of the same party; and renewed invectives were thrown out against the system of bribing the princes of the continent for purposes which had little connection with the interests of this island: but a powerful majority sanctioned the grant. In the upper house, the duke of Bedford moved for an address to the king, remonstrating against the contraction of subsidiary engagements in a time of general tranquillity; but this uncourtly proposition was resisted by the eloquence of earl Granville; and it was rejected by the house. On the following day, the lords Harley and Strange recommended, in vain, the same point to the commons.

Great opposition was likewise made to a bill which concerned some of the Scottish estates forfeited by the rebellion of their proprietors. The lands of the earl of Cromartie and others were proposed to be annexed inalienably to the crown, that the annual produce might be applied to the purposes of civilising the Highlanders, and promoting among them the progress of the protestant religion, of industry, order, and loyalty. By a former act, the estates of the rebels were ordered to be sold, if the crown should not satisfy all claims upon them; but, as it was apprehended, that they might be purchased in trust for the relatives of the forfeiting individuals, and that a spirit of disloyalty might thus subsist among the tenants and the inhabitants of the vicinity, the king resolved to retain possession of those districts in which disaffection had been most prevalent. Vehement debates took place, and in every division which attended the course of this bill, there was a great majority in favour of the court.

The frequency of rapine and violence about this period gave rise to two acts. As many of the places of public amusement in London and its vicinity were deemed schools of vice and profligacy, and nurseries of thieves and ruffians, one of these statutes provided for the suppression of such haunts, unless they should be licensed by the magistrates, and for the punishment of those individuals who should keep disorderly houses. The other, with a view to deter persons more effectually from the guilt of murder, ordained, that all who should be convicted of it should suffer death on the second day after condemnation, and that their bodies should be anatomised.

An East-India company having been erected at Embden by the king of Prussia, the jealousy of the English was roused, and an act was passed which prohibited all the subjects of his majesty from promoting, by loan or insurance, the success or security of foreign ships trading to India. The farther consideration of a different branch of commerce occasioned an act for divesting the African company of its charter, lands, forts, and stores, (with the allowance of a just compensation,) and establishing a new society, whose powers should be vested in a committee, merely authorised to regulate the trade, and provide, at the public expence, for the protection of the settlements, without excluding the generality of the people from a concern in the traffic (v).

His majesty being anxious for the prosecution of his Germanic schemes, dismissed the two houses on the 26th of March, 1752, and again made a voyage to the continent. He endeavoured to subdue the reluctance of Frederic to the purposed election of Joseph; but his application to the court of Berlin was ineffectual. The British king was (q) It is the general practice, when heirs to a crown die before they obtain possession of it, to praise them beyond their deserts: this practice was pursued with regard to Frederic; and he was represented by his panegyrists as a model of perfection. His character was indeed respectable and exemplary. He had a good capacity, a strong memory, and a clear judgement. His education had been carefully superintended, and he was diligent in his studies. He was humane, sincere, benevolent, friendly, and munificent; but some blame may be imputed to him for his eager encouragement of the opposition party to the measures of his father. He had a numerous family. Besides George, who succeeded to his pretensions, he had Edward, William, and Henry, dukes of York, Gloucester, and Cumberland; and Frederic, who died in his fifteenth year. Of his daughters, Augusta, Elizabeth, Louisa, and Carolina, the first was married to the duke of Brunswic; the second and third died unmarried; and the fourth, who was a posthumous child, was the unfortunate queen of Denmark.

(r) This style, however, was not perfectly accurate; for Gregory referred only to the period of the Nicene council, which met in the year 325, instead of carrying his retrospect to the commencement of the Julian supputation. Twelve days are to be omitted during the present century.

(s) The earl of Chesterfield informs us, that, though he presented this bill to the lords, it was prepared by the earl of Macclesfield, of whose astronomical and mathematical knowledge he speaks in high terms.

(t) Lord Anson succeeded the earl of Sandwich as president of the admiralty; and the earl of Holderness succeeded the duke of Bedford as secretary of state.

(u) A statement of Mr. Murray's case, written by Paul Whitehead, the poet, had been recently published; and, as it was marked by freedom of reflection, the house pronounced it "an impudent, malicious, scandalous, and seditious libel," and desired the king to prosecute the author, printer, and publisher: but the last individual, being brought to trial, was acquitted by the spirit of the jury.

(v) In the early part of this session (December 12, 1751,) died the viscount Bolingbroke.

at this time at variance with the king of Prussia on another point. Each claimed a right to East Friezeland; and George proposed, that the dispute should be decided by the aulic council of the empire; but Frederic, having possessed himself of the disputed territory, declined a reference to any tribunal. He had frequently complained of the conduct of the English, who had detained and plundered the vessels of many of his merchants during the late war, under pretence of their conveying contraband goods to the enemies of Great Britain. His demands of indemnification being rejected, he refused to pay the interest of the money due upon the loan of British subjects to the father of the queen of Hungary, regardless of the complaints of the English.

The negociations of George and his allies, for procuring the accession of the elector Palatine to the scheme of election, were now renewed; and this prince seemed inclined to concur in their views; but the exorbitancy of his pecuniary demands hindered the conclusion of a treaty. They did not, however, relinquish their favourite pursuit, till the obstacles which arose from the influence of the Prussian monarch, and the intrigues of the court of France, baffled their endeavours.

A confederacy for securing the peace of Italy was promoted by the king of England; and the treaty was signed at Aranjuez by the ministers of the courts of Vienna, Madrid, and Turin. This agreement was founded on the basis of the peace of Aix la Chapelle. Disputes, however, still subsisted between the British and Spanish courts, with regard to the navigation of the American seas. The Spaniards continued their imperious visitation of the ships which sailed near the coasts of their colonies; and in so doing occasional acts of rigour and outrage were committed. Keene remonstrated against these practices; and desired, that his catholic majesty would adopt some means for the removal of future grounds of difference: but to his frequent applications only unsatisfactory answers were given.

Although peace prevailed in Europe, yet the East India companies of France and England were engaged in hostilities, as auxiliaries to the contending princes of Hindostan. Mohammed Ali Khan having implored the aid of the English against an usurper of the principality of Arcot on the Carnatic, who was supported by Dupleix, governor of Pondicheri, the company granted him a small force, which contributed to put him in possession of his paternal territories; but he soon met with a reverse of fortune. He was enabled, however, in some measure to retrieve his affairs by the activity of Clive, one of the company's writers, who retook Arcot with facility in September, 1751, defended it about two months against a superior force, and gained a series of advantages. The courage and skill of major Lawrence were also exerted in behalf of Mohammed Ali Khan; but, although the usurper was seized and put to death, the war did not terminate with the present year.

There being no necessity for the early meeting of parliament, the king, soon after his return from the continent, ordered a prorogation to the following year. The two houses therefore met on the 11th of January, 1753, when the king told them in his speech, that the nature of his views and negociations were pacific. The addresses were voted with little debate, and the ministerial estimates were readily granted. The aggregate supplies scarcely reached two million one hundred thousand pounds: no fresh duties were requisite; and the land tax was reduced.

Dissensions of a peculiar nature had lately occurred at the court of the princess dowager of Wales, which had occasioned the resignation of the earl of Harcourt and the bishop of Norwich, who, on the death of Frederic, had been respectively appointed governor and preceptor of the young heir to the crown. Finding that the chief sway in that court was exercised by Tories and Jacobites, who instilled pernicious doctrines into the young prince's mind, the earl and his associate were unwilling to continue in stations of responsibility, unless Stone, the sub-governor, and other confidential advisers of the princess dowager, were dismissed from their employments at Leicester House. Stone, and his friend the solicitor-general, were openly accused of an attachment to the pretender; but a committee of the privy council declared the charge, after enquiry, to be unsupported. After a great deal of debate the affair died away; but the public were persuaded that the charge was well founded.

The jealousy of the people was aroused by a proposal for naturalizing such Jews as would settle in Britain. The bill originated in the house of peers; and it was promoted by the ministers, who concluded, that it would extend their influence, and facilitate future loans: but the major part of the community exclaimed against it as impolitic and injurious. A most vehement debate took place on this occasion; but notwithstanding the public clamours, the advocates of the Jews pursued their aim, and the bill passed into a law.

A bill for the regulation of the preparatives to the matrimonial union also met with strong opposition. It was calculated for the prevention of clandestine marriages, by which numerous families had suffered in their honour and their happiness. Many arguments were used both for and against the bill in its several stages; but the objections, in which many of the courtiers joined with those who usually differed from them, were not so efficacious as to prevent the compliance of either house with the views of the patrons of the bill, who were supported by the exertions of the lord chancellor and other ministerial speakers. This act has been frequently evaded, but it has not been unproductive of good effects.

Some other useful acts were likewise the fruits of this session. One ordained the establishment of a national Museum, open to public inspection; composed of the library of sir Hans Sloane and his multifarious collections, of the manuscripts of the Cotton family, and of those which Harley, the minister of queen Anne, had procured at an immense expence (w). Other bills provided for the following purposes: for the prevention of the practice of plundering wrecked ships; for guarding against the introduction of pestilence, by an enforcement of the performance of quarantine: for abolishing the exclusive trade of the Turkey company; and for allowing the general importation of wool into this country from Ireland. After these proceedings, the two houses were prorogued, on the 7th of June, with an intimation, that foreign affairs remained in the state which had prevailed for some time.

Several riots happened in various parts of England in the course of this year, (1753;) which were principally caused by the high price of bread. These tumults were not suppressed without the effusion of blood, consequent on the calling in of the military (x).

An act of illiberal vengeance disgraced the government at this time: Dr. Cameron whose concern in the rebellion had subjected him to an inclusion in the act of attainder, ventured to return to North Britain; but he was soon apprehended, received sentence, and suffered death at Tyburn, notwithstanding the reputation of his private merit, and the distance of time from the suppression of the revolt (y).

As the affair in which Elizabeth Canning was concerned,

(w) These collections were removed to Montague House, Great Russel Street, Bloomsbury; and they have since been considerably augmented, particularly in the article of books, both printed and manuscript.

(x) It may be necessary to mention, that the highest price of the peck loaf of wheaten bread was two shillings and three pence; that is, six pence three farthings the quartern loaf. In 1811, the highest price of the peck loaf was six shillings and one penny; and that of the quartern, one shilling and six pence farthing!

(y) On the morning of the 17th of May, 1753, Dr. Archibald Cameron was taken from the Tower (attended by several of the yeomen and a party of the guards) to the court of King's Bench, and there arraigned upon the act of attainder passed against him and others, for being in the late rebellion, and not surrendering in due time. Admitting himself to be the identical person, judgement was pronounced against him by the court; and his execution was fixed for that day three weeks. His sentence was to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, and his head to be disposed of according to his majesty's pleasure. The court first intended his execution to be in a fortnight after the passing of the sentence; but as the doctor begged to be permitted to see his wife, who, with seven children, (entirely dependent on him for support,) were then at Lisle; the court thought proper to postpone his execution a week longer. An account of the behaviour of Dr. Cameron at Tyburn, the place of execution, on the 7th of June, was published in the Universal Magazine for that month. When he arrived at Tyburn, he looked on the officers and spectators with an undaunted and composed countenance. As soon as he was loosed from the sledge he started up, and with an heroic deportment stepped up into the cart, by the help of one of his executioners; whence, looking round, with unconcern, on all the aweful apparatus of death, he smiled. Seeing the clergyman that attended him coming up the steps, he came forward to meet him, and endeavoured with his fettered hands, to help him up, saying, "So—are you come? This is a glorious day to me! It is my new birth-day; there are more witnesses at this birth than were at my first." The clergyman asked him how he did: he answered, "Thank God, I am very well, but a little fatigued with my journey; but, blessed be God, I am now come to the end of it." On hearing one of the gentlemen who presided at the execution ask the clergyman whether he would be long about his office, Dr. Cameron immediately took the hint, and said, He required but very little time, for it was but disagreeable being there, and he was as impatient to be gone as they were. As the clergyman was going down from the cart after having performed his office, he had liked to have missed the steps, which being observed by the doctor, he said with a chearful tone of voice, "Take care how you go; I think you don't know the way so well as I do."

long occupied the attention of the public, and divided the nation into parties, it may be proper not to pass it over in silence. This artful woman affirmed, that she had been seized and conveyed to a house at Enfield Wash; that she was robbed of part of her apparel by Mary Squire, an aged gypsy; and that, on her refusal of submitting to prostitution, she was confined in a dark room, where she was reduced to the greatest danger of perishing by hunger and thirst, having only four fragments of bread and a gallon of water for the space of four weeks; but that she at length found means to escape through a window. The gypsy, being tried for the imputed robbery, was pronounced guilty by a prejudiced jury, and she would probably have suffered death, had not sir Crisp Gascoign, chief magistrate of London, investigated the case, developed the imposture, and obtained, by his active interposition, a pardon for the injured old woman. The partizans of Canning endeavoured to prove, that the witnesses who had sworn to the presence of Squire in a different place from the scene of the robbery, had committed the crime of perjury; but they were acquitted on satisfactory evidence. Canning, being tried for the same offence, was found guilty, and sentenced to be transported to North America for seven years. Her friends calumniated her prosecutors, and vilified the jurors whose verdict had consigned her to exile: but the more impartial were convinced of her guilt, and pleased with her punishment.

A new session of parliament was opened on the 15th of November, 1753. So general were the clamours of the people against the act for naturalizing the Jews, that the court thought fit to repeal it, that the multitude might be appeased. Among the acts produced this session, was one which provided for the extension of the rigours of martial law to the military servants of the East India company. Besides the deliberations which related to bills, the commons investigated the delinquency of different officers; and having voted one individual guilty of a breach of trust, and of a violation of the lottery act, they desired the king to order the prosecution of this offender, who was convicted and fined. On the 6th of April, 1754, when the king dismissed the two houses, he declared, that he should never forget "the many eminent proofs" which they had given of loyalty, wisdom, and patriotism. He, soon after, commanded a dissolution, as this was the seventh year of the parliament.

For some time the commons of Ireland had been a variance with the court. The duke of Dorset, viceroy of Ireland, had intimated, in the year 1751, that his majesty had consented to the application of a part of the surplus of the revenue for the purpose of reducing the public debt. The commons having, by vote, appropriated a certain sum, omitted, in the preamble of the bill, the mention of the royal assent, which they considered as unnecessary. Pelham and his associates were highly offended at this omission, and they supplied the uncourtly defect, before they sent back the bill to Ireland. The unpleasing alteration was immediately observed by the commons; but it did not hinder them from passing the bill. In another session, which began in the autumn of 1753, it was stated, by the lord lieutenant, that the king would "graciously consent" to the similar appropriation of an additional sum. The commons now repeated their former behaviour; and the British court again supplied the omission; but the resentment of the house produced a rejection of the bill. It was indeed expected that the remainder of the debt would have been paid without delay, and the duties assigned for the interest had been suffered to expire: the creditors of the nation therefore, disappointed both of the principal and the interest, became loud in their clamours, while a general flame was kindled among the people. To allay this ferment, the king made some official changes in favour of the popular leaders, and sent orders for satisfying the creditors of the public.

The first commissioner of the treasury, Mr. Pelham (z), dying in the spring of this year, occasioned some ministerial alterations in Great Britain. Mr. Pelham was succeeded at the board of treasury by the duke of Newcastle; and the office of chancellor of the exchequer was filled by sir William Lee, chief justice of the court of King's Bench, till it was granted to Legge, by whom it was not disgraced. On this occasion the king was inclined to promote Mr. Fox to the station of premier; but the duke so strongly opposed the appointment, that his majesty did not persist in his intention. The post of secretary of state was then offered to Mr. Fox by his royal patron, connected with the management of the house of commons, or, in other words, with the task of seducing and corrupting a majority. The duke, however, would not suffer such an employment to be given to one who was likely to prove a dangerous rival; and sir Thomas Robinson, a more subservient statesman, was appointed secretary. Mr. Pitt had flattered himself with the prospect of succeeding the duke in this office; but it was thought that even he would not be sufficiently passive.

The nation, however, was, in the mean time, threatened with a new war. French commissaries had treated with those of this kingdom, concerning the adjustment of the boundaries between the American territories of each nation; but no agreement had taken place on the subject. The English commissioners thought the claims of the French too exhorbitant to be admitted; and the conferences exhibited the artful policy of that nation. The governor of Canada, while the negociations were pending, diligently employed himself in superintending the execution of a grand scheme for connecting that extensive province, by means of numerous forts, with the settlements on the Missisippi. This project alarmed the inhabitants of British America with apprehensions of the ruin of their trade among the Indian tribes, and of frequent and formidable attacks from the French and their savage confederates. It was therefore requisite, that exertions should be made for the purpose of counteracting the ambitious views of the French in that quarter.

During the time that the French were promoting their scheme of colonial aggrandizement, many subjects belonging to Great Britain were engaged in commerce with the Indians on the banks of the Ohio, in behalf of a company erected since the conclusion of the war. The French complained that these traders intruded within the limits of their territories, and therefore harassed them. The governor of Virginia asserted the rights of his sovereign to the districts near the Ohio; and remonstrated by the medium of major Washington, against the schemes of fortification and settlement which the French were pursuing. But all expostulations were fruitless; and it plainly appeared that the French had no intention of giving satisfaction. Orders were therefore sent from England, commanding the provincial governors to expel the French from their posts on the Ohio, and to repress their encroachments in other parts. Forces were immediately levied; but before they were ready for action, the enemy seized several posts, and committed various depredations and acts of cruelty. Washington having entrenched himself on the banks of that river, in expectation of a reinforcement, a small French party approached, and insisted on his retiring from territories which did not belong to his sovereign. A skirmish ensued, in which the French commandant was slain, or (as they affirmed) wantonly murdered. The major's post was soon after attacked by a superior force, against which he acted with such spirit, that he hindered the enemy from dislodging him by storm, and obtained honourable terms: but, in his retreat, he was harassed by the Indians, with the connivance of the French officer who had agreed to the capitulation. These incidents soon led to more decisive hostilities, each nation representing the other as the aggressor.

As to the affairs of India, the rival companies still interfered in the quarrels of the native princes. Mohammed Ali Khan continued to receive aid from the English; and, on the other hand, Dupleix, having lost the chieftain whom he had supported, offered his services to the son of the deceased; but, soon neglecting him, he pretended to dispose of the dignity of nabob of Arcot to an opulent governor, from whom he procured large sums by fallacious promises. By the association of the Maissowrians and Mahrattas, he strengthened the party which opposed Mohammed. Although this prince and his auxiliaries were considerably out-numbered, they baffled the exertions of their opponents. At length Dupleix affected a desire of peace; and a congress was holden; but the negociations proved abortive. Hostilities were renewed with various success, till the arrival of M. Godeheu, who had been appointed to supersede Dupleix. The new governor early intimated his inclination to put an end to the war. His overtures were accepted, and an armistice was concluded for three months. A treaty of peace was signed on the

(z) Mr. Pelham, says Dr. Coote, was possessed of a clear head and good heart; was respectable in his public capacity, and amiable in his private character. But his memory deserves some blame for his compliance with the Germanic system of the court, which in his heart he disapproved.

11th of October, 1754; by which, besides the regulation of limits, it was agreed, that the English and French companies should never interfere in any of the disputes of the native princes.

The peace of Aix la Chapelle was not destined for permanency. The French king wished only for a cessation of war, that he might recruit his marine, and render it formidable to the English, and aimed at the establishment of his colonial power on the ruin of that of Great Britain. He had been indefatigable in his exertions ever since that treaty had been signed; and hoped to prosecute his schemes with success, before the jealousy of the English should be roused: but herein he was disappointed; for he found them ready to take arms against him before he was fully prepared to oppose them.

The ministerial interest was triumphant in the election of persons to serve in the new parliament, which had assembled, for a particular purpose, soon after the elections were completed; and the commons had then re-chosen Mr. Onslow for their speaker. The two houses being met, on the 14th of November, the king, without expressly mentioning the conduct of the French, or the danger of a rupture with that nation, stated, that he had received assurances from the king of Spain, of a firm resolution of cultivating friendship and confidence with him; represented it as his chief aim to strengthen the foundations of the general peace, and to improve the present advantages of it, for the promotion of the trade of his people, and the protection of those possessions which formed one great source of their commerce and wealth; and desired supplies not only for the ordinary services, but for guarding against all encroachments. The motion for an address was productive of a debate in the house of commons; in which the opponents of the court urged the alternative of a speedy and explicit surrender, on the part of France, of every unsupported pretension, or a declaration of war from the court of England (a). In the earlier votes of supply, twelve thousand seamen were allowed, while the army remained without augmentation: but, on the 25th of March, 1755, when a royal message had been sent to the commons, intimating the necessity of taking active measures for the security of the just rights and possessions of the crown in North America, the house granted a million for the augmentation of the forces by sea and land. The amount of all the grants exceeded four millions.

As there was an intention of sending troops to America, it was thought proper to make an additional clause in the mutiny bill, by which it was ordained, that the military force, raised by the provincial governors, should be liable to martial law when acting in conjunction with British troops.

In this session the debates were few and uninteresting. On the 24th of April, earl Poulet surprized the lords with a motion for an address, requesting the king, "at a conjuncture so pregnant with distress, so denunciative of danger," to remain in England for the safety both of himself and his people. The earl of Chesterfield immediately moved for an adjournment; and, on a division, Poulet stood alone. The next day, when the king prorogued the parliament, he complimented the zeal and vigour of the two houses; and, while he asserted his sincere desire of preserving the public tranquillity, he declared, that he never could entertain a thought of purchasing the name of peace, at the expence of submitting to flagrant encroachment (b).

When news was brought to England of the great naval preparations of France, and of the expected departure of a strong armament to America, the king gave orders for the equipment of a squadron, the command of which was given to vice-admiral Boscawen, who was authorized to attack the French without ceremony.

The duke de Mirepoix, the French ambassador at London, endeavoured to convince the English ministry that his master was pacifically inclined. The proposals for adjusting the dispute which he made were not approved; and he, in turn, objected to those offered by the British minister. When he complained of the sailing of Boscawen, he was told, that the king had no other view than to defend his rights and possessions, and that he would carefully avoid being an aggressor.

The people were eager for the commencement of a new war, though they had not recovered from the distresses of the last; and, when the vice-admiral had sailed, they waited with impatience for the news of a victory over the Gallic fleet. They were soon gratified with information of important captures; but they were not satisfied.

When Boscawen arrived off Newfoundland, he waited the approach of the French fleet, which soon reached that coast in its passage to the river St. Lawrence. M. de la Mothe, the French admiral, was highly favoured by fogs; but two detached ships were discovered by captains Howe and Andrews, and an action was fought in June, 1755, which terminated in the surrender of the two French ships. The French complained of this attack upon their ships, as a gross violation of faith; and accused the English of entertaining the same schemes against them, which their adversaries affirmed they fondly cherished, and had begun to execute to the prejudice of the British colonies.

Orders were now issued generally for the seisure of French ships; and several squadrons were sent out for the purposes of interception. The business of shipbuilding was prosecuted with ardour; and vessels, purchased from individuals for the public service, were expeditiously equipped for war. So active were the cruisers that they met with great success. The French were quickly deprived of a considerable number of their mercantile ships; and, for some time they made no captures in return, but even sent back, with professions of amity, a frigate which had been stopped by one of their ships.

The continent of America was the chief seat of war in the present year. A body of provincials, commanded by lieutenant-colonel Monckton, advanced towards the isthmus which separated the British possessions in Nova Scotia from the extensive districts claimed by the French in that country. They were met, on the banks of the Messagnath, by a body of French and Indians, whom they drove from their works. Proceeding to the fort of Beausejour, erected by the French since the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, Monckton so intimidated the garrison by a bombardment, that the commandant capitulated before the besiegers had mounted one piece of cannon on their batteries. The day following another fort was reduced. Captain Rous sailed to the river St. John, near the mouth of which the French had lately built a fortress; the occupants of which, so soon as he approached, demolished it as far as they could, and retired with precipitation. The French colonists were either compelled to quit the province, or were disarmed and reduced to subjection.

An expedition to the banks of the Ohio was less successful, under the conduct of major-general Braddock. He sailed from Cork with two regiments, and arrived on the coast of Virginia early in the year. He was delayed by the negligence of the provincial contractors; but at length commenced his march. In letters which he sent to England, he complained of the divisions which agitated the provinces, of the general want of zeal for his majesty's service, and of the inadequate aid which he could obtain. Having brought his troops to a rendezvous at Fort Cumberland, he found himself at the head of about two thousand men, including the provincial levies. Hearing that at Fort du Quesne the French expected the speedy arrival of five hundred men, he hastened to reduce that fort before the arrival of the reinforcement. He therefore left his baggage under the care of eight hundred men, commanded by colonel Dunbar; and marched with the rest of his force though an unfavourable country, which he neglected to reconnoitre. He soon felt the effect of his folly; for, in his progress through the woods, he was attacked, on the 9th of July, 1755, both in front and flank, by an enemy which he could not discern. The fire from the French

(a) Of the controverted elections, one is entitled to particular notice, from the warm debates which it occasioned in the house of commons. After an extraordinary profusion of expence, and a series of tumult, supported and encouraged by four candidates, the sheriff of the county of Oxford had returned the whole number. Two had a majority on the poll; but many of their votes were disallowed by their competitors; and, as the scrutiny which the latter had demanded had been closed by the sheriff, that it might not continue beyond the time fixed for the return of the writ, he affected to think it most proper to name four persons in that instrument, from a doubt of the real number of legal votes. Various questions arose in the house, before the merits of the election was decided. The chief point of discussion related to the right of copyholders to vote for knights of the shire; but the influence of the ministry prevented that question from being determined by the house. At length, the same interest annulled the return of lord Wenman and sir James Dashwood, the popular candidates; and gratified lord Parker and sir Edward Turner (whom the poll had not favoured) with a declaration of their legitimate election.

(b) Among the statutes which were passed this session, we find one for the relief of insolvent debtors; another (introduced by Pitt) for the pecuniary accommodation of the out-pensioners of Chelsea Hospital; and two for the encouragement of the fisheries.

and their Indian auxiliaries, having killed many of his regular soldiers, filled the rest with such a panic, that they fled in confusion; while the colonists, to whom, in his letters, he had imputed want of courage as well as of skill, proved themselves fully entitled to the praise of the former quality, by maintaining their ground when they were deserted by the regulars. The major-general was long a mark for the enemy, who killed five horses under him, and shot him through the right arm and the lungs: he was carried off by some of his officers, and died of his wounds within four days. By the exertions of the provincials, the retreat was not attended by a pursuit. The loss was said to have consisted of two hundred men, exclusive of the wounded; but it was probably much greater (c). The artillery and stores, and the cabinet of the commander in chief, were left as spoils to the victorious party. The fugitives, followed by the slowly retiring colonists, did not recover from their consternation till they met colonel Dunbar, with whom they returned to the cultivated parts of the provincial territories.

An army of provincials and Indians being levied, major general Johnson marched from Albany to the borders of Lake George, after a long delay of preparation. While waiting for bateaux, to transport his men across the lake, he was informed, that a body of the enemy approached an encampment where a part of his forces lay entrenched. For the defence of this post he sent a thousand men, besides Indians, under the command of colonel Williams. The French were commanded by the baron de Dieskau, who, hearing that the post of the major general himself was weak, resolved to attack that station in preference to the other camp. He met with Williams, and an engagement commenced on the 8th of September, in which the French overpowered their adversaries. Johnson detached a party to cover the retreat of his men; and made dispositions for defending his post. A central attack was made by the regular troops of the baron; but the fire was inefficacious. The French, whose commander, the baron de Dieskau, was mortally wounded, lost about seven hundred men in the action with Williams, and the attack of the camp; and of the English about two hundred were slain, chiefly in the former of these contests, in which the colonel himself fell. Major general Johnson was also wounded, but not dangerously; and the enterprize against Crown Point was postponed till a more convenient season.

A plan was also laid for the reduction of the fort of Niagara, the execution of which was attempted by Shirley, governor of the colony of Massachuset. Having, after many delays, in which vast numbers of his troops deserted, advanced to Oswego, he would have proceeded to Niagara, had not the necessity of waiting for a supply of provisions given time for the commencement of unfavourable weather. It was therefore resolved, in a council of officers, that the scheme could not be carried into effect, and the execution of it was deferred.

The following winter was unfortunate to the more remote inhabitants of several of the American provinces, particularly Virginia and Pennsylvania; for the Indians, instigated by the French, made frequent incursions, and committed horrible barbarities on the persons of the colonists, and furious ravages on their lands. These outrages it was thought might have been prevented by the governors; but they were suspected of not paying a proper attention to their duty.

The king, being at Hanover in the summer, endeavoured to improve by negociations of alliance, the efficacy of his arms. He concluded a treaty with the landgrave of Hesse Cassel, containing stipulations of mutual defence, and an engagement, on the part of the latter prince, to keep in readiness a body of eight thousand subsidiaries (or twelve thousand if necessary) for the service of the former. His majesty also made overtures to the empress of Russia; with whom an agreement was signed on the 30th of September (d).

The French king, being equally desirous of advantageous alliances, courted the assistance of Spain, and urged the formation of a family compact, or of such an union as might render the interests of both inseparable. Ferdinand, however, considered the proposal as incompatible with his pacific system. He was encouraged in his reluctance by the advice of his minister, whose influence was seconded by the suggestions of the British ambassador: The views of France being thus frustrated at Madrid, he applied to the principal German powers.

The king of Prussia was become respectable by his policy and military power, therefore the contending courts of France and England were equally desirous of courting his friendship. The king of England was apprehensive that Louis would harrass his electoral dominions by the medium of a Prussian army, and was therefore anxious to make an ally of Frederic. The French king trusted to a former treaty with the court of Berlin, and demanded assistance against George; but the Prussian declared, that a colonial rupture was an exception to the league. He therefore did not long hesitate between the proposals of Great Britain and France; and resolved to accede to the overtures of George. Louis, enraged at his refusal of aid, fomented the enmity which Maria Theresa had long borne against Frederic, and which had prompted that princess to court an alliance with the house of Bourbon, and to seek the humiliation of the house of Brandenburgh. She refused to comply with the demands of the court of London for a body of auxiliaries; alledging, that her interference in a contest which related to North America was not required by treaty.

Great Britain had been subsidising various powers for the purposes of war; but now a more honourable opportunity was afforded for the exercise of her liberality by a calamity which befel the inhabitants of Lisbon. On the 1st of November, an earthquake affected the foundations of that large and flourishing city with extraordinary violence; and the volcanic materials which attended the progress of the disaster, reinforced by the numerous fires in private houses, and by the illuminations of the churches and monasteries, (for it was the festival of All-Saints,) occasioned a conflagration of long continuance (e). By these united misfortunes the greater part of the city was involved in destruction; and about ten thousand individuals, on a moderate calculation, perished on the occasion; while most of the survivors were reduced to the extremity of distress. The king of Portugal and his family narrowly escaped personal danger; but the palaces of the capital being destroyed, and the castle of Belem greatly damaged, tents were, for some time, the habitations of the court. When the king of England received intelligence of this melancholy accident, he sent a message to the lords and commons, in which he expressed a desire, that they would concur with him in sending "such speedy and effectual relief as might be suitable to so afflicting and pressing an exigency." Eager to succour the unfortunate, they unanimously voted a hundred thousand pounds for the accommodation of the Portuguese sufferers. Relief was therefore sent with the utmost expedition; and the objects of this generosity acknowledged the favour with emotions of joy and gratitude; and they hailed, as benefactors, those whom, as heretics, they viewed with a malignant eye.

The French had made several attempts for an accommodation of the disputes which respected the American colonies; but they would not agree to such terms as the British ministry deemed reasonable. Appealing to the king's regard for his Hanoverian territories, they menaced him with an invasion of those favourite provinces, if he should persist in the rejection of their offers for the adjustment of Trans-Atlantic pretensions. But he confided in his ability of defending the electorate; and reprobated all proposals which tended to extort from him a sacrifice of British rights. In his speech to the parliament, on the (c) The chief officers who fell in the action, was sir Peter Halket, who was slain before the disgraceful flight of his regiment commenced.

(d) This convention provided, that thirty-five thousand men should be kept on the borders of Livonia, and forty or fifty galleys stationed on the coast of that province, for the defence of the king of England and his allies against any attack; that his German dominions should be included in that stipulation, if they should be invaded on account of interests or disputes which should regard his kingdoms; that he should pay an annual subsidy of one hundred thousand pounds, till the time of the departure of the troops from the Russian dominions, consequent on his requisition; that one half of a million should, from that period till the expiration of four years, be annually paid to him to the empress; that, when her troops should make a diversion in pursuance of her present engagements, she should, in consideration of the proximity of the territories in which such diversions would probably be made, and of the opportunity which the army would have of subsisting immediately in the districts of an enemy, subject herself to the charge of maintaining the body thus employed; and that, if she should be disturbed in the execution of such measures, or should be attacked in her own dominions, the royal elector should furnish her with succours.

(e) The fire, according to some accounts, continued above a fortnight; and shocks were felt, with intermission, till the second week in December. Less violent concussions, accompanied with extraordinary inundations, were observed in Spain and other countries of Europe; and also in the North-western parts of Africa.

13th of November, he observed, that his readiness for the acceptance of "reasonable and honourable" terms had not been gratified by the French monarch, by whom no conditions which merited those epithets had hitherto been proposed. He also stated, that he had confined his views and operations to the following objects; the prevention of France "from making new encroachments, or supporting those which had already been made," the exertion of the right of the nation to a satisfaction for hostilities committed in a time of profound peace;" and the frustration of "such designs as, there was reason to think, had been formed against his kingdoms and dominions." In both houses, disputes arose with regard to the terms in which his majesty should be addressed for his speech (f).

When the parliament was prorogued, the duke of Newcastle, apprehensive that the renewal of foreign connections would contribute to the decline of his influence, and that an united administration would be particularly necessary at the commencement of a war, had endeavoured to soften the opposition of Pitt to subsidiary treaties, and to bring him into a cordial concert with the court. But the paymaster, sensible of his consequence, and willing to enter the cabinet on his own terms, declined an assent to the overtures of the premier; and, when he was courted by the secretary at war to form a coalition with him, for the expulsion of the duke from his station, he would not agree to the proposal, as he was jealous of the favour which Fox enjoyed at court. The duke's disappointment in his application to Pitt induced him to wave his objections to the promotion of Fox, and comply with the wishes of the king and his son. On the resignation therefore of sir Thomas Robinson, who, sealing his incompetency of properly discharging his ministerial duty, accepted an inferior post and a pension, Fox was appointed secretary of state, and consequently manager of the house of commons. Legge and Pitt were now dismissed from their stations for their opposition to the court; and the former was succeeded by Lyttleton, while the other vacancy was conjunctly supplied by the earl of Darlington and lord Dupplin. George Grenville, the brother-in-law of Pitt, was deprived of the post of treasurer of the navy, which was restored to Dodington; and the duke of Marlborough was obliged to surrender the privy seal to earl Gower. The new secretary at war was lord Barrington, whose seat at the board of admiralty was filled by lord Bateman (g).

By the intrigues of Fox and his associates the treaties with Russia and Hesse Cassel obtained the sanction of parliament. Strong objections were made to them by Pitt and other members; and the arguments against continental connections and Hanoverian politics were repeated in the ears of inattentive courtiers. The lords, however, in the proportion of above seven to one, approved the two conventions; and the commons confirmed them by a majority of one hundred and ninety-two votes.

The grants of the public money in this session were large. Fifty thousand seamen and marines were allowed; and upwards of thirty-four thousand soldiers were at first voted; to which number additions were afterwards made. The grants exceeded seven millions two hundred thousand pounds in the aggregate.

In consequence of the maritime equipments of France, and the rendezvous of troops near the coasts of that kingdom, the English were greatly alarmed with the dread of an invasion, and the king applied to the states-general for the aid which they were bound to furnish in case of emergency. The French court laboured to hinder their compliances with this demand, and even menaced them with vengeance, if they should assist a prince who had been the aggressor in the war. This denunciation occasioned such a delay on their part, that George, expecting a refusal, desisted from his requisition, and sent for a body of Hessians. He intimated to the parliament his strong apprehensions of an invasion either of Great Britain or Ireland; and hoped, that he might be supported in the adoption of effectual measures for the defence of the nation. Addresses of loyal promise were voted without opposition; but when the new secretary of state moved, that the commons should solicit the speedy transportation of a body of Hanoverians to this endangered kingdom, those who deemed the employment of foreign mercenaries unnecessary for the safety of the country, endeavoured to supersede the motion by the order of the day; an attempt which the house quickly baffled. The peers entering into an address for the electoral troops, orders were dispatched for expediting their arrival; and they, as well as the Hessians, soon made good their landing.

The dread and terrors of the English were ridiculed by their enemies; and such a want of confidence in the resources of interior defence, excited the surprize and derision of Europe. But, since the militia had been neglected, and the standing army considered as the only security of the nation, the martial spirit of the multitude had greatly declined; and the idea of an invasion produced general consternation. The alarm, however, which arose at this time, appears to have been ill-founded; for the French, by their motions on the northern coasts of their kingdom, seem to have had no other idea than that of concealing their schemes for attacking the English in the Mediterranean.

When the apprehensions of the public began to subside, they became distrustful of the foreign troops; and the expediency of a well-regulated militia for the defence of the nation being generally acknowledged, a bill was prepared for that purpose. The commons gave it their sanction; but the peers, a debate, in which it was represented as inadequate to its object by earl Granville and others, refused to agree to it.

The speaker of the house of commons, when he presented some money bills for the royal assent, made use of free and spirited language. He dwelt on the hope of the representatives of the people, that the military and naval strength, so amply provided for, would be properly exerted: he reprobated, in strong terms, the system of continental alliance as pernicious to the kingdom; deprecated all increase of the oppressive burthens of the people, by pecuniary grants to foreign princes, in whose honour or gratitude little confidence could be reposed; spoke of the introduction of foreign troops into the country, as a ground of just suspicion and alarm; and urged the necessity of dispelling the fears, and alleviating the distresses, of the nation. The king, however, entirely satisfied in his continental connections, turned a deaf ear to the remonstrances of the speaker. Having signed the bills which were ready, his majesty, on the 27th of May, 1756, thanked the two houses for their vigorous support; informed them of a descent of the French on the island of Minorca, and of his having declared war in consequence of that invasion; and expressed his reliance on the divine protection in a just cause. His denunciation of war was quickly followed by a correspondent declaration from the king of France.

The first object, which attracted the notice of France, was the isle of Minorca. This excited alarm in the minds of the English, and a squadron of ten sail of the line and some frigates were sent to the Mediterranean, under the command of admiral Byng, son of the naval hero, lord Torrington. On his arrival at Gibraltar, Byng was made acquainted with the force and proceedings of the French armament; which consisted of twelve ships of the line and five frigates, that had sailed from Toulon, under the command of M. de la Galissonniere, and about fourteen thousand troops under the conduct of the duke de Richelieu, which had sailed for Minorca, and had undertaken the siege of the castle of St. Philip.

Having received reinforcements at Gibraltar and off Majorca, the admiral made his appearance near the invaded island. He had already sent a desponding letter to the board of admiralty, complaining of the foul state of his ships, and the insufficiency of requisites for his expedition, and stating the improbability of succeeding in the (f) When a proposal was made in the upper house, that the address, besides implying an approbation of the late treaties, should contain a promise of providing for the protection of Hanover, if it should be attacked in resentment of the measures which the sovereign had taken "for the support of the essential interests of Great Britain," earl Temple opposed the motion; affirming, that, as the treaties had not been examined by the house, all approbation of their contents would be premature and indiscreet; and that the defence of the electorate would involve this kingdom in great danger and expence, and would weaken, without a prospect of the least advantage, the efforts required against a powerful enemy. Other peers spoke to the same effect; but the officers of the court overpowered their exertions. On the making of a similar proposal in the lower house, Legge and Pitt, uninfluenced by the employments which they held, refused to sanction such measures as they deemed inconsistent with the interest of their country, and condemned the foreign system of the court, which, they said, would never have been adopted, if Hanover had not belonged to the king of Great Britain. A great majority, however, agreed to a clause which favoured the continental schemes of his majesty.

(g) These were the principal changes which contributed to the formation of what the public termed the duke's ministry, from the influence which the duke of Cumberland had in framing it.

relief of the principal fortress of Minorca, for want of a competent land force. This early despair of success enfeebled his exertions, and contributed to the unfortunate issue of his enterprize.

The two hostile fleets of France and England had an action on the 20th of May. Rear-admiral West commenced an eager attack, and drove five of the enemy's ships out of the line. Admiral Byng, recollecting the disgrace of admiral Matthews, for having neglected the preservation of the line of battle, did not bear down upon the enemy, so as to co-operate with the other division; though, by adhering to the examples of Anson and Hawke, who had disregarded the strict observance of the line, he would probably have given the enemy a total defeat. After a long delay, he fired when he was at too great a distance; and, during this idle parade, he ordered some of his ships to shorten sail, that two others might get a-head of him. By these and other unnecessary and injudicious measures, he lost the good effect which might have resulted from vigorous operations, and gave the French admiral an opportunity of retiring. In this partial conflict, about fifty men lost their lives on the part of the English; and three of their ships were greatly damaged. A council of war being called, Byng declared his opinion that, as his fleet was considerably inferior to that of Galissonniere, in number of men and weight of metal, and had received more injury than that of the latter, it would be hazardous to renew the engagement; that all attempts for the relief of the besieged castle would be fruitless; and that, as Gibraltar might be in danger, it would be advisable to hasten thither. The officers acquiesced in the proposal of the discouraged admiral; and the defence of Minorca was left to the unassisted efforts of the British occupants.

Lieutenant-general Blakeney was the officer who had the command as governor of Minorca, by whose efforts, notwithstanding his great age, the operations of defence were conducted with spirit and activity; but he was circumscribed in his endeavours by the inadequate number of his troops. The chief fortress required a garrison much more numerous than that which sustained the attacks of the besiegers, who, when they had battered and bombarded the place above seven weeks, gained possession of some of the outworks by storm, on the 27th of June, and threatened a more general assault. Apprehensive of the dreadful consequences attendant on such an attack, the majority of a council of war signified a desire of capitulation. The body of the castle remained entire, and a small number of the defenders had lost their lives, so that the place might have been maintained till succours could have been sent; but the remarks of those who delivered such an opinion in the council, were condemned as ill-founded. The terms which Richelieu granted were honourable. He allowed the garrison to march out in military parade, and to be transported to Gibraltar in safety. The whole island quickly surrendered after the fortress. Galissonniere then returned to Toulon, before the approach of sir Edward Hawke, who had been sent to supersede Byng, and who, having added some ships to the squadron which that officer had commanded, sailed towards the harbour of Mahon, whence he soon bore away on finding the island in possession of the French. Having blocked up the French admiral in Toulon, and invested the French trade in the Mediterranean, Hawke returned to England.

The English were by no means consoled for the loss of Minorca by the warlike transactions of this year in North America. The earl of Loudoun, who was appointed to the chief command of the army on that continent, and indulged with extraordinary powers, did not commence his voyage from England before the time in which he ought to have opened the campaign; and when he had reached the scene of action, so great a portion of time was lost in deliberative proceedings and preparatory measures, that no attempts were made by a general from whom vigorous operations were expected. Extensive schemes were formed to the prejudice of the French; but they were postponed on various pretences. The marquis de Montcalm, commander of the French forces, was more active than the earl of Loudoun. After some exploits of inferior moment, he invested Oswego, which, though occupied by about fifteen hundred men, was not a very strong post. Colonel Bradstreet had lately met with some success in the vicinity of this station; but his successes did not hinder the enemy from commencing the siege of that place. The fall of Mercer, the commandant, discouraged the garrison; and the works not being tenable against the batteries and strength of the enemy, the officers unanimously resolved upon a surrender. The marquis de Montcalm, who was preparing for a general assault, which, he was confident, would put him in possession of that post, insisted on the captivity of the whole garrison; but he engaged to treat the prisoners with humanity, and to secure to them the enjoyment of their property; promises to which he did not strictly adhere (h). The marquis demolished the forts, and retired towards Montreal; and no other acts of hostility were committed, which deserve to be recorded, in North America during the remainder of the year.

In adverting to our affairs of the East Indies, we find, that, after the convention between the French and English companies, rear-admiral Watson, who had been sent with a squadron into the Eastern seas before the signature of the pacific agreement, resolved to employ his forces for the overturning of a piratical state, which had long been established on the coast of Malabar. Commodore James had undertaken an expedition against Angria, the sovereign of this predatory state, with an army belonging to the company, and a Mahratta fleet; and had dispossessed the pirate of some of his forts. Watson now sailed with the king's ships to Geriah, the chief fortress belonging to Angria; and James and the Mahrattas assisted in the attack of that place. Angria's vessels were soon destroyed; and colonel Clive, landing with a body of forces, promoted the reduction of that capital. The Mahrattas endeavoured to obtain sole possession of the place in a clandestine way, because they expected to find an immense deal of treasure, but their design was frustrated by the vigilance of colonel Clive. On the surrender of the fort, a garrison of the company's troops was put into it (i).

But the most important events which arose in the East Indies during the present year, were in a war between the English company and the soubah-dar of Bengal, (Surajeddoula (k).) This prince, pretending that the English were greatly indebted to him, and that the governor of Calcutta had afforded protection to some of his malcontent subjects, made preparations for gratifying his avarice and his resentment, by the conquest of the company's settlements near the Ganges. He marched with a numerous army to Cossimbazar, which he soon reduced. He then advanced to Calcutta; and having captured the town, invested the fort.

In the mean time, the governor of Calcutta, dreading the cruelty of the invading foe, retired with his treasures to a vessel in the river; and many of his countrymen escaped by the same means. Those who remained in the fort, submitted to the directions of Holwell, who made as good a defence as the insufficiency of the garrison, the weakness of the fortifications, and the scarcity of ammunition, would allow. Despairing of success, his companions sought an opportunity of effecting their escape; but they were disappointed in that hope. Holwell having signified a desire of treating, the besiegers seemed willing to agree to a conference; but, before any terms were adjusted, the enemy forced a passage, and compelled the English and their fellow warriors to surrender at discretion on the 19th of June.

The Mohammedan prince complained to Holwell of the resistance which had been made, and of the small amount of the treasure found in the fort. But gave assurances, that his resentment should not fall on that gentleman or his captive associates: yet, in the evening of that day, either by his particular order, or by the malice and revenge of the military despots to whose custody the prisoners were committed, one hundred and forty-six individuals, including Holwell, were confined in a small room, called The Black Hole. The evening was extremely warm; and the apartment, or rather dungeon, was a cube of about eighteen feet, open to the air only on one side, where, through the iron bars of two windows, the circulation of that fluid was scarcely perceptible. In this state, the dread of suffocation presented itself to the numerous occupants

(h) The spoils of the reduced forts were considerable; for they consisted of more than one hundred pieces of cannon, and a great quantity of stores of various kinds: some armed vessels, and about two hundred bateaux were also the reward of the victors.

(i) Artillery, to the amount of two hundred pieces, and an ample supply of ammunition, besides as much money and other property as exceeded the value of one hundred and twenty thousand pounds, were found in the place.

(k) He is generally denominated soubah by the English writers; but that word signifies a province, and is therefore incorrectly used for soubah-dar, or the governor of a province.

of a contracted space, in which a third part of the company could not breathe with convenience. The first efforts of the wretched prisoners were directed to the door; but, as it opened inward, their attempts were ineffectual. Holwell, foreseeing that death would make great havoc among them, if no relief should be quickly granted, addressed a serjeant of the Indian guard through one of the windows, and offered him a thousand rupees, for the favour of such a separation as should leave only a moiety of the number in the room. The serjeant promised to use his endeavours; but soon after returned, and declared that such an indulgence could not be obtained. "The soubahdar (said the slave) is sleeping; and no one can presume to interrupt his rest." The despair which this answer produced may be easily conceived. The heat of the room had by this time occasioned an extraordinary perspiration, which was attended by a raging thirst; and these circumstances, added to the fatigue with which the captives were harassed before they entered the dungeon, nearly exhausted them. They tried various means of temporary accommodation; but these were productive of very little mitigation of their distress. To avoid a gradual dissolution, they insulted the soldiers, that they might be provoked to fire upon them through the windows. Such as were not near these openings, became, after a short time, frantic and outrageous. Their impatient cries for drink having prevailed on the guard to bring some water, the contests which ensued for a supply increased the horrors of the scene; and many were pressed to death in the struggles. Others quietly expired from exhaustion; nor did the rest expect long to survive. Holwell had continued for some hours near one of the windows; and his companions treated him with deference and attention: but their alarming situation at length extinguished all respect of persons; and they pressed so closely upon him, with a view of sharing the advantages of his post, that he was deprived of the power of motion. The pressure being removed at his earnest request, that he might retire and die in quiet, he reclined on some of the bodies, calmly recommended himself to Heaven, and, after several changes of situation, lost all sense of the surrounding horrors. The soubah-dar, being informed of the death of most of the prisoners, enquired whether the chief survived; and, hearing that there were some remains of life in him, which the fresh air might re-establish, he ordered the door of the prison to be opened. The confinement, which had continued nearly ten hours, proved fatal to one hundred and twenty-three persons; whose fate did not excite the least regret in the heart of the tyrant. Having summoned Holwell into his presence, he insisted on a discovery of the treasure which he supposed to have been secreted; and, as the answers he received did not gratify his rapacious wishes, he ordered him to be detained a prisoner; but restored him to liberty soon afterwards.

The fate of Calcutta being made known at Madras, the governor of that presidency took immediate steps to retrieve the company's affairs in Bengal. Troops were assembled, and placed under the command of colonel Clive. Watson, now vice-admiral of the blue, engaged in the same service; and these commanders prepared with alacrity for the recovery of the captured settlements.

In Europe the flames of war began to extend their fury. The king of Prussia, early in the year, had concluded a treaty with his Britannic majesty, for the preservation of the tranquillity of Germany, which, it was apprehended, the French would endeavour to disturb. The agreement between these two powers accelerated the formation of a confederacy between the king of France and the queen of Hungary; and though the Austrian princess precluded herself, by one of the articles of the league entered into between them, from joining the French against their British enemies, yet was she eager to introduce her new allies into Germany, that she might not only profit by their aid against Frederic, but might give them an opportunity of subduing the electorate of Hanover. She made preparations for war, and solicited the co-operation of the empress of Russia, who, having long been on friendly terms with Maria Theresa, and on the contrary footing with the king of Prussia, did not reject the overtures of the former, reinforced as they were by the persuasions of the French. The king of Prussia suspecting, on strong grounds, that the two princesses had formed schemes for the ruin of the house of Brandenburg, resolved to act with vigour by anticipating the attacks which he expected. Shortly after, a Prussian army entered Saxony; and the elector, whose intimacy with the court of Vienna was known, was required to give unequivocal indications of neutrality. On his refusal, he was blocked up in his camp at Pirna; while his capital was seized, and his revenue sequestered by the invaders. A considerable part of the Prussian army having made an irruption into Bohemia, count Brown prepared for resistance; and, when Frederic had assumed the command of that detachment, a battle was fought near Lowositz, in which little advantage was gained by either party. The Saxons retiring from Pirna in the night, were pursued by the Prussians, and compelled to surrender themselves prisoners of war, to the number of twelve thousand men. The unfortunate elector escaped to his Polish kingdom, while the king of Prussia reigned triumphant in Saxony. The conduct of Frederic towards Augustus was loudly censured; but he vindicated himself by assuring the public, that this prince was concerned in the secret confederacy against him; and, from papers which he found in the cabinet of Dresden, (forcibly plundered by him, notwithstanding all the efforts of the electress against such unmanly outrage,) he exposed to the world the testimonies of the inimical league.

In the channel and other seas, occasional conflicts occurred, between the English and the French, in which the number of ships captured by the former bore some excess over the prizes which had been taken by the latter (l). This advantage, however, was no compensation to the public for the misfortunes which had been suffered, partly from the neglect of the ministry, and partly from individual misconduct.

The discontent, however, arising from ill success chiefly vented itself on admiral Byng. The character and conduct of that officer were assailed with the most severe reproach; and a strict enquiry was peremptorily demanded, that the proof of his guilt might be followed by adequate punishment. The partizans of the court, conscious of the blame due to the chief members of the cabinet, insidiously fomented the rising odium against the admiral, that their leaders might escape censure. Inflammatory appeals were made to the public; and the clamour arose to an extraordinary height. At length the odious admiral was ordered to be put in irons; and being sent from Gibraltar to England under an arrest, his speedy trial was demanded; but the enquiry did not commence till nearly the expiration of the year. Lieutenant-general Fowke, deputy governor of Gibraltar, was previously tried for having sent too small a part of his garrison to attempt the relief of Minorca, in repugnance to the orders transmitted from court. The court martial being equally divided in opinion, the president declared against him; and he was sentenced to a year's suspension. Admiral Byng being at length brought to trial, his associate West gave some evidence in his favour, and some which tended to his prejudice. General Blakeney, who, for his valorous conduct in defence of Minorca, had been enrolled among the peers of Ireland, deposed to the practicability of the introduction of troops into the castle of St. Philip, which Byng had forborne to attempt; and captain Everet affirmed, that the admiral might have borne an active share in the engagement, in which case, he thought, a compleat victory would have accrued to the English. After the examination of other witnesses, the prisoner was heard in his defence. He referred to the ill condition of his ships, and to the want of their compliment of men; asserted the advantages which the French admiral had over him in these and other respects; declared, that he had endeavoured, consistently with a prudent regard to circumstances and to naval discipline, (l) Of these incidental engagements, that which occurred between a privateer, named The Terrible, commanded by captain William Death, and La Vengeance, a vessel of far superior force, was the most remarkable. The English ship had captured a trader from St. Domingo, after a violent conflict; but this prize was re-taken, and became an assistant to the Vengeance in the combat with the Terrible. With such fury did the two parties engage, that the French commander and nearly two-thirds of his crew (consisting in the whole of about three hundred and fifty men,) and the English captain and all his men, except twenty-six out of about one hundred and fifty, are said to have been killed. The issue of this dreadful conflict, was the capture of the Terrible by her shattered opponent. There was a strange combination of names belonging to this privateer; the Terrible, equipped at Execution Dock, commanded by captain Death, whose lieutenant was called Devil, and who had one Ghost for surgeon. This adventure was no sooner known in England, than a liberal subscription was raised for the support of Death's widow, and that part of the crew which survived the engagement.

to perform all the duties of his station; and hoped, that no errors in judgement would expose him to rigour of punishment. The court adopted a series of resolutions; two of which imported, that the admiral "did not do his utmost" either to relieve St. Philip's castle, or to "take, sieze, and destroy," the ships of the enemy. In the final resolution, which condemned him to death, he was earnestly recommended to mercy, as, from the testimony of those who were near him during the action, he did not exhibit any marks of fear or confusion, but "seemed to give his orders coolly and distinctly, and did not seem wanting in personal courage;" to which observations the court added, that his misconduct did not appear to arise either "from cowardice or disaffection." Some doubts being entertained with respect to the legality of the sentence, particularly whether the crime of negligence, not being expressed in any one of the resolutions, could be supplied by implication, the lords of the admiralty desired the king to refer this point to the determination of the twelve judges, who, having considered the sentence with relation to the twelfth article of war, pronounced it legal.

It was generally believed, and that opinion still prevails, that the king would have complied with the recommendation of the court-martial, by an extension of his mercy to the condemned admiral, had not some of his ministers represented to him, in strong terms, the expediency of consulting the honour of the navy, and allaying the indignation of the people, by the capital punishment of one who had neglected his duty. This resolution being at last embraced, the commissioners of the admiralty signed a warrant, ordering, that admiral Byng should be shot to death in the harbour of Portsmouth. Vice-admiral Forbes, one of those who sat at this board, to his honour, refused to sign the warrant; alledging, that, as the twelfth article of war subjected to the loss of life those who had not acted in an engagement with the requisite vigour, whether such behaviour should arise from negligence, pusillanimity, or disaffection, the express acquittal of Byng from the last two charges, and the omission of the other ground of condemnation, rendered the sentence inapplicable and illegal. It was soon after intimated to the commons, that several members of the court which had tried Byng wished to be released from their oath of secrecy, with a view of disclosing the grounds of the sentence pronounced against the admiral, which, on enquiry, might perhaps be found unjustifiable. A bill was introduced for the desired release from these oaths; but when the commons had agreed to it, the peers, having examined the members of the court martial, were not induced to give it their sanction.

Although admiral Byng had flattered himself with the hope of acquittal, he received his sentence without betraying the least alarm or discomposure; and the same coolness remained with him till the latest moment of his life. On the day assigned for his fate, March 14, 1757, he made his appearance on the quarter deck of the Monarque; and, a party of marines being ready for the execution of the sentence, he knelt on a cushion with his face covered, and was instantaneously deprived of life by a well-directed volley (m),

The operations at sea during the course of the year 1757, either in Europe or America, were far from being decisive or important. The commerce of Great Britain sustained considerable damage from the activity and success of French privateers, of which a great number had been equipped in the islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe. The Greenwich ship of war, mounted with fifty guns, and a frigate of twenty, fell into the hands of the enemy, together with a very considerable number of trading vessels. On the other hand, the English cruizers and privateers acquitted themselves with equal vigilance and valour. The Duc d'Aquitaine, a large ship of fifty guns, was taken in June by two British ships of war, after a severe engagement, and about the same time the Aquelon, of nearly the same force, was driven on shore and destroyed near Brest, by the Antelope, one of the British cruizers. A French frigate of twenty-six guns, called the Emeraude, was taken in the Channel, after a warm engagement, by an English ship of inferior force, under the command of captain Gilchrist, a gallant and alert officer, who, in the sequel, signalized himself on divers occasions, by very extraordinary acts of valour. All the sea-officers seemed to be animated with a noble emulation to distinguish themselves in the service of their country, and the spirit descended even to the captains of privateers, who instead of imitating the former commanders of that class, in avoiding ships of force, and centering their whole attention in advantageous prizes, now encountered the armed ships of the enemy, and fought with the most obstinate valour in the pursuit of national glory.

In sea rencounters that happened within the present year, the superiority in skill and resolution was ascertained to the British mariners; for ever when they fought against great odds, their courage was generally crowned with success. In November, captain Lockhart, a young gentleman, who had already rendered himself a terror to the enemy as commander of a small frigate, now added considerably to his reputation, by reducing the Melampe, a French privateer of Bayonne, greatly superior to his own ship in number of men and weight of metal. This exploit was seconded by another of the same nature, in his conquest of another French adventurer called the Countess of Gramont; and a third large privateer of Bayonne was taken by captain Saumarez, commander of the Antelope. In a word, the narrow seas were so well guarded, that in a little time scarcely a French ship could appear in the English Channel, but which the British traders navigated without molestation.

During the severity of the winter in the beginning of 1758, the British cruizers kept the sea, in order to protect the commerce of the kingdom, and annoy that of the enemy. They exerted themselves with such activity, and their vigilance was attended with such success, that a great number of prizes were taken, and the trade of France almost totally extinguished. A very gallant exploit was atchieved by one captain Bray, commander of the Adventure, a small armed vessel in the government's service, falling in with the Machault, a large privateer of Dunkirk, near Dungenness; he ran her aboard, fastened her bowsprit to his capstan, and, after a warm engagement, compelled her commander to submit. A French frigate of thirty-six guns was taken by captain Parker, in a new fireship of inferior force. Divers privateers of the enemy were sunk, burned or taken, and a great number of merchant ships fell into the hands of the English. Nor was the success of the British ships of war confined to the English Channel. At this period the board of admiralty received information from admiral Cotes, in Jamaica, of an action which happened off the island of Hispaniola, in the month of October of the preceding year, between three English ships of war and a French squadron. Captain Forrest, an officer of distinguished merit in the service, had, in the ship Augusta, sailed from Port Royal in Jamaica, accompanied by the Dreadnought and Edinburgh, under the command of the captains Suckling and Langdon. He was ordered to cruize off Cape François, and this service he literally performed in the face of the French squadron under Kersin, lately arrived at that place from the coast of Africa. This commander, piqued at seeing himself thus insulted by an inferior armament, resolved to come forth and give them battle; and that he might either take them, or at least drive them out of the seas, so as to afford a free passage to a great number of merchant ships then lying at the cape, bound for Europe, he took every precaution which he thought necessary to insure success. He reinforced his squadron with some store-ships, mounted with guns, and armed for the occasion, and supplied the deficiency in his complements, by taking on board seamen from the merchant-ships, and soldiers from the garrison. Thus prepared, he weighed anchor, and stood out to sea, having under his command four large ships of the line, and three stout frigates. They were no sooner perceived advancing, than captain Forrest held a short council with his two captains. "Gentlemen, (said he) you know our strength, and see that of the enemy; shall we give them battle?" They replying in the affirmative, he added, "Then fight them we will; there is no time to be lost; return to your ships, and get them ready for engaging." After this laconic consultation among these three gallant officers, they bore down upon the French squadron without further hesitation, and the action began with great impetuosity. The enemy exerted themselves with uncommon spirit, conscious that their honour was peculiarly at stake, and that they fought in sight, as it were, of their own coast, which was lined with people, expecting to see them return in triumph. But, notwithstanding all their endeavours, their commodore, after having sustained a severe engagement, that lasted two hours and a half, found his ship in such a shattered condition, that he made signal for one of his frigates to come and tow him out of the line. His example was followed by the rest of his squadron, which, by this assistance, with the favour of the land breeze and the approach of night, made shift to accomplish their escape from the three British ships, which were too much disabled in their masts and rigging to prosecute their victory (n). The courage of captain Forrest was not more conspicuous in his engagement with the French squadron near Cape François, than his conduct and sagacity in a subsequent adventure near Port-au-Prince, a French harbour, situated at the bottom of a bay on the western part of Hispaniola, behind the small island of Gonave. After M. de Kersin had taken his departure from Cape François for Europe, admiral Cotes, beating up to windward from Port Royal in Jamaica with three ships of the line, received intelligence that there was a French fleet at Port-au-Prince, ready to sail on their return to Europe: captain Forrest then presented the admiral with a plan for an attack on this place, and urged it earnestly. This, however, was declined, and captain Forrest directed to cruize off Gonave for two days only, the admiral enjoining him to return at the expiration of the time, and rejoin the squadron at Cape Nicholas: accordingly, captain Forrest, in the Augusta, proceeded up the bay, between the island Gonave and Hispaniola, with a view to execute a plan which he had himself projected. Next day in the afternoon, though he perceived two sloops, he forbore chasing, that he might not risk a discovery; for the same purpose he hoisted Dutch colours, and disguised his ship with tarpaulins. At five in the afternoon he discovered seven sail of ships steering to the westward, and hauled from them, to avoid suspicion; but at the approach of night gave chase with all the sail he could carry, one of which fired a gun, and the other made the best of her way for Leoganne, another harbour in the bay. At this period captain Forrest reckoned eight sail to leeward, near another port called Petit Gonave; coming up with the ship which had fired the gun, she submitted without opposition, after he had hailed, and told her captain what he was, produced two of his largest cannon, and threatened to sink her if she should give the least alarm. He forthwith shifted the prisoners from this prize, and placed on board of her five-and-thirty of his own crew, with orders to stand for Petit Gonave, and intercept any of the fleet that might attempt to reach that harbour. He then made sail after the rest, and in the dawn of the morning, finding himself in the middle of their fleet, he began to fire at them all in their turns, as he could bring his guns to bear: they returned the fire for some time; at length the Marguerite, the Solide, and the Theodore struck their colours. These being secured, were afterwards used in taking the Maurice, Le Grand, and La Flore; the Brilliant also submitted, and the Mars made sail, in hopes of escaping, but the Augusta coming up with her about noon, she likewise fell into the hands of the victor. Thus, by a well-conducted stratagem, a whole fleet of nine sail were taken by a single ship, in the neighbourhood of four or five harbours, in any one of which they would have found immediate shelter and security. The prizes, which happened to be richly laden, were safely conveyed to Jamaica, and there sold at public action, for the benefit of the captors.

(m) The opinions of the public have long been divided with regard to the equity of his doom. By many it has been condemned as unreasonably severe; and, by others, it has been pronounced just and necessary. That the admiral did not behave with due spirit, is certainly manifest. He attended to punctilio, when vigour ought to have been exerted; and, by despairing of success, because the enemy had some superiority in weight of metal and number of men, he proved himself deficient in that determined intrepidity which his situation required, though he possessed a sufficient degree of courage for the occasions of ordinary service. Perhaps, however, it would have been an adequate sacrifice to the demands of justice, if he had been dismissed from the navy with ignominy and contempt.

The ministry having determined to make vigorous efforts against the enemy in North America, admiral Boscawen was vested with the command of the fleet destined for that service, and sailed from St. Helen's on the 19th of February, 1758, when the Invincible, of seventy-four guns, ran a-ground and was lost; but her men, stores, and artillery were saved. In the course of the succeeding month, sir Edward Hawke sailed to the Bay of Biscay with another squadron, with a view to intercept any supplies from France designed for Cape Breton or Canada. The same month advice was received at the admiralty of another advantage by sea, which had been gained by admiral Osborne, while he cruized between Cape de Gatt and Carthagena, on the coast of Spain. On the 28th of March he fell in with a French squadron, commanded by the marquis du Quesne, consisting of four ships, namely, the Foudroyant, of eighty guns, the Orphée, of sixty-four, the Oriflamme, of fifty, and the Pleiade frigate, of twenty-four, in their passage from Toulon to reinforce M. de la Clue, who had for some time been blocked up by admiral Osborne in the harbour of Carthagena. The enemy no sooner perceived the English squadron than they dispersed, and steered different courses: then Mr. Osborne detached divers ships in pursuit of each, while he himself, with the body of his fleet, stood off from the bay of Carthagena, to watch the motions of the French squadron which lay there at anchor. About seven in the evening, the Orphée, having on board five hundred men, struck to captain Storr, in the Revenge, who lost the calf of one leg in the engagement. The Monmouth, of sixty-four guns, commanded by captain Gardener, engaged the Foudroyant, one of the largest ships in the French navy, carrying eighty guns, and eight hundred men, under the direction of the marquis du Quesne. The action was maintained with great fury on both sides, and the gallant captain Gardener lost his life; nevertheless the fight was continued with unabating vigour by his lieutenant, Mr. Caskett, and the Foudroyant disabled in such a manner, that her commander struck, as soon as the other English ships, the Swiftsure and the Hampton Court appeared. This mortifying step, however, he did not take until he saw his ship lie a wreck upon the water, and the decks covered with carnage. The Oriflamme was driven on shore under the castle of Aiglos, by the ships Montague and Monarque. The Pleiade frigate escaped. In the beginning of April, sir Edward Hawke entered the Basque Road, on the coast of Poicton, discovered a French fleet at anchor, consisting of five ships of the line, with six frigates, and forty transports, having on board three thousand troops, and a large quantity of stores and provisions, intended as a supply for their settlement in North America. They no sooner saw the English admiral advancing, than they began to slip their cables, and fly in the utmost confusion. Some of them escaped by sea, but a greater number ran into shoal water, where they could not be pursued; and next morning they appeared a-ground, lying on their broadsides; so that the end of their equipment was totally defeated. Another convoy of merchant ships, under the protection of three frigates, had been chased by sir Edward Hawke, a few days before, into the harbour of St. Martin in the Isle of Rhé, were they still remained, waiting an opportunity for hazarding a second departure: a third, consisting of twelve sail, bound from Bourdeaux to Quebec, under convoy of a frigate and an armed vessel, was encountered at sea by one British ship of the line and two fire-ships, which took the frigate and armed vessel, and two of the convoy afterwards met with the same fate.

On the 29th of May the Raisonable, a French ship of sixty-four guns, in her passage from Port l'Orient to Brest, was attacked by captain Dennis, in the Dorset, of seventy guns, and taken after an obstinate engagement, in which one hundred and sixty of the Raisonable's complement were killed or wounded. On the 13th of April, a dreadful fire broke out in the fore part of the Prince George, of eighty guns, commanded by rear-admiral Broderick, and raged with such fury, that notwithstanding all the efforts of the officers and men for several hours, the flames increased, and the ship being consumed to the water's edge, the remnant sunk about six o'clock in the evening. About three hundred men were preserved by the boats belonging to some ships that accompanied the admiral in his voyage, but five hundred perished in the ocean.

This year the king was determined to make another attempt upon the coast of France, and two powerful squadrons by sea were destined for the service of this expedition; the first, consisting of eleven great ships, was commanded by lord Anson and sir Edward Hawke; the other, composed of four ships of the line, seven frigates, six sloops, two fire-ships, two bombs, ten cutters, twenty tenders, ten store-ships, and one hundred transports, was put under the direction of commodore Howe, a body of troops, (n) One of the French squadron was rendered altogether unserviceable for action: their loss in men amounted to three hundred killed, and as many wounded; whereas that of the English did not much exceed one-third of this number. Nevertheless, they were so much damaged, that, being unable to keep the sea, they returned to Jamaica, and the French commodore seized the opportunity of sailing with a great convoy for Europe.

consisting of sixteen regiments, nine troops of light horse, and six thousand marines, was assembled for the execution of this design, and embarked under the command of the duke of Marlborough, grandson of the great general of that name. The troops having been encamped for some time upon the Isle of Wight, were embarked in the latter end of May, and the two fleets sailed in the beginning of June for the coast of Bretagne. The fleets parted at sea; lord Anson, with his squadron, proceeded to the Bay of Biscay, in order to watch the motions of the enemy's ships and harrass their navigation; while commodore Howe, with the land-forces, steered directly towards St. Maloes, a strong place of considerable commerce, situated on the coast of Bretagne. The town, however, was found too well fortified, both by art and nature, to admit of an attempt by sea with any prospect of success; and, therefore, it was resolved to make a descent in the neighbourhood. After the fleet had been delayed several days by contrary winds, in sight of the French coast, it arrived in Cancalle Bay, about two leagues to the eastward of St. Maloes, and Mr. Howe having silenced a small battery which the enemy had occasionally raised upon the beach, the troops were landed on the 6th of June. The duke of Marlborough immediately began his march towards St. Servan, with a view to destroy such shipping and magazines as might be in any accessible parts of the river; and this scheme was executed with success. A great quantity of naval stores, two ships of war, several privateers, and about fourscore vessels of different sorts, were set on fire and reduced to ashes, almost under the cannon of the place, which they could not pretend to besiege in form. His grace having received repeated advices that the enemy were assembling forces to march against him, returned to Canada, where the re-embarkation of the troops was performed with ease and expedition. The forces, while on shore, were restrained from outrages by the most severe discipline; and the French houses, which their inhabitants had abandoned, were left untouched. Nevertheless some houses were pillaged, and not without acts of barbarity: but the offenders were brought to immediate justice. The British forces being re-embarked, including about five hundred light horse, which had been disciplined and carried over with a view to scour the country, the fleet was detained by contrary winds in the bay of Cancalle for several days, after which it stood out to sea, where it was exposed to some rough weather. After threatening a disembarkation at several places on the coast of France, they steered for the Isle of Wight, and next day anchored at St. Helen's.

The designs upon the coast of France, though interrupted by tempestuous weather, were not as yet laid aside for the whole season; but a considerable body of troops were re-embarked, and every thing being prepared for the second expedition, the fleet sailed from St. Helen's on the 1sth of August, and after a tedious passage, from calms and contrary winds, anchored on the 7th in the bay of Cherburg. By this time the enemy had entrenched themselves within a line, extending from fort Encœurdeville, which stands about two miles to the westward of Cherburg, along the coast for the space of four miles, fortified with several batteries at proper distances. Behind their entrenchment a body of horse and infantry appeared in red and blue uniforms; but as they did not advance to the open beach, the less risk was run in landing the British forces. The grenadiers and guards were rowed regularly ashore in the flat-bottomed boats, and, landing without opposition, instantly formed, on a small open portion of the beach. Next morning, the general having received intelligence that no parties of the enemy were seen moving on the hill, or in the plain, and that fort Querqueville was entirely abandoned, made a disposition for marching in two columns to Cherburg. An advanced party took immediate possession of Querqueville; and the lines and batteries along the shore were now deserted by the enemy. The British forces, marching behind St. Aulne, Encœurdeville, Hommet, and La Galet, found the town of Cherburg likewise abandoned, and the gate being open, entered it without opposition (o). On the day following the general ordered the place to be reconnoitred, and he determined to destroy, without delay, all the forts and the bason. The execution of this design was left to the engineers, assisted by the officers of the fleet and artillery (p). The enemy had raised several unconnected batteries along the bay; but the town itself was quite open and defenceless. The harbour and bason of Cherburg being destroyed, together with all the forts in the neighbourhood, and about twenty pieces of brass cannon secured on board the English ships, a contribution, amounting to about three thousand pounds sterling, was levied upon the town, and a plan for the re-embarkation of the troops concerted; as it appeared from the reports of peasants and deserters, that the enemy were already encreased to a formidable body. A slight entrenchment being raised, sufficient to defend the last division that should be re-embarked, the stores and artillery were shipped, and the light horses conveyed on board their respective transports, by means of platforms laid in the flat-bottomed vessels, on the 16th of August. They then returned to England, and after a few days again put to sea, and steering to the coast of France, came to anchor in the bay of St. Lunaire, two leagues west of St. Maloes, against which it was determined to make another attempt. An attack upon St. Maloes being found impracticable, and the general being unwilling to re-embark, without having taken some step for the further annoyance of the enemy, resolved to penetrate into the country, conducting his motions, however, so as to be near the fleet, which had, by this time, quitted the bay of St. Lunaire, where it could not ride with safety, and anchored in the bay of St. Cas, about three leagues to the westward. On the 8th of September, general Bligh, with his little army, began his march for Guildo, at the distance of nine miles, which he reached in the evening: next day he crossed a little gut or inlet of the sea, at low water, and his troops being incommoded by the peasants, who fired at them from hedges and houses, he sent a priest with a message, intimating, that if they would not desist, he would reduce their houses to ashes. No regard being paid to this intimation, the houses were actually set on fire as soon as the troops had formed their camp about two miles on the other side of the inlet. Next morning he proceeded to the village of Matignon, where, after some smart skirmishing, the French piquets appeared, drawn up in order, to the number of two battalions; but having sustained a few shot from the English field-pieces, and seeing the grenadiers advance, they dispersed. General Bligh continuing his route through the village, encamped in the open ground, about three miles from the bay of St. Cas, which was this day reconnoitred for re-embarkation: for he now received undoubted intelligence, that the duke d'Aiguillon had advanced from Brest to Lambale, within six miles of the English camp, at the head of twelve regular battalions, six squadrons, two regiments of militia, eight mortars, and ten pieces of cannon. The enemy came down upon the English as they were re-embarking, and, opening the battery of ten pieces of cannon and eight mortars, did great execution upon them. They afterwards began to march down the hill, partly covered by a hollow way on the left, with a design to gain a wood, where they might form and extend themselves along the front of the English, and advance against them under shelter of the sand-hills; but in their descent they suffered extremely from the cannon and mortars of the shipping, which made great havoc, and threw them into confusion. Though the greater part of the British troops were already embarked, the rear-guard, consisting of all the grenadiers, and half of the first regiment of guards, remained on shore, to the number of fifteen hundred, under the command of major-general Dury. This officer, seeing the French advance, ordered his troops to form a grand division, and march from behind the bank that covered them, that they might charge the enemy before they could be formed on the plain: but by this time the French had extended themselves into a very formidable front, and no hope remained of being able to withstand such a superior

(o) The citizens, encouraged by a manifesto containing a promise of protection, which had been published and distributed, in order to quiet their apprehensions, received their new guests with a good grace, overwhelming them with civilities, for which they met with a very ungrateful return, for as the bulk of the army was not regularly encamped and superintended, the soldiers were at liberty to indulge themselves in riot and licentiousness. During the night they ravaged the adjacent country without restraint, and as no guards had been regularly placed in the streets and avenues of Cherburg to prevent disorders, the town itself was not exempted from pillage and brutality. These outrages, however, were no sooner known, than the general took immediate steps for putting a stop to them, and preventing future irregularities.

(p) Great sums of money had been expended upon the harbour and bason of Cherburg; which at one time was considered by the French court as an object of great importance, from its situation respecting the river Seine, as well as the opposite coast of England; but as the works were left unfinished, in all appearance the plan had grown into disrepute.

force. The English line being drawn up on uneven ground, began the action with an irregular fire from right to left, which the enemy returned; but their usual fortitude and resolution seemed to forsake them on this occasion. They saw themselves in danger of being surrounded, and cut in pieces; their officers dropped on every side; and all hope of retreat was now intercepted. In this dilemma their spirits failed; they were seized with a panic; they faultered, they broke, and in less than five minutes after the engagement began they fled in the utmost confusion, pursued by the enemy, who no sooner saw them give way than they fell in among them with their bayonets fixed, and made a great carnage. General Dury being dangerously wounded, ran into the sea, where he perished; and this was the fate of great numbers, officers as well as privates. Many swam towards the boats and vessels, which were ordered to give them all possible assistance; but by far the greater number were either butchered on the beach, or drowned in the water: a small body, however, instead of throwing themselves into the sea, retired to the rock on the left, where they made a stand until they had exhausted their ammunition, and then surrendered at discretion. The havoc was moreover increased by the shot and shells discharged from the battery, which the enemy had raised on the hill. The slaughter would not have been so great, had not the French soldiers been exasperated by the fire from the frigates, which was still maintained, even after the English troops were routed: but this was no sooner silenced by a signal from the commodore, than the enemy exhibited a noble example of moderation and humanity, in granting immediate quarter and protection to the vanquished. About one thousand chosen men of the English army were killed and taken prisoners on this occasion: nor was the advantage cheaply purchased by the French troops, among whom the shot and shells from the frigates and ketches had done great execution. Commodore Howe returned with the fleet to Spithead, and the troops were disembarked.

Nothing further was attempted by that armament after the misfortune of St. Cas; nor was any enterprize of importance atchieved by the British navy in Europe during the course of this summer. The cruisers, however, still continued active and alert. Captain Harvey, in the ship Monmouth, destroyed a French ship of forty guns in the island of Malta; an exploit of which the Maltese loudly complained, as a violation of their neutrality. About twenty sail of small French vessels were driven ashore on the rocks of Bretagne, by some cruisers belonging to the fleet commanded by lord Anson, after a smart engagement with two frigates, under whose convoy they sailed. In November the Belliqueux, a French ship of war, mounted with sixty-four guns, having, by mistake, run up St. George's Channel, and anchored in Lundy-road, captain Saumarez, of the Antelope, then lying in King-road, immediately weighed and went in quest of her, according to the advice he had received. When he appeared in sight, the French captain heaved up his anchor, and made a show of preparing for an engagement; but soon hauled down his colours, and, without firing a shot, surrendered with a complement of four hundred and seventeen men, to a ship of inferior force, both in number of hands and weight of metal. By this time the English privateers swarmed to such a degree in the Channel, that scarcely a French vessel durst quit the harbour, and consequently there was little or no booty to be obtained.

The whole of the very lucrative and important gum trade, from Cape Blanco to the river Gambia, an extent of five hundred miles, had been engrossed by the French, who built Fort Louis, within the mouth of the Senegal, extending their factories nearly three hundred leagues up that river, and on the same coast they had fortified the island of Goree, in which they maintained a considerable garrison. The gum-senega, of which a great quantity is used by the manufacturers of England, being wholly in the hands of the enemy, the English dealers were obliged to buy it at second-hand from the Dutch, who purchased it of the French, and exacted an exorbitant price for that commodity. This consideration forwarded the plan for annexing the country to the possession of Great Britain. The conquest of Senegal was the plan of Mr. Cumming, a quaker. A small squadron was equipped under the command of captain Marsh, having on board a body of marines commanded by major Mason, with a detachment of artillery, ten pieces of cannon, eight mortars, and a considerable quantity of warlike stores and ammunition. Captain Walker was appointed engineer; and Mr. Cumming was concerned as a principal director and promoter of the expedition (q). This little armament sailed in the beginning of March, 1758; and on the 23rd of April captain Marsh discovered the French flag flying upon Fort Louis, situated in the midst of a considerable town, which exhibited a very agreeable appearance. The commodore came to anchor in Senegal-road at the mouth of Senegal river, and perceived several armed sloops which the enemy had detached to defend the passage of the bar. All the boats were employed in conveying the stores into the small craft, while three of the sloops continued exchanging fire over a narrow tongue of land with the vessels of the enemy, consisting of one brig and six armed sloops, mounted with great guns and swivels. At length, the channel being discovered, and the wind, which generally blows down the river, changing, captain Millar, of the London buss passed the bar, dropped anchor on the inside, and lay till night, exposed to the whole fire of the enemy. Next day he was joined by the other small vessels, and a regular engagement ensued. This was warmly maintained on both sides, until the busses and one dogger running a-ground, immediately bulged, and were filled with water. The troops they contained took to their boats, and with some difficulty reached the shore, and were soon joined by their companions from the other vessels; so that now the whole amounted to three hundred and ninety marines, besides the detachment of artillery. The natives, instead of opposing them, came in great numbers and submitted; and on the succeeding day they were reinforced by three hundred and fifty seamen. They had made no further progress in their operations, when two French deputies arrived at the entrenchment, with proposals for a capitulation from the governor of Fort Louis. After some hesitation, captain Marsh and major Mason agreed, "That all the white people belonging to the French company at Senegal should be safely conducted to France in an English vessel, without being deprived of their private effects, provided all the merchandize and uncoined treasure should be delivered up to the victors: and that all the forts, store-houses, vessels, arms, provisions, and every article belonging to the company in that river, should be put into the hands of the English immediately after the capitulation should be signed. They promised that the free natives living at Fort Louis should remain in quiet possession of their effects, and in the free exercise of their religion; and that all negroes, mulattoes, and others, who could prove themselves free, should have it in their option either to remain in the place, or remove to any other part of the country. The captains Campbell and Walker, were immediately sent up the river with a flag of truce, to see the articles signed and executed; but they were so retarded by the rapidity of the stream, that they did not approach the fort till three in the morning. As soon as the day broke they hoisted their flag, and rowed up towards a battery on a point of the island, where they lay upon their oars very near an hour, beating the chamade; but no notice was taken of their approach. This reserve appearing mysterious, they retired down the river to their entrenchments, where they understood that the negroes on the island were in arms, and had blocked up the French in Fort Louis, resolving to defend the place to the last extremity, unless they should be included in the capitulation. This intelligence was communicated in a second letter from the governor, who likewise informed the English commander, that unless the French director-general should be permitted to remain with the natives, as a surety for that article of the capitulation in which they were concerned, they would allow themselves to be cut in pieces rather than submit. This request being granted, the English forces began their march to Fort Louis, accompanied by a number of long boats, in which the artillery and stores had been embarked. The French seeing them advance, immediately struck their flag; and major Mason took possession of the castle, where he found ninety-two pieces of cannon, with treasure and merchandize to a considerable value. Fort Louis being secured with an English garrison, they proceeded to make an attempt upon the island of Goree, which lies at the distance of thirty leagues from Senegal, but not having a sufficient force, they were obliged to relinquish the enterprize.

As the conquest of Senegal was considered incomplete, while the French remained in possession of Goree, the British ministry resolved to annex that place to their African acquisitions. Accordingly commodore Keppel was sent with a squadron of four ships of the line, several frigates, two bomb ketches, and some transports, having on board seven hundred regulars, commanded by colonel Worge, and embarked, on the 11th of November, from Cork harbour. They arrived at Goree after a tempestuous passage about the close of December, and the commodore immediately made a disposition for the attack of that island, which was remarkably strong by nature, but indifferently fortified. After a very warm, but short contest, the garrison, though they had not lost a man, deserted their post, and the governor was under the necessity of striking his colours, and surrendering at discretion. The loss of the English did not exceed one hundred men, killed and wounded. Thus fell the important island of Goree into the hands of the English, together with two trading vessels that chanced to be at anchor in the road, and stores, money, and merchandize, to the value of twenty thousand pounds. Part of the troops being left in garrison at Goree, under the command of major Newton, together with three sloops for his service, the commodore set sail for Senegal, and reinforced Fort Louis with the rest of the troops under colonel Worge (r).

Captain Tyrrel being detached in the Buckingham on a cruize in November, fell in with the Weazle sloop, commanded by captain Bowles, between the islands of Montserrat and Guadaloupe, and immediately discovered a fleet of nineteen sail, under convoy of a French ship of war carrying seventy-four guns, and two large frigates. Captain Tyrrel immediately gave chase with all the sail he could carry, and the Weazle running close to the enemy, received a whole broadside from the large ship, which, however, she sustained without much damage: nevertheless, captain Tyrrel ordered her commander to keep aloof, as he could not be supposed able to bear the shock of large metal, and he himself prepared for the engagement. The enemy's large ship, the Florissant, though of much greater force than the Buckingham, instead of lying to for his coming up, made a running fight with her stern-chase, while the two frigates annoyed him in his course, sometimes raking him fore and aft, and sometimes lying on his quarter. At length he came along side of the Florissant, within pistol-shot, and poured in a whole broadside, which did considerable execution. The salutation was returned with equal vivacity, and a furious engagement ensued. Captain Tyrrel was wounded in the face, and lost three fingers of his right hand; so that, being entirely disabled, he was obliged to delegate the command of the ship to his first lieutenant, Mr. Marshal, who continued the battle with great gallantry until he lost his life; then the charge devolved to the second lieutenant, who acquitted himself with equal honour, and sustained a desperate fight against three ships of the enemy. The officers and crew of the Buckingham exerted themselves with equal vigour and deliberation, and captain Troy, who commanded a detachment of marines on the poop, plied his small arms so effectually, as to drive the French from their quarters. At length confusion, terror, and uproar, prevailing on board the Florissant, her firing ceased, and her colours were hauled down about twilight; but her commander, perceiving that the Buckingham was too much damaged in her rigging to pursue in any hope of success, ordered all his sails to be set, and fled in the dark with his two consorts. Nothing but this circumstance could have prevented a British ship of sixty-five guns, indifferently manned in respect to number, from taking a French ship of the line, of seventy-four guns, provided with seven hundred men, and assisted by two large frigates, one of thirty-eight guns, and the other of thirty-six. The loss of the Buckingham, in this action, did not exceed twenty men killed and wounded; whereas the number of slain on board the Florissant did not fall short of one hundred and eighty, and that of her wounded is said to have exceeded three hundred. She was so disabled in her hull, that she could hardly be kept afloat until she reached Martinique, where she was repaired; and the largest frigate, together with the loss of forty men, received such damage as to be for some time quite unserviceable.

We must now return to our affairs in the East Indies. While success appeared doubtful between these contending nations, the Dutch, under pretence of reinforcing the garrisons in Bengal, equipped seven ships, which were ordered to sail up the Ganges, and render their fort at Chincura so formidable as to exclude all other nations from the salt-petre trade, which was carried on there, and thus monopolize so beneficial a commodity. This design colonel Clive thought proper to oppose. He sent the Dutch commander a letter, informing him that he could not permit his landing, and marching his forces to the fort intended, as he foresaw that it would be detrimental to the commerce of Europe. To this message the Dutchman replied, that he had no designs of a monopoly, and he only requested the liberty to land and refresh his troops; which request was quickly granted. But the Dutch commander continued submissive no longer than he supposed himself unable to act with vigour; for as soon as he knew that the ships which were to second his operations were come up the river, he boldly began his march to Chincura, and took several small vessels belonging to the English in his passage, to retaliate for the affront he pretended to have received. Colonel Clive was not slow in vindicating the honour of his country; and as there happened to be three India ships at that time in the harbour, he gave them instant orders to meet the Dutch fleet, and sink them if they offered to resist. This command was obeyed with great alacrity; but, after a few broadsides on either side, the Dutch commander struck, and the rest of the fleet followed his example. The victory thus obtained, without any great damage, captain Wilson, who commanded in the expedition, took possession of the fleet of the enemy, and sent their men prisoners to the fort; while, about the same time, their land forces were defeated by colonel Ford, sent by Clive upon that duty. This contest had like to have produced a new rupture in that part of the world; but a negociation soon after ensuing, the Dutch wisely gave way to a power they were not able to withstand.

Meanwhile the operations against the French were carried on with equal success. The troops, headed by colonel Coote, marched against general Lally, and resolved to come to a decisive engagement. On his march he took the city of Wandewash; afterwards he reduced the fortress of Carangoly, and, at length, came up with the French general, who did not appear to have any intention of declining the engagement. The French advanced within three quarters of a mile of the English line, and the cannonading began with great fury on both sides. The engagement continued with obstinacy for several hours, when the French gave way and fled towards their camp, which they as quickly abandoned, leaving their baggage, cannon, and the field of battle, to the conquerors. The re-taking the city of Arcot was the consequence of this victory; and nothing now remained to the French, of all their former dominions in India, but Pondicherry. As soon as the fortresses adjacent were reduced, colonel Coote sat down before that city determined to blockade it by land, while admiral Stevens shut up the harbour by sea. A regular siege was at that time impracticable, from the periodical rains which in that climate would not fail to obstruct all such operations. However, neither the rains nor the inclemency of the climate, were able to abate the ardour of the besiegers; the blockade was continued, and the garrison was pressed in such a manner, that it was reduced to the most extreme distress. Though the French soldiers were obliged to feed on dogs and cats, Lally the commander was determined to hold out to the last. In the midst of the garrison's distress, fortune seemed to give an opportunity of relief, had it been seized with vigour. One of those terrible tempests, common in that climate, wrecked a large part of the English fleet that was blocking up the harbour. Lally wrote the most pressing letters to the French residents at the Dutch settlements, to be supplied with provisions; but to his mortification, instead of seeing the French boats coming to his relief, he saw, in less than four days, the English admiral again entering the harbour, having repaired the damage he had lately sustained. Lally, however, still determined to hold out, and with a savage obstinacy saw his troops half consuming with fatigue and famine around him. At length, finding that a breach had been made in the rampart, and that no more than one day's provision remained, he permitted a signal to be made for ceasing hostilities. Yet still the strong perverseness of his temper continued; he sent a paper alledging, that he would not treat upon honourable terms with an enemy that had transgressed all the laws of honour. He surrendered the place not in his own person, but permitted some under officers in garrison to obtain terms of capitulation. This conquest put an end to the power of France in India. The chief part of the territory and trade of that vast peninsula, from the Indus to the Ganges, was annexed to the British empire; and the princes of the country, after some vain opposition to the English power, were at length contented to submit.

(r) This expedition, though in the main a successful one, was attended with one misfortune, the loss of the Litchfield man of war, commanded by captain Barton, together with one transport and a bomb tender, which were wrecked on the coast of Barbary. One hundred and thirty men, including several officers, perished on this occasion; but the captain and the rest of the company, about two hundred and twenty, reached the shore, where they were in danger of starving, and were cruelly used by the natives, although a treaty of peace subsisted at that time between Great Britain and the emperor of Morocco; nay, the emperor even ordered them into slavery, and detained them in captivity till they were ransomed by the British government.

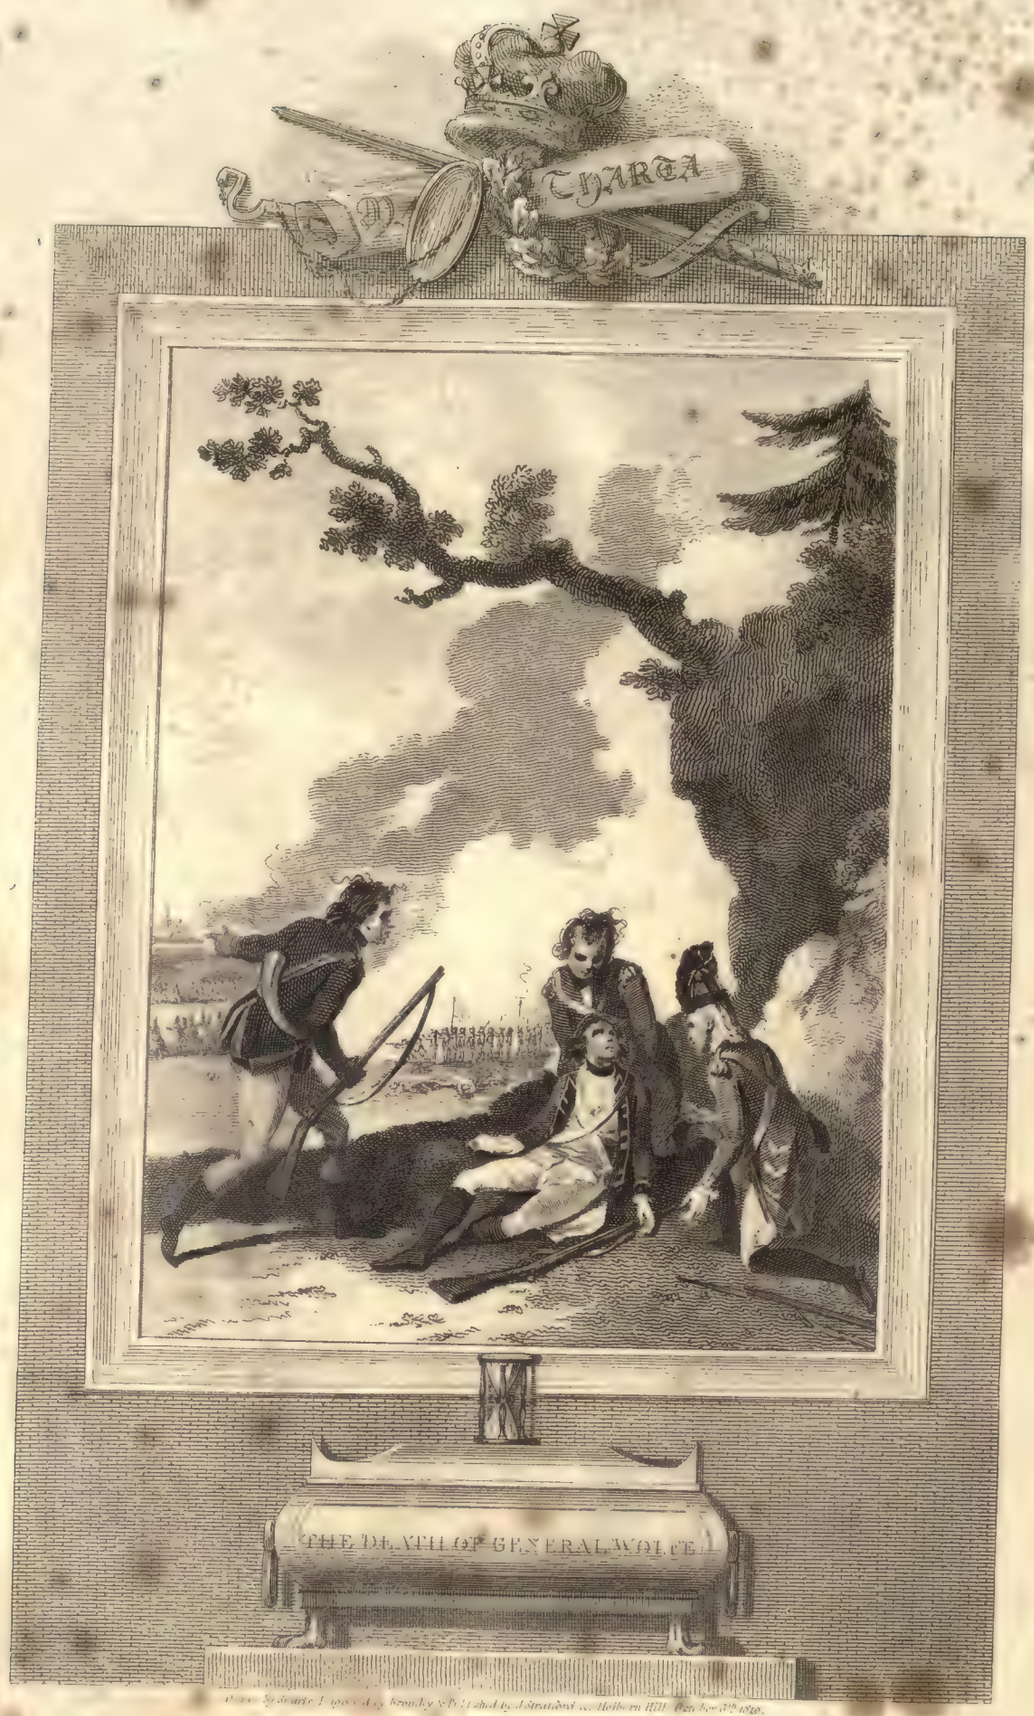
But the strength of the crown of England seemed to be every day declining, and the general opinion of the people was loud enough to reach the throne. The ministry that had hitherto hedged in the throne, were at length obliged to admit some men into a share of the government, whose activity at least would counterbalance their timidity and irresolution. At the head of the newly introduced party, was the celebrated Mr. William Pitt, from whose vigour the nation formed very great expectations, and they were not deceived. Though the old ministers were obliged to admit these new members into their society, there was no legal penalty for refusing to operate with them; they therefore associated with each other, and used every art to render their new assistants odious to the king, upon whom they had been in a manner forced by the people. His former ministry flattered him in his attachments to his German dominions; while the new clamoured against all continental connections, as incompatible with the interests of the nation. The king was naturally led to take part with those who favoured his own sentiments, and to reject those who opposed them. Mr. Pitt, therefore, after being a few months in office, was ordered to resign, by his majesty's command, and his coadjutor, Mr. Legge, was displaced from being chancellor of the exchequer. This blow to his ambition was but of short continuance; the generality of the nation seemed to rise up in his defence, and Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge were once more reluctantly restored to their former employments, the one of secretary of state, the other of chancellor of the exchequer. The consequences of the former ill conducted counsels still seemed to continue in America. The generals sent over to manage the operations of the war, loudly accused the timidity and delays of the natives, whose duty it was to unite in their own defence. The Americans, on the other hand, as warmly expostulated against the pride, avarice, and incapacity of those sent over to command them. General Shirley, who had been appointed to the supreme command there, had been for some time recalled, and replaced by lord Loudon; and this nobleman also soon after returning to England, three several commanders were put at the head of separate operations. General Amherst commanded that designed against the island of Cape Breton; the other was consigned to general Abercrombie, against Crown-Point and Ticonderago; and the third, still more to the southward, against Fort du Quesne, commanded by brigadier-general Forbes.

Cape Breton (s), which had been taken from the French during the preceding war, had been restored at the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. The wresting of this important place once more from the hands of the French, was a measure ardently desired by the whole nation. The fortress of Louisburgh, by which it was defended, had been strengthened by the assistance of art, and was still better defended from the nature of its situation. The garrison also was numerous, the commander vigilant, and every precaution taken to oppose a landing. Notwithstanding the complicated difficulties the English had to encounter, they surmounted every obstacle with great intrepidity. Their former timidity and irresolution seemed to vanish, their natural courage and confidence returned, and the place surrendered by capitulation. The fortifications were soon after demolished, and rendered unfit for future service.

The expedition to Fort du Quesne was equally successful; but that against Crown-Point was once more defeated. This was now the second time the English army had attempted to penetrate into those hideous wilds, by which nature had secured the French possessions in that part of the world. Braddock fell in the attempt, a martyr to his impetuosity; too much caution was equally injurious to his successor. Abercrombie spent much time in marching to the place of action; and the enemy were thus prepared to give him a severe reception. As he approached Ticonderago, he found them deeply entrenched at the foot of the fort, and still farther secured by fallen trees, with their branches pointing against him. These difficulties the English ardour attempted to surmount; but as the enemy, being secure themselves, took aim at leisure, a terrible carnage of the assailants ensued; and the general, after repeated efforts, was obliged to order a retreat. The English army, however, was still superior; and it was supposed that when the artillery was arrived, something more successful might be performed; but the general felt too sensibly the terrors of the late defeat to remain in the neighbourhood of a triumphant enemy. He withdrew his troops, and returned to his camp at Lake George, from whence he had taken his departure. But though in this respect the English arms were unsuccessful, yet upon the whole the campaign was greatly in their favour. The taking of Fort du Quesne served to remove from their colonies the terror of the incursions of the Indians, while it interrupted that correspondence which ran along a chain of forts, with which the French had environed the English settlements in America. This, therefore, promised a fortunate campaign the next year, and vigorous measures were taken to ensure success.

On the opening of the following year, therefore, the ministry, sensible that a single effort, carried on in such an extensive country, could never reduce the enemy, resolved to attack them in several parts of their empire at once. Preparations were accordingly made, and expeditions driven forward against three different parts of North America at the same time. General Amherst, the commander in chief, with a body of twelve thousand men, was to attack Crown-Point, that had hitherto been the reproach of the English army. General Wolfe was at the opposite quarter to enter the river St. Lawrence, and undertake the siege of Quebec, the capital of the French dominions in America; while general Prideaux, and sir William Johnson, were to attempt a French fort, near the cataracts of Niagara. The last named expedition was the first that succeeded. The siege was begun with vigour, and promised an easy conquest; but general Prideaux was killed in the trenches by the bursting of a mortar, so that the whole command of the expedition devolved upon general Johnson, who omitted nothing to push forward the vigorous operations of his predecessor, to which also he added his own popularity with the soldiers under him. A body of French troops, who were sensible of the importance of this fort, attempted to relieve it; but Johnson attacked them with intrepidity and success; for in less than an hour their whole army was put to the rout. The garrison soon after perceiving the fate of their countrymen, surrendered prisoners of war. The success of general Amherst was less splendid, though not less serviceable; upon arriving at the destined place, he found the forts both of Crown-Point and Ticonderago deserted and destroyed.



There now remained but one grand and decisive blow to put all North-America into the possession of the English; and this was the taking of Quebec, which was successfully undertaken in 1759. Admiral Saunders was appointed to command the naval part of the expedition; the siege by land was committed to the conduct of general Wolfe, of whom the nation had great expectations (t).

The war in America had been hitherto carried on with extreme barbarity; and retaliating murders were continued without any one's knowing who first began. General Wolfe, however, disdained to imitate an example that

(s) It was not till the English had been put in possession of this island, that they began to perceive its advantageous situation, and the convenience of its harbour for annoying the British trade with impunity. It was also a convenient port for carrying on their fishery, a branch of commerce of the utmost benefit to the English nation in general.

(t) This young soldier, who was not yet thirty-five, had distinguished himself on many former occasions, particularly at the siege of Louisburgh; a part of the success of which was justly ascribed to him, who, without being indebted to family or connections, had raised himself by merit to his present command.

CHARTA
THE DEATH OF GENERAL WOLFE

had been set him even by some of his associate officers; he carried on the war with all the spirit of humanity which it admits of. The city of Quebec is situated on the north side of the great river St. Lawrence; and when we consider the fortifications with which it was secured, the natural strength of the country, the great number of vessels and floating batteries the enemy had provided for the defence of the river, the numerous bodies of savages continually hovering round the English army, it must be owned there was such a combination of difficulties, as might discourage and perplex the most resolute commander. The general himself seemed perfectly sensible of the difficulty of the undertaking. After stating, in a letter to the ministry, the dangers that presented, "I know, said he, that the affairs of Great Britain require the most vigorous measures. But then the courage of an handful of brave men should be exerted only where there is some hope of a favourable event. At present the difficulties are so various, that I am at a loss how to determine." The only prospect of attempting the town with success was by landing a body of troops in the night below the town, who were to clamber up the banks of the river, and take possession of the ground on the back of the city. This attempt, however, appeared peculiarly discouraging. The stream was rapid, the shore shelving, the bank above lined with centinels, the landing-place so narrow as to be easily missed in the dark, and the steepness of the ground such as hardly to be surmounted in the day-time. All these difficulties were removed by the conduct of the general, and the bravery of the men. Colonel Howe, with the light infantry and the Highlanders, ascended the woody precipices with admirable courage and activity, and dislodged a small body of troops that defended a narrow pathway up the bank; thus a few mounting, the general drew the rest up in order as they arrived. Monsieur de Montcalm, the French commander, was no sooner apprized that the English had gained these heights, which he had confidently deemed inaccessible, than he resolved to hazard a battle, and a furious encounter quickly began. This was one of the most desperate engagements during the war. The French general was slain; and the second in command shared the same fate. General Wolfe was stationed on the right, where the attack was most warm; as he stood conspicuous in the front line, he had been aimed at by the enemies marksmen, and received a shot in the wrist, which, however, did not oblige him to quit the field. Having wrapped an handkerchief round his hand, he continued giving orders without the least emotion, and advanced at the head of the grenadiers with their bayonets fixed; but a second ball more fatal, pierced his breast; so that, unable to proceed, he leaned on the shoulder of a soldier that was next him. Now struggling in the agonies of death, and just expiring, he heard a voice cry, "They run! they run!"—"Who run?" cried the gallant Wolfe, with great eagerness: when the lieutenant replied, "The French,"—"What! (said he,) do the cowards run already? then I die happy." So saying, the glorious youth expired. Perhaps the loss of the English that day was greater than the conquest of Canada was advantageous; but it is the lot of mankind only to know true merit on that dreadful occasion when they are going to lose it.

The surrender of Quebec was the consequence of this victory; and with it soon after the total cession of all Canada. The French, indeed, the following season made a vigorous effort to retake the city; but by the resolution of governor Murray, and the appearance of an English fleet under the command of lord Colville, they were forced to abandon the enterprize. The whole province was soon after reduced by the prudence and activity of general Amherst, who obliged the French army to capitulate. To these conquests about the same time was added the reduction of the island of Guadaloupe, under commodore More and general Hopson, an acquisition of great importance; but which was restored at the succeeding peace.

Notwithstanding these troublesome, warlike, and expensive times, the citizens of London found leisure to plan, and funds to execute magnificent works of art, for the ornament of the metropolis, and the convenience of commerce. They had obtained an act of parliament, empowering them to build a new bridge over the Thames, from Black Friers to the opposite shore, about midway between those of London and Westminster. Commissioners were appointed to put this act in execution; and, at a court of common council, it was resolved that a sum not exceeding one hundred and forty-four thousand pounds should be forthwith raised, within the space of eight years, by instalments, not exceeding thirty thousand pounds in one year, to be paid into the chamber of London; that the persons advancing the money should have an interest at the rate of four pounds per cent. per annum, to be paid half-yearly by the chamberlain, yet redeemable at the expiration of the first ten years; and that the chamberlain should affix the city's seal to such instruments as the committee might think fit to give for the security of the payment of the said annuities. Such were the first effectual steps taken towards the execution of a laudable measure, which met with the most obstinate opposition in the sequel from the narrow views of particular people, as well as from the prejudice of party.

The spirit that now animated the citizens of London was such as small difficulties did not retard, and even considerable losses could not discourage. In November, 1759, the city was exposed to a dangerous conflagration, kindled in the night by accident in the neighbourhood of the Royal Exchange, which burned with great fury, notwithstanding the assistance of the fire-men and engines employed under the personal directions of the magistracy, and consumed a great number of houses, and damaged many more. That whole quarter of the town was filled with consternation; some individuals were beggared; one or two perished in the flames, and some were buried in the ruins of the houses that sunk under the disaster.

This year a sloop called the Dolphin, bound from the Canaries to New York, met with such unfavourable weather, that she was detained one hundred and sixty-five days in the passage, and the provisions of the ship was altogether expired before the first fifty days were elapsed. The wretched crew had devoured their dog, cat, and all their shoes on board: at length, being reduced to the utmost extremity, they agreed to cast lots for their lives, that the body of him on whom the lot should fall might serve for some time to support the survivors. The wretched victim was one Antonio Gulatie, a Spanish gentleman and passenger. Him they shot with a musquet; and having cut off his head, threw it overboard; but the entrails, and rest of the carcase, they greedily devoured. This horrid banquet having, as it were, fleshed the famished crew, they began to talk of another sacrifice, from which, however, they were diverted by the influence and remonstrances of their captain, who prevailed upon them to be satisfied with a miserable allowance to each per diem cut from a pair of leather breeches found in the cabin. Upon this calamitous pittance, reinforced with the grass which grew plentifully upon the deck, these poor objects made shift to subsist for twenty days, at the expiration of which they were relieved, and taken on board by one captain Bradshaw, who they chanced to fall in with at sea (u).

Intelligence having been received that the enemy meditated an invasion upon some of the British territories, and that a number of flat-bottom-boats were prepared at Havre de Grace for the purpose of disembarking troops, rear-admiral Rodney was, in the beginning of July, detached with a small squadron of ships and bombs to annoy and overawe that part of the coast of France. He accordingly anchored in the road of Havre, and made a disposition to execute the instructions he had received. The bomb vessels being placed in the narrow channel of the river leading to Honfleur, began to throw their shells, and continued the bombardment for two-and-fifty hours, without intermission, during which a numerous body of French troops were employed in throwing up entrenchments, erecting new batteries, and firing both shot and shells upon the assailants. The town was set on fire in several places, and burned with great fury; some of the boats were overturned, and a few of them reduced to ashes, while the inhabitants forsook the place in the utmost consernation.

But the honour of the British flag was much more effectually asserted by admiral Boscawen, who had the command of a squadron in the Mediterranean. Having in vain displayed the British flag in sight of Toulon, by way of defiance to the French fleet that lay there at anchor, he ordered three ships of the line, commanded by cap(u) When captain Bradshaw fell in with them, the whole crew, consisting of seven men, were so squalid and emaciated, as to exhibit an appearance at once piteous and terrible; and so reduced in point of strength, that it was found necessary to use ropes and tackle to hoist them from one ship to the other.

tain Smith, Harland, and Barker, to advance and burn two ships that lay close to the mouth of the harbour. They accordingly approached with great intrepidity, and met with a very warm reception from divers batteries which they had not before perceived. Two small forts they attempted to destroy, and cannonaded for some time with great fury; but being over-matched by superior force, and the wind subsiding into a calm, they sustained considerable damage, and were towed off with great difficulty in a very shattered condition. The admiral seeing three of his best ships so roughly handled in this enterprize, returned to Gibraltar in order to retard M. de la Clue, the commander of the French squadron at Toulon, who seized this opportunity of sailing, in hopes of passing the Strait unobserved, with his fleet, consisting of twelve ships of the line and three frigates. Admiral Boscawen's fleet consisted of fourteen sail of the line, with two frigates and as many fire-ships. On the 17th of August, signal was made that fourteen sail appeared on the Barbary shore, to the eastward of Ceuta; upon which the English admiral, having refitted his squadron, immediately went to sea: at day-light he descried seven large ships lying-to; but when the English squadron forbore to answer their signal, they discovered their mistake, set all their sails, and made the best of their way. This was the greater part of the French squadron commanded by M. de la Clue, from whom five of his large ships and three frigates had separated in the night. Even now, perhaps, he might have escaped, had he not been obliged to wait for the Souveraine, which was a heavy sailer. At noon the wind, which had blown a fresh gale, died away, and although admiral Boscawen had made signal to chase, and engage in a line of battle a-head, it was not till half an hour after two that some of his headmost ships could close with the rear of the enemy; which though greatly out-numbered, fought with uncommon bravery. The English admiral, without waiting to return the fire of the sternmost, which he received as he passed, used all his endeavours to come up with the Ocean, which M. de la Clue commanded in person; and about four o'clock in the afternoon running athwart her hause, poured into her a broadside: thus the engagement began with equal vigour on both sides. This dispute, however, was of short duration. In about half an hour admiral Boscawen's mizen-mast and topsail-yards were shot away, and the enemy hoisted all the sail they could carry. Mr. Boscawen having shifted his flag from the Namur to the Newark, joined some other ships in attacking the Centaur, of seventy-four guns, which, being thus overpowered, was obliged to surrender. The British admiral pursued them all night, during which the Souveraine, and the Guerrier, altered their course, and deserted their commander. At day-break M. de la Clue, whose left leg had been broke in the engagement, perceiving the English squadron crowding all their sails to come up with him, and finding himself on the coast of Portugal, determined to burn his ships, rather than they should fall into the hands of the victors. The Ocean was run ashore two leagues from Lagos, near the fort of Amadoria, the commander of which fired three shot at the English; another captain of the French squadron followed the example of his commander, and both endeavoured to disembark their men; but the sea being rough, this proved a very tedious and difficult attempt. The captains of the Temeraire and Modeste, instead of destroying their ships, anchored as near as they could to the forts Xavier and Lagres, in hopes of engaging their protection; but in this hope they were disappointed. M. de la Clue had been landed, and the command of the Ocean was left to the count de Carno, who having received one broadside from the America, struck his colours, and the English took possession of this noble prize, the best ship in the French navy, mounted with eighty guns. Captain Bently, of the Warspight, attacked the Temeraire, of seventy-four guns, which was bulged, and abandoned by her men and officers; but they made a prize of the Modeste, carrying sixty-four guns, which had not been much injured in the engagement (v).

Sir Edward Hawke having the command of a squadron, steered for Quiberon, on the coast of Bretagne, which he supposed would be the rendezvous of the French squadron: but, notwithstanding his utmost efforts, he was driven by a hard gale considerably to the westward, where he was joined by two frigates, the Maidstone and Coventry. These he directed to keep a-head of the squadron. The weather growing more moderate, the former made the signal for seeing a fleet, on the 20th of November, at half an hour past eight o'clock in the morning, and an hour afterwards discovered them to the enemy's squadron. They were at that time in chase of captain Duff's squadron, which now joined the large fleet, after having run some risk of being taken. Sir Edward Hawke, who, when the Maidstone gave the first notice, had formed the line a-breast, now perceiving that the French admiral endeavoured to escape with all the sail he could carry, threw out a signal for seven of his ships that were nearest the enemy to chase, and endeavour to detain them, until they could be reinforced by the rest of the squadron, which were ordered to form into a line of battle a-head, as they chased, that no time might be lost in the pursuit. With respect to his ships of the line, he had but the advantage of one in point of number, and no superiority in men or metal. At half an hour after two the van of the English fleet began the engagement with the rear of the enemy, in the neighbourhood of Belleisle. Every ship, as she advanced, poured in a broadside on the sternmost of the French, and bore down upon their van, leaving the rear to those that came after. Sir Edward Hawke, in the Royal George, of one hundred and ten guns, reserved his fire in passing through the rear of the enemy, and ordered his master to bring him along-side of the French admiral, who commanded in person on board the Soleil Royal, a ship mounted with eighty guns, and provided with a complement of twelve hundred men. When the pilot remonstrated that he could not obey his command, without the most imminent risk of running upon a shoal, the veteran replied, "You have done your duty in showing the danger; now you are to comply with my order, and lay me along-side the Soleil Royal." His wish was gratified: the Royal George ranged up with the French admiral. The Thesée, another large ship of the enemy, running up between the two commanders, sustained the fire that was reserved for the Soleil Royal; but in returning the first broadside foundered, in consequence of the high sea that entered her lower-deck port, and filled her with water. Notwithstanding the boisterous weather, a great number of ships on both sides fought with equal fury and dubious success, till about four in the afternoon, when the Formidable struck her colours. The Superbe shared the fate of the Thesée in going to the bottom. The Hero hauled down her colours in token of submission, and dropped anchor; but the wind was so high, that no boat could be sent to take possession. By this time day-light began to fail, and the greater part of the French fleet escaped under cover of the darkness. Night approaching, the wind blowing with augmented violence on a lee-shore, and the British squadron being entangled among unknown shoals and islands, sir Edward Hawke made the signal for anchoring to the westward of the small island Dumet; and here the fleet remained all night in a very dangerous riding, alarmed by the fury of the storm, and the incessant firing of guns of distress, without their knowing whether it proceeded from friend or enemy. The Soleil Royal, had, under favour of the night, anchored also in the midst of the British squadron; but at day-break M. de Conflans ordered her cable to be cut, and she drove ashore to the westward of Crozie. The English admiral immediately made signal to the Essex to slip cable, and pursue her; and, in obeying this order, she ran unfortunately on a sand-bank called Lefour, where the Resolution, another ship of the British squadron was already grounded. Here they were both irrecoverably lost, in spite of all the assistance that could be given: but all their men, and part of their stores, were saved, and the wrecks set on fire by order of the admiral. He likewise detached the Portland, Chatham, and Vengeance, to destroy the Soleil Royal, which was burned by her own people, before the English ships could approach; but they arrived time enough to reduce the Hero to ashes on the Lefour, where she had been also stranded; and the Juste, another of their great ships, perished in the mouth of the Loire. The admiral, perceiving several large ships of the enemy riding at anchor, between Point Penvas and the (v) This victory was obtained by the English admiral with the loss of but few men; the whole number of the killed and wounded not exceeding two hundred and fifty on board the British squadron, though the carnage among the enemy was much more considerable, as M. de la Clue, in his letter to the French ambassador at Lisbon, owned, that on board of his own ship, the Ocean, one hundred men were killed, and seventy dangerously wounded.

mouth of the river Vilaine, made the signal to weigh, in order to attack them; but the fury of the storm increased so vehemently, that he was obliged to remain at anchor, and even order the top-gallant-masts to be struck. In the mean time, the French ships being lightened of their cannon, their officers took advantage of the flood, and a more moderate gale under the land, to enter the Vilaine, where they lay within half a mile of the entrance, protected by some occasional batteries erected on shore, and by two large frigates moored across the mouth of the harbour. Thus they were effectually secured from any attempt of small vessels; and as for large ships, there was not water sufficient to float them within fighting distance of the enemy. This battle not only defeated the projected invasion, which had hung menacing so long over the apprehensions of Great Britain, but it gave the finishing blow to the naval power of France, which was totally disabled from undertaking any thing of consequence in the after part of the war.

We must now return to the military atchievements on the continent of Europe. A defensive war in Germany was all that could be expected; and this was maintained against the united powers of the continent with unexampled bravery, by the king of Prussia and the English in alliance. The French and Imperialists, triumphing in repeated successes, formed the siege of Leipsig, in the depth of winter. The capture of that city would have been fatal to the interests of the king of Prussia; and by one of those rapid marches, for which he was remarkable, he seemed with his army, unexpectedly, to rise up before the town. Such was the terror of his arms, that, even vanquished as he appeared, the French, though superior in number, raised the siege, and retreated. He was resolved to pursue, and at length overtook them at the village of Rosbach, where he gained so complete a victory, that night alone saved their whole army from annihilation.

The Austrians in the mean time laid siege to Breslau, upon which place, November 22, 1757, they began a most furious discharge of cannon, forty of which were twenty-four pounders, and this continued without intermission about four hours, when it was succeeded by a severe fire of the small arms, which likewise lasted about four hours. The Prussians, with undaunted resolution, stood two of the most violent attacks that were ever made; but at the third, overpowered by numbers, and assailed on both sides, they began to lose ground, and were forced to retire from one entrenchment to another. In this extremity, night coming on, the Prussian generals fearing their entrenchment would be entirely forced, and that they should then be totally defeated, thought proper to retreat. The prince of Bevern, with the greater part of the army, retired to an eminence on the banks of the Oder, while the rest of the troops threw themselves into Breslau, which they might have defended, in all probability, till the king had come to its relief. But, on the 24th, their commander in chief, the prince of Bevern, going to reconnoitre the enemy, with only a single groom to attend him, fell in among a party of Croats, who took him prisoner. His army, thus deprived of their general, retreated northward that night, leaving in Breslau only four battalions, who, the next day, surrendered the place by capitulation, one of the articles of which was, That they should not serve against the empress or her allies, for two years. All the magazines, chests, artillery, &c. remained in the hands of the Austrians. The garrison marched out with all military honours, conducted by general Leswitz, governor of Breslau. Though the Austrians sung Te Deum for the victory, they owned that such another would put an end to their army, for it cost them the lives of twelve thousand men; a number almost equal to the whole of the Prussian army before the battle. They had four almost inaccessible entrenchments to force, planted thick with cannon, which fired cartridge-shot from nine in the morning till the evening, and the Prussians, when attacked, were never once put into the least confusion. Among the slain on the side of the Austrians were general Wurben, and several other officers of distinction. The loss of the Prussians did not much exceed three thousand men, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, of which last there were about sixteen hundred. Their general, Kleist, was found dead on the field of battle.

The king of Prussia, at the head of only fifteen thousand men, advanced towards the enemy. In his march he was joined by twenty-four thousand more. With this force, though greatly inferior in number to that of the enemy, he resolved to attack the Austrians, who were entrenched at Lissa, near Breslau. On the 4th of December he seized upon their ovens at Neumarck, and upon a considerable magazine, guarded by two regiments of Croats, who retired to a rising ground, where his majesty ordered his hussars to surround them, and send a trumpet to summon them to surrender themselves prisoners of war. Upon their refusal, the hussars of Zeithen fell upon them sabre in hand, and some hundreds of them having been cut in pieces, the rest threw down their arms, begging for quarter on their knees. After this seizure, and after having distributed to his army the bread prepared for his enemies, he began again the next morning his march towards Lissa. General Ziethen, who led the van-guard of light horse, fell in with a body of Austrian hussars, and three regiments of Saxon dragoons, which were the very best cavalry the enemy had left after the late battle. They had been detached by the Austrians, in order to retard the king's march, and to conceal their own, till their batteries should be completed; for, as they held the small number of the Prussians in contempt, their intention was to have met the king two German miles from their entrenchments. The Austrian cavalry having been vigorously repulsed to a considerable distance, general Ziethen perceived that their whole army was forming. He immediately acquainted the king with what he had discovered, and his majesty, after having himself observed the disposition of the enemy, made his own with that sagacity and dispatch for which he has always been remarkable. The action began by attacking a battery of forty pieces of large cannon, which covered the right wing of the enemy. The two battalions of guards, with the regiments of the margrave Charles and of Itzenplitz, marched up, amidst a most terrible fire, in the very mouth of the cannon, with their bayonets screwed. In this attack the Prussians sustained their greatest loss, though the battery was carried as soon almost as they could reach it: then the enemy's artillery, now turned against themselves, played furiously upon them with their own powder. From that instant the two wings and the center of the Prussians continued to drive the enemy before them, advancing all the time with that firm and regular pace for which they have always been renowned, without ever halting or giving way. The ground which the Austrians occupied was very advantageous, and every circumstance that could render it more so had been improved to the utmost by the diligence and skill of count Daun, who, remembering his former success, was emboldened to enter the lists again with his royal antagonist. The Prussians, however, no way terrified by the enemy's situation, nor their numbers, went calmly and dreadfully forward. It was almost impossible, in the beginning, for the Prussian cavalry to act, on account of the impediments of fallen trees, which the enemy had cut down and laid in the field of battle, to retard their approach; but a judicious disposition which the king made overcame that disadvantage. When he had first formed his army, he had placed four battalions behind the cavalry of his right wing, foreseeing that general Nadisti, who was placed with a corps of reserve on the enemy's left, designed to take him in flank. It happened as he had foreseen, this general's horse attacked the king's right wing with great fury: but he received so severe a fire from the four battalions. that he was obliged to retire in disorder. The enemy gave way on all sides; but at some distance recovered themselves, and rallied three times, animated by their officers, and by the superiority of their numbers. Every time they made a stand, the Prussians attacked them with redoubled vigour, and with success equal to their bravery. Towards night, the enemy still retreating, fell into disorder. Their two wings fled in confusion; one of them, closely pressed by the king, retired towards Breslau, and took shelter under the cannon of that city; the other, pursued by the greatest part of the light cavalry, took their flight towards Canth and Schweidnitz. Six thousand Austrians fell in this engagement, and the Prussians, who had only five hundred men killed, and two thousand three hundred wounded, made upwards of ten thousand of the enemy prisoners, among whom were two hundred and ninety-one officers. They also took an hundred and sixteen cannon, fifty-one colours and standards, and four thousand waggons of ammunition and baggage.

Never was the art of war carried to such a pitch of glory as by Frederic king of Prussia, and it must be added, its horrors also. In this war, Europe saw, with astonishment, campaigns carried on in the midst of winter, great and bloody battles fought, yet producing no visible advantage to the victors. At no time since the days of heroism were such numbers destroyed, so many towns taken, so many skirmishes fought, such stratagems practised, or such intrepidity discovered: armies were by the German discipline considered as composing one great machine, directed by one commander, and animated by a single will. From the commentary of these campaigns, succeeding generals will take their lessons of devastation, and improve upon the arts increasing human calamity. As soon as it was known that prince Ferdinand had put himself at the head of the Hanoverian army, his Britannic majesty, in a speech to his parliament, observed, that the late successes of his ally in Germany had given a happy turn to his affairs, which it would be necessary to improve. The commons concurred in his sentiment, and liberally granted supplies both for the service of the king of Prussia, and for enabling the army formed in Hanover to act vigorously in conjunction with him. From sending money over into Germany the nation began to extend their benefits; and it was soon considered that men would be a more grateful supply. Mr. Pitt, who had at first come into popularity and power by opposing such measures, was now prevailed on to enter into them with even greater ardour than any of his predecessors. The hopes of putting a speedy end to the war by vigorous measures, a connection with which he was obliged to co-operate, and perhaps the pleasure he found in pleasing the king, all together incited him eagerly to push forward a continental war. However, he only conspired with the general inclinations of the people at this time, who, allured by the noble efforts of their only ally, were unwilling to see him fall a sacrifice to the united ambition of his enemies.

In order to indulge this general inclination of assisting the king of Prussia, the duke of Marlborough was at first sent to Germany with a small body of British forces, to join with prince Ferdinand, whose activity against the French began to be crowned with success. After some small successes by the allied army at Crevelt, the duke of Marlborough dying, his command devolved upon lord George Sackville, who was at that time a favourite with the English army. However, a misunderstanding arose between him and the commander in chief, which soon had an occasion of being displayed at the battle of Minden (w), fought shortly after. The cause of this secret disgust on both sides is not clearly known; it is thought that the extensive genius, and the inquisitive spirit of the English general, were by no means agreeable to his superior in command, who hoped to reap some pecuniary advantages the other was unwilling to permit. Be this as it will, both armies advancing near the town of Minden, the French began the attack with great vigour, and a general engagement of the infantry ensued. Lord George, at the head of the British and Hanoverian horse, was stationed at some distance on the right of the infantry, from which they were divided by a scanty wood that bordered on a heath. The French infantry giving ground, the prince thought that this would be a favourable opportunity to pour down the horse among them, and accordingly sent lord George orders to come on. These orders were but ill obeyed; and whether they were unintelligible, or contradictory, still remains a point for posterity to debate upon. It is certain that lord George shortly after was recalled, tried by a court-martial, found guilty, and declared incapable of serving in any military command for the future. The enemy, however, were repulsed in all their attacks with considerable loss, and at length giving way were pursued to the very ramparts of Minden. The victory was splendid, but laurels were the only advantage reaped from the field of battle. After these victories, which were greatly magnified in England, it was supposed that one reinforcement more of British troops would terminate the war in favour of the allies, and a reinforcement was quickly sent.

The British army in Germany now amounted to above thirty thousand men, and the whole nation was flushed with the hopes of immediate conquest. But these hopes soon vanished in finding victory and defeat successively following each other. The allies were worsted at Corback; but retrieved their honour at Exdorf. A victory at Warbourgh followed shortly after, and another at Zierenberg, but then they suffered a defeat at Campen, after which both sides went into winter-quarters. The successes thus on either side might be considered as a compact lay which both engaged to lose much and gain little, for no advantages whatever followed from victory. The English at length began to open their eyes to their own interest, and found that they were waging unequal war, and loading themselves with taxes for conquests that they could neither preserve nor enjoy. It must be confessed, that the efforts of England, at this time, over every part of the globe, were amazing; and the expence of her operations greater than had ever been disbursed by any nation before. The king of Prussia received a subsidy; a large body of English forces commanded the extensive peninsula of India; another army of twenty thousand men confirmed their conquests in North-America; there were thirty thousand men employed in Germany, and several other bodies dispersed in the different garrisons in various parts of the world; but all these were nothing to the force maintained at sea, which carried command wherever it came, and had totally annihilated the French power on that element. The courage and the conduct of the English admirals had surpassed whatever had been read of in history; neither superior force, nor numbers, nor even the terrors of the tempest, could intimidate them.

A petition was presented to the house of commons, in November, 1759, from several noblemen, gentlemen, and others, inhabitants of East Greenwich, and places adjacent, in the county of Kent, representing, that, in the said parish, within a quarter of a mile of the town distinguished by a royal palace, and a royal hospital for seamen, there was a magazine, containing great quantities of gunpowder, frequently to the amount of six thousand barrels; that, besides the great danger which must attend all places of that kind, the said magazine stood in an open field, uninclosed by any fortification or defence whatsoever, consequently exposed to treachery and every other accident. They alledged, that if, through treachery, lightning, or any other accident, this magazine should take fire, not only their lives and properties, but the palace and hospital, the king's yards and stores at Deptford and Woolwich, the banks and navigation of the Thames, with the ships sailing and at anchor in that river, would be inevitably destroyed, and inconceivable damage would accrue to the cities of London and Westminster. They moreover observed, that the magazine was then in a dangerous condition, supported on all sides by props that were decayed at the foundation; that in case it should fall, the powder would, in all probability, take fire, and produce the dreadful calamities above recited: they therefore prayed that the magazine might be removed to some more convenient place, where any accident would not be attended with such dismal consequences. The subject of this remonstrance was so pressing and important, that a committee was immediately appointed to take the affair into consideration, and procure an estimate for purchasing lands, and erecting a powder magazine at Purfleet in Essex, near the banks of the river, together with a guard-house, barracks, and all other necessary conveniences. A bill for the purpose was accordingly framed, and soon received the royal assent. Hereupon the magazine was removed to Purfleet, an inconsiderable and solitary village, where there was but little danger of accident, and where no great damage would attend an explosion; but in order to render this possible explosion still less dangerous, it would be necessary to form the magazine of small distinct apartments, totally independent of each other; that in case one should be accidentally blown up, the rest might stand secure and unaffected.

The next affair which engrossed the attention of the commons, was a measure which related to the internal œconomy of the metropolis. The sheriffs of London delivered a petition from the lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons, in common council assembled, representing that several streets, lanes, and passages within the city of London, and liberties thereof, were too narrow and incommodious for the passing and re-passing, as well of foot-passengers as of coaches, carts, and other carriages, to the prejudice and inconvenience of the owners and inhabitants of houses, and to the great hindrance of business, trade, and commerce. They alledged, that these defects might be remedied, and several new streets opened within the said city and liberties, to the great ease, safety, and convenience of passengers, as well as to the advantage of the public in general, if they, the petitioners, were enabled to widen and enlarge the narrow streets, lanes, and passages, to open and lay out such new streets and ways, and to purchase the several houses, buildings, and grounds which might be necessary for those purposes. After enumerating a variety of particulars relative to the dangerous situation of some parts of the metropolis, a committee was appointed to examine into the matter of the petition; and upon their report, leave was given to prepare a bill, which was accordingly brought in. The next day a great number of citizens represented, in another petition, that the pavement of the city and liberties was frequently damaged by being broken up for the purposes of amending or new laying of water-pipes belonging to the proprietors of water works; and praying, that provision might be made in the bill then depending, to compel those proprietors to make good any damage that should be done to the pavement by the leaking or bursting of water-pipes, or opening the pavement for alterations. In consequence of this representation, some amendments were made in the bill, which passed through both houses, and was enacted into a law, under the title of "An Act for widening certain streets, lanes, and passages, within the city of London and liberties thereof; for opening certain new streets and ways within the same, and for other purposes."

(w) Minden was first taken by the French, afterwards re-taken by the Hanoverians, then re-possessed by the French, and, lastly, it surrendered to the allies. Minden is situated in Saxony, and at that time belonged to the elector of Hanover.

In July, 1760, the vast magazine of naval stores belonging to the dock yard at Portsmouth, was set on fire by lightning; and, consisting of combustibles, burnt with such fury, notwithstanding all the efforts of the workmen in the yard, the sailors in the harbour, and the troops in the town, that, before a stop could be put to the conflagration, it had consumed a very great quantity of stores, to an immense value. The damage, however, considerable as it was, was so immediately repaired, that it had not the least effect in disconcerting any plan, or even in retarding any naval preparation.

In February this year, M. Thurot, with a small squadron arrived in the bay of Carrickfergus, where, on the 21st, he made a descent with six hundred men. Lieutenant-colonel Jennings, who commanded four companies of raw undisciplined men at Carrickfergus, having received information that three ships had anchored about two miles and a half from the castle, which was ruinous and defenceless, immediately detached a party to make observations, and ordered the French prisoners confined there to be removed to Belfast. In the mean time the enemy landed without opposition, and advanced towards the town, which they found as well guarded as the nature of the place, which was entirely open, and the circumstances of the English commander, would allow. A regular attack was carried on, and a spirited defence made, until the ammunition of the English failed; when colonel Jennings retired in order to the castle, which, however, was in all respects untenable; for besides a breach in the wall nearly fifty feet wide, they found themselves destitute of provision and ammunition. Nevertheless they repulsed the assailants in the first attack, even after the gate was burst open, and supplied the want of shot with stones and rubbish. At length the colonel and his troops were obliged to surrender, on condition that they should not be sent prisoners to France, but be ransomed, by sending thither an equal number of French prisoners from Great Britain or Ireland: that the castle should not be demolished, nor the town of Carrickfergus plundered or burned, on condition that the mayor and corporation should furnish the French troops with necessary provisions. The enemy after this exploit did not presume to advance farther into the country, but embarked with some precipitation, after having laid that town under moderate contribution (x).

The fate, however, which the French escaped on shore, they soon met with at sea. Captain John Elliot, who commanded three frigates at Kinsale, and who had in the course of the war more than once distinguished himself, even in his early youth, by extraordinary acts of valour, was informed by a dispatch from the duke of Bedford, at that time lord-lieutenant of Ireland, that three of the enemy's ships lay at anchor in Carrickfergus bay; and thither he immediately shaped his course in the ship Æolus, accompanied by the Pallas and Brilliant, under the command of captains Clements and Logie. On the 28th of February they descried the enemy, and gave chase, in sight of the Isle of Mann, and, about nine in the morning, captain Elliot, in his own ship, engaged the Belleisle, commanded by Thurot, although considerably his superior in strength of men, number of guns, and weight of metal. In a few minutes his consorts were also engaged with the other two ships of the enemy. After a warm action, maintained with great spirit on all sides for an hour and a half, captain Elliot's lieutenant boarded the Belleisle; and striking her colours with his own hand, the commander submitted: his example was immediately followed by the other French captains; and the English commodore, taking possession of his prizes, conveyed them into the bay of Ramsay, in the Isle of Mann, that their damage might be repaired. Though the Belleisle was very leaky, and had lost her bowsprit, mizen-mast, and main-yard, in all probability the victory would not have been so easily obtained, had not the gallant Thurot fallen during the action. The victor had not even the consolation to perform the last offices to his brave enemy; for his body was thrown into the sea by his own people in the hurry of the engagement. The loss on the side of the English did not exceed forty men killed and wounded, whereas above three hundred of the enemy were slain or disabled (y).

The bravery of five Irishmen and a boy belonging to the crew of a ship from Waterford, deserves commemoration. The vessel, in her return from Bilboa, laden with brandy and iron, being taken by a French privateer off Ushant, about the middle of April, the captors removed the master, and all the hands but these five men and the boy, who were left to assist nine Frenchmen in navigating the vessel to France. These stout Hibernians immediately formed a plan of insurrection, and executed it with success. Four of the French mariners being below deck, three aloft among the rigging, one at the helm, and another walking the deck, Brian, who headed the enterprize, tripped up the heels of the French steersman, seized his pistol, and discharged it at him who walked the deck; but missing the mark he knocked him down with the but end of the piece. At the same time hallooing to his confederates below, they assailed the enemy with their own broad swords, and soon compelling them to submit, came upon deck, and shut the hatches. Brian being now in possession of the quarter-deck, those who were aloft called for quarter, and surrendered without opposition. The Irish having thus obtained a complete victory, almost without bloodshed, and secured the prisoners, another difficulty occurred: neither Brian nor any of his associates could read or write, or knew the least principles of navigation; but supposing his course to be north, he steered at a venture, and the first land he made was the neighbourhood of Youghall, where he happily arrived with his prisoners.

In the West Indies, several frigates, and many privateers were captured or destroyed; and on the coast of America the enemy sustained similar damage. With regard to commercial vessels, the balance of capture was adverse to this country; to which the turbulence of the weather also proved hostile, by occasioning the wreck of two ships of the line, in one of which, (the Ramilies,) was lost nearly seven hundred men.

General Amherst having taken possession of Montreal, in North America, the conquest of Canada was, by that means, completed without bloodshed. The French ministry had attempted to succour Montreal, by equipping a considerable number of store-ships, and sending them out in the spring under convoy of a frigate; but as their officers understood that the British squadron had sailed up the river St. Lawrence before their arrival, they took shelter in the bay of Chaleurs, on the coast of Acadia, where they did not long remain unmolested. Captain Byron, (x) One circumstance that attended the dispute between the rival troops deserves to be transmitted to posterity, as an instance of that courage, mingled with humanity, which constitutes true heroism.—While the French and English were hotly engaged in one of the streets, a little child ran playfully between them, having no idea of the danger to which it was exposed: a common soldier of the enemy, perceiving the life of this poor innocent at stake, grounded his piece, advanced deliberately between the lines of fire, took the child up in his arms, and conveyed it to a place of safety; then returning to his station, he resumed his musquet, and renewed his hostilities.

(y) The service performed on this occasion was deemed so essential to the peace and commerce of Ireland, that the thanks of the house of commons in that kingdom were voted to the conquerors of Thurot, as well as to lieutenant-colonel Jennings, for his spirited behaviour at Carrickfergus; and the freedom of the city of Cork was presented in silver boxes to the captains Elliot, Clements, and Logie. The name of Thurot was become terrible to all the trading sea-ports of Great Britain and Ireland, and therefore the defeat and capture of his squadron were celebrated with as hearty rejoicings as the most important victory could have produced.

who commanded the ships of war that were left at Louisbourg, having received intelligence of them from brigadier-general Whitmore, sailed thither with his squadron, and found them at anchor. The whole fleet consisted of one frigate, two large store-ships, and nineteen sail of smaller vessels; the greater part of which had been taken from the merchants of Great Britain: all these were destroyed, together with two batteries which had been raised for their protection. The French town, consisting of two hundred houses, was demolished, and the settlement totally ruined. All the French subjects inhabiting the territories from the bay of Fundy to the banks of the river St. Lawrence, and all the Indians through that tract of country, were now subdued, and subjected to the English government. In the month of December of the preceding year, the French colonists of Miramichi, Richebuctou, and other places lying along the gulf of St. Lawrence, made their submission by deputies to colonel Frye, who commanded in Fort Cumberland at Chignecto. They afterwards renewed this submission in the most formal manner, by subscribing articles, by which they obliged themselves, and the people they represented, to repair in the spring to Bay Verté, with all their effects and shipping, to be disposed of according to the direction of colonel Lawrence, governor of Halifax, in Nova Scotia. They were accompanied by two Indian chiefs of the nation of the Mickmacks, a powerful and numerous people, now become entirely dependent upon his Britannic majesty. In a word, by the conquest of Canada, the Indian fur trade, in its full extent, fell into the hands of the English.

While the British commanders exerted themselves by sea and land with the most laudable spirit of vigilance and courage against the foreign adversaries of their country, the colonists of Jamaica ran the most imminent hazard of being extirpated by a domestic enemy. The negro slaves of that island, grown insolent in the contemplation of their own formidable numbers, or by observing the supine indolence of their masters, or stimulated by that appetite for liberty so natural to the mind of man, began, in the course of this year, to entertain thoughts of shaking off the yoke by means of a general insurrection. Assemblies were held, and plans revolved, for this purpose. At length they concerted a scheme for rising in arms all at once in different parts of the island, in order to massacre all the white men, and take possession of the government. They agreed that this design should be put in execution immediately after the departure of the fleet for Europe; but their plan was defeated by their ignorance and impatience. Those of the conspirators that belonged to captain Forrest's estate, being impelled by the fumes of intoxication, fell suddenly upon the overseer, while he sat at supper with some friends, and butchered the whole company. Being immediately joined by some of their confederates, they attacked the neighbouring plantations, where they repeated the same barbarity; and seizing all the arms and ammunition that fell in their way, began to grow formidable to the colony. The governor no sooner received intimation of this disturbance, than he, by proclamation, subjected the colonists to martial law. All other business was interrupted, and every man took to his arms. The regular troops, joined by the troop of militia, and a considerable number of volunteers, marched from Spanish Town to St. Mary's, where the insurrection began, and skirmished with the insurgents: but as they declined standing any regular engagement, and trusted chiefly to bush fighting, the governor employed against them the free blacks, commonly known by the name of the Wild Negroes, now peaceably settled under the protection of the government. These auxiliaries, in consideration of a price set upon the heads of the rebels, attacked them in their own way, slew them by surprize, until their strength was broken, and numbers made away with themselves in despair; so that the insurrection was supposed to be quelled about the beginning of May: but in June it broke out again with redoubled fury, and the rebels were reinforced to a very considerable number. The regular troops and the militia, joined by a body of sailors, formed a camp, under the command of colonel Spragge, who sent out detachments against the negroes, a great number of whom were killed, and some taken; but the rest, instead of submitting, took shelter in the woods and mountains. The prisoners being tried, and found guilty of rebellion, were put to death by a variety of tortures. Some were hanged, some beheaded, some burned, and some fixed alive upon gibbets. One of these last lived eight days and eighteen hours, suspended under a vertical sun, without being refreshed by one drop of water, or receiving any manner of sustenance.

While the arms of Great Britain still prospered in every effort tending to the real interest of the nation, an event happened which for a moment obscured the splendour of her triumphs. On the 25th of October, 1760, George II. without any previous disorder, was in the morning suddenly seized with the agony of death, at the palace at Kensington. He had risen at his usual hour, drank his chocolate, and enquired about the wind, as anxious for the arrival of the foreign mails; then he opened a window of his apartment, and perceiving the weather, declared he would walk in the garden. In a few minutes after this declaration, while he remained alone in his chamber, he fell down upon the floor: the noise of his fall brought his attendants into the room, who lifted him on the bed, where he desired in a faint voice, that the princess Amelia might be called; but before she could reach the apartment he expired. An attempt was made to bleed him, but without effect; and indeed his malady was far beyond the reach of art: for when the cavity of the thorax or chest was opened, and inspected by the serjeant-surgeons, they found the right ventricle of the heart actually ruptured, and a great quantity of blood discharged through the aperture into the surrounding pericardium; so that he must have died instantaneously, in consequence of the effusion. The king had almost completed the seventy-seventh year of his age, and had reigned upwards of thirty-three years (z).

The character of George the Second was not of that splendid or brilliant kind with which the records of history sometimes present us. Acuteness, penetration, or strength of intellect, did not enter into his composition; nor was he possessed of that genuine vigour of mind which preserves a happy medium between weakness and obstinacy. On the one hand, he was pertinaciously and inflexibly attached to that system of politics which he had imbibed from his father; and, on the other hand, he was frequently so tame and passive, as to suffer his ministers to make him a cypher in his own cabinet. At one time, he would peremptorily maintain a trivial point: on other occasions, he would give way in matters of real importance. His general disposition inclined him to pay a due regard to laws of honour, integrity, and justice. He was also desirous of promoting the welfare and happiness of those whom he governed. In the administration of a limited monarchy, he was observant of the laws and constitution, except when he was misled by pernicious advisers; and, in his sway over a state in which he was unfettered by law, he voluntarily pursued a system of equity and moderation, which endeared him to his German subjects. His political knowledge was not profound or comprehensive; nor were his other attainments superior to his skill as a statesman. He had no taste for the polite arts; he did not aim at any high degree of literary or mental improvements; nor did he patronise, in others, those acquisitions in which he was himself deficient. He had an undisputed claim to the praise of personal courage; and, indeed, the intrepidity of a soldier was more apparent in his character than the conduct of a general. He was not, however, unacquainted with the military science, to which he paid more attention than to such pursuits as were worthy of superior regard. He was less influenced by ambition than by avarice. His thirst of pecuniary spoil was disgraceful to his character. No monarch can have a right to accumulate public money for his private use, or can be justified in making a demand on pretence of debts and deficiencies, when his coffers abound with reserved supplies. In religious affairs, this prince was actuated by a spirit of toleration. He abhorred the idea of persecution; and wished that all his subjects should be left to the free impulse of conscience. He would not, therefore, consent to a rigid enforcement of the laws which had been enacted against sectaries. His private life was regular; and he indulged not his sensual appetites to excess. He was an affectionate husband, and a kind father, with an exception of those cases in which his avarice was concerned. He was a stranger to artifice and disguise; and his irascibility bore testimony to the openness of his character. With regard to his person, he was not tall, but he was well proportioned; and though he had large projecting eyes, and a very prominent nose, his countenance was not unpleasing.

(z) George the Second was buried in Henry the Seventh's Chapel at Westminster. His only sons were Frederic prince of Wales, and William duke of Cumberland. At the king's interment the duke acted as chief mourner. His daughters were, Anne, who became princess of Orange; Amelia, who died unmarried in 1786, at an advanced age; Elizabeth, whom her father survived; Mary, the wife of the late landgrave of Hesse Cassel; and Louisa, who became queen of Denmark.

BOOK XIV.

COMPRIZING THE REIGN OF GEORGE THE THIRD.

CHAPTER I.

IT is natural to suppose that the accession of a native prince (a) to the throne excited great joy and satisfaction in the minds of the people in general. Upon receiving intelligence of his grandfather's decease, the young prince immediately repaired to Carlton House, where the privy council were at that time assembled; and entering into the council chamber, he addressed himself immediately to the members in the following terms: "The loss the nation and I have sustained by the death of the king, my grandfather, would have been severely felt at any time; but coming at so critical a juncture, and so unexpected, it is by many circumstances augmented; and the weight now fallen upon me is much increased: I feel my own insufficiency to support it as I wish; but, animated by the tenderest affection for this my native country, and depending on the advice, experience, and abilities of your lordships, the support and assistance of every honest man, I enter with cheerfulness into this arduous situation; and shall make it the business of my life to promote, in every thing, the glory and happiness of these kingdoms; to preserve and strengthen the constitution, both in church and state; and as I mount the throne in the midst of an expensive, but just and necessary war, I shall endeavour to prosecute it in a manner the most likely to bring about an honourable and lasting peace, in concert with my allies." His majesty then took the oaths to maintain the church of Scotland (b) as by law established; and having signed two instruments for that purpose, one of them was deposited among the archives of the council, and the other transmitted to Edinburgh, to be recorded in the court of sessions.

On the 27th of October, though but one day had intervened since the decease of the king's grandfather, the earl of Bute was sworn a member of the privy council; and, after a short interval, the rangership of Richmond Park (c) was transferred from the princess Amelia to that nobleman. Likewise, by an order of the king in council, the name of the duke of Cumberland, rendered dear to the Whigs, by the memory of the day on which the battle of Culloden was fought, was struck out of the liturgy of the church.

One of the first specimens which his majesty gave of a disposition to moral and religious duty, was a proclamation for the encouragement of piety and virtue, and the preventing and punishing of vice, profaneness, and immorality. This proclamation was immediately succeeded by another, requiring all persons possessing offices of authority at the decease of the late king, to proceed in the execution of their respective offices. Addresses, expressive of the warmest professions of attachment, were poured in from every quarter of the kingdom. The lord mayor and aldermen of London led the way; and their example was followed by the merchants and traders of that opulent city (d).

The parliament assembled on the 18th of November, and his majesty addressed both houses in a most pathetic speech from the throne; in the beginning of which his majesty said:

"The just concern which I have felt in my own breast, on the sudden death of the late king, my royal grandfather, makes me not doubt but you must all have been deeply affected with so severe a loss. The present critical and difficult conjuncture has made this loss the more sensible, as he was the great support of that system, by which alone the liberties of Europe, and the weight and influence of these kingdoms can be preserved, and give life to measures conducive to those important ends.

"I need not tell you the addition of weight which immediately falls upon me, in being called to the government of this free and powerful country at such a time and under such circumstances. My consolation is in the uprightness of my own intentions, your faithful and united assistance, and the blessing of Heaven upon our joint endeavours, which I devoutly implore.

"Born and educated in this country, I glory in the name of Briton; and the peculiar happiness of my life will ever consist in promoting the welfare of a people, whose loyalty and warm affection to me, I consider as the greatest and most permanent security of my throne; and I doubt not but their steadiness in those principles will equal the firmness of my invariable resolutions to adhere to, and strengthen, this excellent constitution in church and state; and to maintain the toleration inviolable. The civil and the religious rights of my loving subjects are equally dear to me with the most valuable prerogatives of my crown; and, as the surest foundation of the whole, and the best means to draw down the divine favour on my reign, it is my fixed purpose to countenance and encourage the practice of true religion and virtue."

In the progress of his speech, he expatiated on the flourishing circumstances of the kingdom, and added, "In this state I have found things at my accession to the throne of my ancestors:—happy, in viewing the prosperous part of it; happier still should I have been, had I found my kingdoms, whose true interests I have entirely at heart, in full peace: but since the ambition, injurious encroachments, and dangerous designs of my enemies, rendered the war both just and necessary, and the generous overture, made last winter, towards a congress for a pacification, has not yet produced any suitable return, I am determined, with your cheerful and powerful assistance, to prosecute this war with vigour, in order to that desirable object,—a safe and honourable peace. For this purpose, it is absolutely incumbent upon us to be early prepared; and I rely upon your zeal and hearty concurrence to sup-

(a) Of this prince, says Dr. Coote, the following character was given by the princess dowager of Wales, in a conversation she had with Doddington, with whom she was on such terms of unreserved confidence, that she would not disguise her real sentiments. "George is not a wild, dissipated boy, but good-natured and cheerful, with a serious cast upon the whole: he is not quick, but, with those with whom he is acquainted, applicable and intelligent." Dodington's Diary, August 6, 1755. The prince was in his eighteenth year when his mother thus spoke of him. She added, that "his education had given her much pain: of his book-learning she was no judge, though she supposed it small or useless; but she hoped that he might have been instructed in the general understanding of things." She also observed, that Stone, whom she had repeatedly desired to inform the prince of the nature of the constitution, had declined the task, "as not being his province:" but he probably took many opportunities of inculcating such maxims as were more consonant with Tory prejudices than with the genuine principles of a limited monarchy.

(b) This circumstance exposed the king to ill-founded censure. His taking an oath for the security of the church of Scotland, and subscribing two instruments tending to the same purport, occasioned a certain author to say, "How the church of England came to be neglected on this occasion, it is not easy to conceive; for it is evident, that, if the coronation oath be a sufficient defence of the one, it must be so for the other; and it is never prudent in a monarch to discover a partiality to one portion of his dominions in preference to the rest." If this had been a spontaneous act of his majesty, there would have been some reason for the introduction of such remarks; but he was obliged by the treaty of union to act as we have mentioned, in compliance with the presbyterian jealousy of the Scots, while the English were content with the sanction of the oath taken at the coronation.

(c) Of the rangership of Richmond Park, the princess could not be deprived without her consent; which was procured by the grant of a pension of one thousand two hundred pounds per annum, on the Irish establishment: but, considering the disrespectful treatment she had received as a kind of insult, she withdrew entirely from court, and, at her death, bequeathed her immense wealth among the descendants of her sister, the princess of Hesse.

(d) We may here mention, that the committee appointed to manage the building of a new bridge over the Thames at Black Friers, laid the first stone of the bridge on the 31st of October, 1760, and placed upon it a plate with an appropriate inscription in Latin.

port the king of Prussia, and the rest of my allies, and to make ample provision for carrying on the war, as the only means to bring our enemies to equitable terms of accommodation."

He concluded by observing, in his address to both houses, that, "The eyes of all Europe are upon you. From your resolutions, the Protestant interest hopes for protection, as well as all our friends for the preservation of their independency; and our enemies fear the final disappointment of their ambitious and destructive views. Let these hopes and fears be confirmed and augmented by the vigour and dispatch of our proceedings.

"In this expectation I am the more encouraged by a pleasing circumstance, which I look upon as one of the most auspicious omens of my reign. That happy extinction of divisions, and that union and good harmony which continue to prevail amongst my subjects, afford me the most agreeable prospect. The natural disposition and wish of my heart, are to cement and promote them; and I promise myself that nothing will arise on your part to interrupt or disturb a situation so essential to the true and lasting felicity of this great people."

By a representation of his majesty, to the house of commons, that it was necessary to make provision for supporting his civil government with honour and dignity, they granted the sum of eight hundred thousand pounds to defray the expences of the civil list. They then proceeded to grant the supplies for the service of the current year, the whole of which amounted, so great was their zeal, to the sum of nineteen millions, six hundred thousand, one hundred and nineteen pounds, nineteen shillings, and three farthings.

In the beginning of 1761, the parliament passed an act in favour of insolvent debtors, who, by giving up all their effects, were to be discharged by the justices at the quarter sessions: but this act, however beneficial in other respects, had in it a clause, attended with such consequences, that it was found necessary to repeal it; but the repeal did not take place till the meeting of the new parliament.

In March the king sent a message to both houses, importing that as nothing could contribute more towards promoting the interests of the people than that of rendering the judges independent, so he desired they would grant him leave to advance their salaries, and that they should hold their places by patent for life; for by the act of settlement at the revolution, they were to expire within six months after the death of the king. The salaries of the nine puisne judges in England were in consequence advanced from fifteen hundred to two thousand pounds per annum; and the three chief justices in proportion. In Scotland, the lord president, instead of one thousand pounds a year, was allowed thirteen hundred; the lords of session, seven hundred pounds instead of five hundred; and the lords justiciary, one thousand instead of five hundred pounds (e). The public business being now concluded, the king repaired to the house of lords on the 19th of March, and having signed such bills as were ready, closed the session with a speech from the throne: shortly after which the parliament was dissolved, and writs were issued for the calling of a new one.

The king now resolved on the choice of a consort, and accordingly turned his attention to Charlotte Sophia, princess of Mecklenburg Strelitz. This being satisfactory to his people, overtures were made to that amiable princess. The proposal of such an illustrious alliance could not be unacceptable to the court of Mecklenburg. On the 8th of July, the king acquainted the members of the privy council, that, having nothing so much at heart as to procure the welfare and happiness of his people, and to render the same permanent to posterity, he had ever since his accession to the throne, directed his attention towards the choice of a princess for a consort; and now, with great satisfaction, acquainted them, that, after the fullest information, and mature deliberation, he had formed a resolution to demand in marriage the princess Charlotte of Mecklenburg Strelitz; a princess distinguished by every eminent virtue, and amiable endowment; whose illustrious line had constantly shewn the firmest zeal for the protestant religion, and a particular attachment to his family (f).

This declaration, so agreeable to the council, was unanimously requested to be made public, for the satisfaction of the nation in general. The earl of Harcourt was appointed ambassador plenipotentiary to the court of Strelitz, to demand the princess, and to sign the contract of marriage. After a negociation, not very tedious, the royal yachts were prepared, under convoy of a large squadron, commanded by lord Anson, to conduct the future queen to England. In the mean time, her household being established, the ambassador proceeded to the continent on this important business. The duchesses of Ancaster and Hamilton, and the countess of Effingham were appointed ladies of the bed-chamber, to attend her from the court of Mecklenburgh in her passage to England; and, embarking at Harwich, the whole fleet set sail for Stade on the 8th of August. The contract of marriage being signed by the earl of Harcourt at Strelitz, her royal highness was complimented by the states of the country, and the deputies of the towns. The ambassador and the ladies were magnificently entertained; and the event was celebrated with the most splendid rejoicings.

On the 17th of that month, the princess, accompanied by the reigning duke her brother, set out for Mirow, (e) Mr. Onslow, speaker of the house of commons, having signified his intention to retire from business in consequence of age, infirmities, and other motives of a private nature, the house determined to bestow on him some signal tokens of their regard. Accordingly, they resolved, that the thanks of the house should be given to Mr. Speaker, for his faithful services, during the course of above thirty-three years, in five successive parliaments; for the unshaken integrity and steady impartiality of his conduct in the chair; and for the indefatigable pains he had, with uncommon abilities, constantly endeavoured to promote the honour and dignity of parliament, and to preserve inviolable the rights and privileges of the commons of Great Britain. The venerable patriot was so much affected by this proof of their esteem, that he could only answer in broken sentences, bursting unconnectedly from a heart whose sensations were too powerful for utterance. They also instantly resolved, that thanks should be given to Mr. Speaker for what he had now said: that an address should be presented to the king, humbly to beseech his majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to confer some signal mark of his royal favour upon the right honourable Arthur Onslow, Esq. for the great and eminent services he had rendered to his country for the space of thirty-three years. Upon this application the king expressed a proper sense of the speaker's great services and unblemished character; and gratified that gentleman with an annual pension of three thousand pounds, for his own life and that of his son; who was afterwards ennobled.

This session a new tax was imposed upon beer, which so exasperated the labouring classes of the people, that loud clamours were excited, particularly in the metropolis, where some publicans began to raise the price in consequence of this new impost; but as the publicans did not act in concert, those houses in which the attempt was made, were immediately abandoned by their customers. Menacing letters were sent to some individuals, who were supposed to have advised the new tax. The streets resounded with the noise of popular clamour and uproar; and it was some time before the price of strong beer could actually be raised to the consumer. In the fourth month of his reign, the king experienced the licentious spirit of the mob, by a riot when he was in Drury Lane playhouse. The people supposed lord Bute had advised the tax upon beer, and adopted this method of expressing their disapprobation.

(f) His majesty is said to have received the first intimation of the extraordinary qualities of the princess from the following letter, which she wrote to the king of Prussia on his entering the territories of her cousin, the duke of Mecklenburg Swerin, and which that monarch transmitted to his late majesty (George the Second) as a prodigy of patriotism and good sense in so young a princess:

"May it please your Majesty,

"I am at a loss whether I shall congratulate or condole with you on your late victory; since the same success that crowns you with laurels, has overspread the country of Mecklenburg with desolation. I know, Sire, that it seems unbecoming my sex, in this age of vicious refinement, to feel for one's country, to lament the horrors of war, or wish for the return of peace. I know you may think it more properly my province to study the arts of pleasing, or to turn my thoughts to subjects of a more domestic nature; but however unbecoming it may be in me, I cannot resist the desire of interceding for this unhappy people.

It was but a very few years ago that this territory wore the most pleasing appearance. The country was cultivated, the peasants looked chearful, and the towns abounded with riches and festivity. What an alteration at present from such a charming scene! I am not expert at description, nor can my fancy add any horrors to the picture; but sure, even conquerors themselves would weep at the hideous prospect now before me. The whole country, my dear country, lies one frightful waste, presenting only objects to excite terror, pity, and despair. The business of the husbandman and the shepherd is quite discontinued; the husbandman and the shepherd are become soldiers themselves, and help to ravage the soil they formerly occupied. The towns are inhabited only by old men, women, and children; perhaps here and there a warrior, by wounds or loss of limbs, rendered unfit for service, left at his door; his little children hang round him, ask a history of every wound, and grow themselves soldiers, before they find strength for the field. But this were nothing, did we not feel the alternate insolence of either army, as it happens to advance or retreat. It is impossible to express the confusion, which even those, who call themselves our friends, excite. Even those from whom we might expect redress, oppress us with new calamities. From your justice, therefore, it is that we hope for relief; to you even children and women may complain, whose humanity stoops to the meanest petition, and whose power is capable of repressing the greatest injustice.

I am, Sire, &c."

amidst the tears and prayers of all ranks of people. Next day she arrived at Parleberg, where the count de Gotter complimented her in the name of the king of Prussia. Thence she continued her journey by Lutzen to Gourde, and on the 22nd reached Stade, under a general discharge of cannon, and amidst the acclamations of the people. She was received by all the burgesses in arms: the whole town was illuminated: triumphal arches were erected: several of the principal ladies presented her with verses on her approaching nuptials; and the public approbation was expressed by every possible demonstration of joy. On the 23rd she embarked in the yatcht at Cuxhaven, where she was saluted by the British squadron assembled for her convoy. After a tedious voyage of ten days, during which the fleet had to encounter with three different storms, and was frequently in danger of being driven on the coast of Norway, the princess landed on the 7th of September, in the afternoon, at Harwich, where she was received by the mayor and aldermen in their formalities. She advanced with her attendants by the way of Colchester to Witham, where she obligingly gratified the curiosity of the people. In the mean time, the king being apprized by couriers of her arrival, dispatched his own coaches, with a party of horse-guards, who met her at Rumford, and conducted her to London, through innumerable crowds of people, assembled on the road. Their applause was signified in noisy acclamations, which attended her several miles. Thus accompanied, the princess proceeded to the garden-gate of the palace of St. James, where she was handed out of her coach by the duke of Devonshire, in quality of lord chamberlain. At the gate she was received by the duke of York, and in the garden she was met by the king himself, whose looks declared the transport of his joy. When she made her obeisance, he raised her by the hand, which he kissed, and then led her up stairs to the palace, where they dined together, with the whole royal family. At nine the nuptial ceremony was performed by Dr. Secker, archbishop of Canterbury, in the royal chapel, which had been magnificently decorated for the occasion.

The ceremony of the nuptials was soon succeeded by that of the coronation. Westminster Hall was prepared for the royal banquet, by removing the courts of judicature, boarding the floor, erecting canopies, and building three rows of galleries for the accommodation of the spectators. A platform was laid between the Hall and Westminster Abbey, where the king was actually crowned. All the houses and streets within sight of the procession were faced and crowded with benches and scaffolding, which extended on both sides within the abbey from the western entrance almost to the choir.

In the beginning of this year, 1761, the French king, in consequence of the losses he had sustained through the successes of the British in various parts of the globe, began to hint, by means of his ambassadors at different courts, his disposition to restore the peace of Europe, and affected a peculiar moderation with respect to Great Britain, provided she should appear to acquiesce in reasonable terms. In consequence of this intimation, the courts of Petersburg, Vienna, France, Sweden, and Poland, having made several declarations which were signed at Paris on the 25th of March, and delivered at London the 31st of the same month; the counter-declaration of Great Britain and Prussia appeared on the 3rd of April; and Augsburg was appointed for the place of congress, as being most conveniently situated for the several powers at war. Lord Egremont, lord Stormont, ambassador in Poland, and general Yorke, ambassador in Holland, were nominated plenipotentiaries for England; and the count de Choiseul was appointed on the part of France. The German war was referred to the negociators at Augsburg, but the limits of America were separately considered at London and Paris. For this purpose ministers were mutually sent from those courts; Mr. Stanley on the part of England, and M. de Bussy on that of France.

Notwithstanding the negociations for peace, the war in Germany was carried on with vigour. In the beginning of February prince Ferdinand assembled his army, and began his march towards Cassel, on the 18th of that month, the command of the vanguard being given to the marquis of Granby, who advanced to Kirkberg and Metz. In the mean time, the hereditary prince having received intelligence that the French garrison of Fritzlar was not prepared for defence, he marched thither with a few battalions, in the hope of carrying the place by a sudden assault, with musquetry only; but he was mistaken; for he met with such a warm reception, that he was under the necessity of waiting for the arrival of some artillery; when he commenced more vigorous operations, and the governor of the place was soon compelled to capitulate. In the interim, general Briedenback took possession of a large magazine at Rosenthal, and made an unsuccessful attempt upon Marpurg, in which he lost his life; but this place was afterwards abandoned by the French at the approach of the marquis of Granby, who took possession of it.

Prince Ferdinand now resolved to reduce Zeigenheim and Cassel, before the duke de Broglio should receive reinforcements, and these two places were accordingly invested; but they proceeded very slowly in their operations, and were several times repulsed by the sallies made by the garrison. By this time the duke de Broglio was joined by all the detachments he expected from the Lower Rhine, and advanced towards the army of the allies, now not sufficiently strong to meet him in the field. On the 21st of March, the detachment under the command of the hereditary prince was, in its march from Heimbach, encountered by a numerous body of the enemy, near Stangerode, in the neighbourhood of Gronberg. Two thousand of the allied army were either killed or taken, together with eighteen pair of colours, and twelve pieces of artillery. The allied army now broke up the blockade of Zeigenheim, which was followed by raising the siege of Cassel, after the trenches had been opened twenty-seven days. They then evacuated the whole country of Hesse, and retired behind the Dymel, falling back nearly to the quarters they possessed previous to this disastrous attack.

About the middle of May the hereditary prince of Brunswick, at the head of a separate corps, advanced to Nettolen, in the vicinity of Memster, with a view of making observations on another French army under the prince de Soubise's command. Soubise had by this time formed three different camps, one at Dusseldorp, another at Burich, and a third at Rees, though part of his forces still continued in cantonment. In the mean time the war was prosecuted by detached parties, and skirmishes took place with various success. The army of the duke de Broglio, having, about the close of June, crossed the Dymel, dislodged general Sporcken from his post on the left of that river, with the loss of eighteen hundred men taken prisoners, nineteen pieces of cannon, four hundred horses, and two hundred waggons. The French next took possession of Warbourg, Paderborn, and Dringlebroen; and, on the 2nd of July, compelled prince Ferdinand to pass the Lippe. These successes, however, were overbalanced by the atchievements of small parties of the allies, who, at different times, were dispatched to harrass the enemy in their motions, and cut off the convoys of provisions.

On the 13th of July, general Luckner, with a detachment, advanced to Salme, where the count de Chabot was posted with a strong body of horse and foot, which he attacked with such fury, that they were forced to repass the Lippe in haste, losing about two hundred men, and as many horses in their retreat. Other parties intercepted the French convoys near Cassel, and did much damage to the enemy, so that they resolved to unite their armies and give battle to prince Ferdinand. The armies formed their camp at Hohenover. On the 15th, the army of Soubise, having struck their tents, advanced on the left of the allies, and dislodged an advanced post of the allied army. In the evening of the same day, the enemy made a furious attack on a post assigned to the command of lord Granby, which was sustained with the most intrepid bravery and resolution till the arrival of Wutgenau, who advancing on his left, and charging them in flank, obliged them to retire into the woods. At three in the morning of the 16th, the whole French army advanced again to the attack on the side where Wutgenau was posted, and a terrible discharge of cannon and musquetry was maintained on both sides for five hours, during which the enemy was not able to gain one inch of ground. About nine prince Ferdinand received advice that Broglio's design was to cannonade lord Granby's camp, from an opposite eminence. Hereupon a body of troops received immediate orders to anticipate this operation by making a vigorous charge. They advanced accordingly with the greatest intrepidity, and attacked the enemy with so much fury, that the French were obliged to abandon the field. Their left, however, still maintained a severe cannonade; but were no sooner informed of their defeat on the right, than they desisted from the attack, and retreated in good order. During this action the French lost near five thousand sand men killed and taken, some colours, and a few pieces of artillery. Prince Ferdinand's loss did not exceed five hundred men. The two French generals, from some misunderstanding between them, now divided their armies: Broglio, with his division, marched towards Cassel, and Soubise retreated to Dortmund, and crossed the Roer, in order to secure a great number of barges then passing down the Rhine with provisions for his army. He did not, however, take this step, before he sent off two large detachments to reinforce Broglio. Nor did he continue any longer on the other side of the Roer, than was necessary to receive his provisions, when he repassed both that river and the Lippe, advancing as far as Dulmen. In the mean time Broglio penetrated still farther into the electorate of Hanover, took possession of Kester, and fortified the place.

The allied army being greatly inferior to the French, prince Ferdinand retired to Dumolt, and called in most of his detachments. The French encamped near him on the heights of Neim, and several skirmishes happened between the two armies, in one of which prince Henry, brother to the hereditary prince, was mortally wounded. During these transactions general Luckner gained a considerable advantage at Cassel. He attacked and routed a large body of the enemy, and took many prisoners, together with some horses, and a large quantity of ammunition. Nor did the French remain idle. Broglio, having crossed the Weser with his whole army, prince Ferdinand made a forced march, passed the Dymel, and advanced to Cassel. Broglio perceiving that he could not now advance to the city of Hanover, without bringing on a general engagement with the allied army, thought proper to retreat. Prince Ferdinand then proceeded to Paderborn, and established his head quarters at Buhne. The duke de Broglio, having re-crossed the Weser, encamped his army at Eimbeck, where he laid the whole country under contribution. Meanwhile Soubise erected his ovens at Dorsten, and garrisoned the place with one battalion, but the hereditary prince attacked and reduced the town. The garrison were made prisoners, the ovens demolished, and large quantities of provisions destroyed. Soubise now retreated to the other side of the Lippe; but soon after re-passed that river, and advanced to Coesfelt, ravaging the northern districts of the country.

In September a detachment from the army of Soubise, under the command of the count de Conflans, advanced to the gates of Embden, which was garrisoned by two companies of English invalids, who obtained an honourable capitulation, and embarked for Bremen. The French did not, however, continue long in the town: they laid the neighbouring country under contribution, and immediately evacuated the place. But the country people flew to arms, and sunk the pontoons, on which the enemy had passed the river, so that it was some time before the detachment could return to their camp. Another party entered the city of Osnaburg, and pillaged the place, the inhabitants not being in a condition to pay the enormous contributions demanded by the enemy. A third party made an attempt upon Bremen: but the inhabitants joining the garrison, the French were repulsed. In the beginning of November prince Ferdinand formed a plan for attacking marshal Broglio unexpectedly, before he could call in his detachments. That he might effect this, he ordered the hereditary prince and general Luckner, reinforced by the garrison of Wolfenbuttle, to advance from their respective posts, so as to be in the neighbourhood of Eimbeck by a certain hour on the 5th of November. He commanded the marquis of Granby to force the French post at Cappelnhagen on the 4th; to proceed next day to Wickensen, and block up a defile in that neighbourhood, on the road from Eschershausen to Eimbeck. On the 4th he crossed the river near Hastenbeck with the main body of his army, and advanced towards Eimbeck. When he approached Wickensen, he found part of his orders already executed, the road being occupied by a strong body of British grenadiers and highlanders; for the marquis of Granby had bravely forced the enemy's post at Cappelnhagen, and, by the hour appointed, blocked up the defile. In the mean time M. de Chabot finding he was intercepted, retreated towards Eschershausen, and struck into the road to Eimbeck, which general Hardenberg had been ordered to secure: but, unfortunately, some of that officer's pontoons were overturned, which retarded him so long, that he did not arrive at the place appointed till seven in the morning; by which time Chabot had passed the defile on his way to Eimbeck, which place he reached without farther interruption. Prince Ferdinand advanced towards the French camp, which he found too strong to be attacked with any probability of success. He therefore resolved to turn their flanks, as if he designed to cut off their communication with Göttingen, a motion which, he imagined, would either bring Broglio to an engagement on equal terms, or oblige him to retreat. He chose, however, the latter, and on the 9th the whole French army retired. After this no transaction of consequence happened in Germany. The duke de Broglio quartered his forces in and about Cassel; while those of Soubise were distributed at Dusseldorp and along the Lower Rhine. The allies fixed their quarters at Hildersham, Munster, Hamelen, and Eimbeck. The British cavalry wintered in East Friesland, and the infantry in the bishopric of Osnaburg.

In the course of this year several successful exploits were performed in the East and West-Indies. After the reduction of Pondicherry, an armament was equipped against the French settlement of Mahie, situated about thirty miles to the northward of Tillicherry on the Malabar coast. A body of forces for this expedition was embarked at Bombay, under the command of major Hector Monro, who obliged M. Loner, the French governor at Mahie, to surrender the place with all its dependencies in the beginning of February. But the French officers in the East-Indies interested in their cause Shah Zadeh, a prince of the Mogul empire, who, at the head of eighty thousand men, took the field against the East India company's forces, commanded by major John Charnock, and reinforced by the subahdar of Bengal. This army consisted of five hundred Europeans, two thousand five hundred sepoys, and twenty thousand black troops, with twelve pieces of cannon. Both armies advanced to the neighbourhood of Guya, where, on the 15th of January, the Mogul's troops were routed in a pitched battle. All their artillery was taken, together with part of their baggage, and a number of French officers.

In June, the island of Dominica, in the West Indies, was taken from the French, by a party of English forces under the command of lord Rollo, assisted by commodore sir James Douglas, with four ships of the line. The forts that had been damaged during the sieges were repaired, and every thing settled in a proper manner; after which lord Rollo and sir James Douglas bent their course towards Guadaloupe.

This year the English navy was remarkably successful; different engagements happened in various parts of the world, and many of the enemy's ships were taken. But the following is justly esteemed one of the most remarkable and gallant actions which distinguished this war: on the 10th of August, captain Faulkner, of the Bellona, a ship of the line, and the Brilliant, a frigate of thirty guns, sailed from the river Tagus in Portugal, for England; having on board a considerable sum of money for the merchants of London. On the 13th they descried, off Vigo, three sail of ships standing in for the land, one of the line of battle, and two frigates. When they perceived captain Faulkner, they bore down upon him till within the distance of seven miles, when they crowded all the sail they could and bore away. Captain Faulkner being now convinced of their size, and from the intelligence he had received, conjecturing that the large ship was the Courageaux, as it proved to be, he hoisted all the sail he could carry, and gave chase till sun-set, when one of the French frigates hauling out in the offing, captain Faulkener threw out a signal to the Brilliant to pursue in that direction. They were within sight of the enemy all night; but at sunrise had only gained two miles upon them in a chace of fourteen hours. The French commodore no longer declined the action: he made a siglal for his two frigates to close with and engage the Brilliant, and himself stood for the Bellona under his top-sails. The two large ships were equal in burthen, in number of guns and weight of metal. The crew of the Courageux amounted to seven hundred men, commanded by M. du Guy Lambert; but the Bellona's complement consisted only of five hundred and fifty men. The fire on both sides was reserved till they were within musquet shot of each other, when the engagement began with a terrible discharge of small arms and artillery. In less than nine minutes all the Bellona's braces, bowlings, shrouds, and rigging, were cut and shattered by the shot, and the mizen mast fell over the stern, with all the men on the round top, who nevertheless saved their lives by clambering into the port-holes of the gun room. Captain Faulkner

Faulkner now gave orders to board the Courageux, but the attempt was soon frustrated by the position of the two ships. The Bellona then, by the help of her studding sails, wore round upon the opposite quarter of the Courageux; and the officers and men flew to the guns on that side of the ship opposed to the enemy, from whence they poured in a most dreadful discharge, and maintained it without intermission for twenty minutes. The hull of the Courageux was greatly shattered, and her decks strewed with carnage. Her ensign was now hauled down, and the engagement ceased; but in a short time after a shot was fired from the lower tier of the Courageux; and the British seamen, without waiting for orders, ran to their quarters, and poured in two broadsides upon the enemy, who now called for quarter, which was immediately granted. The Bellona suffered extremely in her rigging, but very little in her hull, and the number of her killed and wounded did not exceed forty. The case was very different with the Courageux: nothing was left standing but her foremast and bowsprit; large breaches were made in her sides; her decks were torn up in several parts, many of her guns were dismounted; and her quarters filled with mangled bodies of the dying and the dead. Upwards of two hundred and twenty were killed, and half that number wounded. The prize was conducted safely into Lisbon (g).

A squadron was likewise equipped this year under the command of commodore Keppel, consisting of ten ships of the line, several frigates, two fire ships, and two bomb-ketches, besides transports. This armament was sent against Belleisle, the largest of the European islands belonging to the French king. The troops, under the command of major-general Hopson, consisted of ten battalions, some light troops of horse, and a detachment of artillery. The whole armament sailed from Spithead, on the 29th of March, and anchored in Belleisle road on the 7th of April. A feint was made to attack the citadel of Palais, while two large ships convoyed the troops to the landing place, and silenced a battery which the enemy had erected there. This attempt, however, did not succeed, and was attended with the loss of nearly five hundred men. It was some time before the weather would permit a second attack to be made. On the morning of the 22nd the following successful stratagem was adopted: the troops were disposed in the flat-bottomed boats, and rowed to different parts of the island, as if they intended to land in several places; by which means the enemy was obliged to divide his forces at random, not knowing where to expect the descent. In the mean time brigadier Lambert pitched upon the rocky point of Lomaria, where captain Paterson, at the head of Beauclerk's grenadiers, and captain Murray with a detachment of marines, climbed the precipice with amazing intrepidity, and sustained the fire of a strong body of the enemy, till they were supported by the rest of the troops, who joined as they landed, and the French were obliged to abandon their batteries: but this advantage was not gained without loss; forty men being killed, and many more wounded. The French governor, M. de St. Croix, finding that the English troops, to the number of about eight thousand had landed, recalled all his detachments, and prepared for a vigorous defence. After various skirmishes, a detachment of marines, supported by part of Loudoun's regiment, drove the French from the parapet, and took possession of the place. Five other redoubts were likewise quickly taken, and the enemy withdrew into the citadel, in which a breach was made by the 7th of June, when M. de St. Croix demanded a capitulation: this being granted upon very honourable terms, the citadel was taken possession of by Beauclerk's grenadiers.

While the war was thus raging in almost every part of the globe, and the French king losing ground in every quarter, it was intended to open a congress at Augsburg for a general peace; but in consequence of the politic prevarication of the French, and the interposition of the Spaniards, that intention was rendered abortive, and the congress never met. The Spanish ambassador was called upon to disavow the representation he had made, but in the written answer he returned, as authorized by the court of Madrid, he justified the step he had taken as agreeable to the sentiments of his master.

By reason of the partiality of the Spanish court, Mr. Pitt declared that a war with that country was absolutely necessary; and that we ought to consider the evasions of that court as a refusal of satisfaction, and that refusal as a declaration of war. He said, that, as an act of prudence, we ought to secure the first blow, and by that means deter, or disable Spain from affording protection to France; that their flota had not yet arrived, and that the taking of it would at once disable their hands and strengthen ours. The sentiments of most of the other ministers, on this occasion were different from those of Mr. Pitt; and on the division Mr. Pitt and lord Temple were the only persons in favour of an immediate declaration of war against Spain, upon which, having declared their reasons in writing, they resigned their employments. His majesty, the day following, in consideration of his eminent services, settled a pension of three thousand pounds per annum on Mr. Pitt for three lives, and at the same time his lady was made countess of Chatham in her own right.

A new parliament, having been summoned, met on the 3d of November, and, as no ministerial influence had been used in electing the members of which it was composed, it deserved the appellation of a free parliament. The king, being seated on the throne, commanded the attendance of the commons; to whom he signified his pleasure, by the mouth of the lord-chancellor, that they should return to their house, and choose a new speaker. Accordingly their choice fell upon sir John Cust, a gentleman of extensive knowledge and distinguished probity. His majesty, repairing again to the house of peers on the 6th, approved of their choice, and made an excellent speech (h) to the parliament.

After presenting their address, the commons proceeded to settle the supplies, which amounted to eighteen million, two hundred and twenty-nine thousand, one hundred and thirty-five pounds eighteen shillings and eleven pence halfpenny. But they had hardly settled this important measure, when advice arrived from the earl of Bristol, his majesty's ambassador at Madrid, importing, that having demanded a categorical declaration with respect to the part his catholic majesty intended to act in the disputes between the courts of London and Versailles, he had received at first a very evasive and unsatisfactory answer. He added, that on repeating his remonstrance, he was answered, that the Spanish monarch had already taken his measures in concert with the court of Versailles, and that war was at that moment declared against Great Britain; and therefore, that he might retire when he thought proper. Soon after the count de Fuentes, ambassador from Spain at the court of London, delivered to the earl of Egremont, who had succeeded Mr. Pitt as secretary of state for the southern department, a paper calculated for sowing jealousies, and fomenting divisions among the subjects of Great-Britain, and containing invectives against the late secretary.

In consequence of these measures, war was declared against Spain, on the 4th of January, 1762, letters of marque were issued, and preparations made to humble the pride and insolence of the Spanish monarch. On the 19th of the same month his majesty went to the house of peers and addressed the parliament in a speech, in which he expressed his reliance on the Divine blessing, on the justice of his cause, on the zealous and powerful assistance of his faithful subjects, and the concurrence of his allies: who must find themselves involved in the pernicious and extensive projects of his enemies. Addresses were then presented from both houses to his majesty, in which they assured him, in the most affectionate and loyal manner, that they would vigorously support the justice of his cause.

(g) The success of the Bellona was, in a great measure, owing to the bravery of captain Logie, who commanded the Brilliant, and resolved to amuse the French frigates in such a manner as to hinder either of them from assisting the Courageux. Accordingly he began the attack on the Malicieuse, but the other coming up immediately, he bore their whole fire all the time the great ships were engaged, and nearly an hour after she had struck her colours; when they both thought proper to seek for safety in flight, having suffered considerable damage in their masts and rigging.

(h) In this speech his majesty recommended an adequate and honourable provision for the support of the queen, in case she should survive him; and added, "that there never was a situation in which unanimity, firmness, and dispatch were more necessary for the safety, honour, and true interest of Great Britain." The house of commons instantly resolved, that if she should survive the king, she should enjoy a pension of one hundred thousand pounds per annum, together with the palace of Somerset House, and the lodge and lands at Richmond Park. An act was unanimously framed and passed to this effect; and, when it received the royal assent, the queen was in the house of lords, and testified her satisfaction and gratitude, by a graceful obeisance to the king.

A little before Mr. Pitt's resignation, he had determined to employ a considerable part of the British forces against the French colonies in the West-Indies: nor was this resolution merely speculative; a squadron was fitted out, and sailed from Spithead in the month of October the preceding year. This armament had under their convoy a number of transports, with four battalions from Belleisle to join at Barbadoes a strong body of forces from North America, together with some regiments and volunteers from Guadaloupe and the Leeward Islands, and proceed in concert with the fleet already on that station, and make a conquest of Martinico, which, since the attempt of general Hopson, had been strengthened with new fortifications, and a strong body of troops. The armament from North America and England, under the command of major-general Monckton and rear-admiral Rodney, amounting to eighteen battalions, and as many ships of the line, besides frigates, bombs, and fire-ships, having rendezvoused at Barbadoes, sailed from that place on the 5th of January, and on the 8th the fleet and transports anchored in St. Ann's Bay, on the eastern shore of Martinico, the men of war having first silenced some batteries which the enemy had erected on that part of the coast (i). General Monckton, not thinking this a proper place for disembarking, detached two brigades under brigadiers Haldimand and Grant, to the bay of Petite Anse, where the seamen and marines took a battery. These brigades were soon followed by the whole army, and the rest of the squadron; when some other batteries being silenced, general Monckton landed with the forces, on the 16th, in the neighbourhood of Cas des Navires, and having received a reinforcement of marines from the squadron, he determined to besiege the town of Fort Royal; but previous to this attempt he found it necessary to attack the heights of Garnier and Tortueson, which the enemy had fortified, and seemed resolved to defend to the last extremity. He therefore raised a battery to protect the passage of a ravine that separated him from those heights, and made dispositions for the attack, which began on the 24th of June. On the 28th the governor, perceiving the English were employed in erecting batteries on the heights which commanded the citadel, ordered the chamade to be beat, and surrendered by capitulation. On the 4th of February, the gate was delivered up to the victors, and next morning the garrison, amounting to eight hundred men marched out with the honours of war.

Upon the reduction of this important place, deputations were sent from different parts of the island, requesting a capitulation: but M. de la Touche, the governor-general, retired with his forces to St. Pierre, which he was resolute to defend to the last extremity. On the 7th, Pigeon Island, esteemed one of the best defences of the harbour, surrendered at the first summons. This conquest was obtained at the expence of about four hundred men, including a few officers, killed and wounded; but the loss of the enemy was more considerable. General Monckton was just setting out for the reduction of St. Pierre, when two deputies arrived from M. de la Touche, with proposals of capitulation signed. The English commander agreeing to the propositions, took possession of St. Pierre, and all the posts in that neighbourhood, on the 16th; while the French governor-general, with M. Rouille, the lieutenant-governor, the staff officers, and about three hundred and twenty grenadiers, were embarked for France, on board some transports (k).

The determination was now made to carry on the war against Spain in the West Indies. The Havannah, the center of their Indian commerce, was at this time strongly defended, and reckoned impregnable. Nineteen ships of the line, with many smaller vessels, were fitted out, under the command of admiral Pocock, and about ten thousand land forces under the earl of Albemarle. The admiral intended to have landed on the south side of the island of Cuba, with a view to fall in with the Spanish galleons; but that being over-ruled, the fleet continued on a course of seven hundred miles, in a very dangerous sea. The admiral had no pilot to direct him; but having an excellent chart of those seas taken by lord Anson, he depended on his own judgement, and dispatched a ship to make proper enquiries whether there was a probability of passing. On the return of that ship, the admiral ordered the fleet to weigh anchor, and continuing under way, in three divisions, consisting of the ships of the line, the frigates, and the transports, on the 9th of June they got out of these dangerous seas, and came within sight of St. Jago, on the eastern extremity of that island. From St. Jago the fleet continued their voyage to the Havannah; but here they found more difficulties to encounter than they had apprehended (l). These difficulties seemed insurmountable; and the admiral, in order to divert the attention of the enemy, bore away, with a large part of the fleet to the westward, where he seemed inclined to land; while commodore Keppel and captain Hervey landed the forces on the east of the harbour, without the loss of a man, although the Spaniards had a large fleet lying at anchor, which might have considerably annoyed them. The earl of Albemarle divided the army into eight brigades; one of which, under the command of general Elliot, was ordered to march up the country, in order to hinder supplies from being sent to the town, and to cover the siege in the rear. General Keppel and colonel Howe were ordered to make a diversion on the west of the town; while the earl of Albemarle, with the main body of the forces, attacked the Moro Castle, that being the grand object in view, because it defended the entrance to the harbour (m). The troops suffered innumerable troubles, but their courage and perseverance overcame all difficulties; for batteries were erected in the night on the rising grounds, to cover the approaches, and prepare the way for the reduction of the place. The Spaniards defended it with great bravery, and, for some time, the fire was equal on both sides. On the 29th of June, in the evening, they made a sally; but although they acted with great courage and resolution, they were obliged to retreat, with the loss of above three hundred men. All the batteries being now opened, the admiral ordered the Cambridge, the Dragon, and the Marlborough, to sail up to the fort, under the command of captain Hervey; and a dreadful firing began. The Spanish artillery was well conducted. As the Moro Castle was situated on a high rock, the ships could not, after seven hours firing, make the least impression on it. In the attempt the English lost one hundred and thirty men; for, besides the Moro Castle, they had another battery playing upon them from an opposite fort, which galled them excessively; so that they were obliged to retire, otherwise they would probably have been destroyed. So soon as the English men of war were gone to rejoin the fleet, the Spaniards turned their attention to the eastern part of the fort, and resolved to hold out to the last extremity; so that the English found the reduction of the place likely to be a work of time. An unforseen accident likewise tended to retard their operations; namely, the reduction of a battery, which took fire by the explosion of a mortar. Sickness also rendered many of the men incapable of acting, and the few who remained in health, were fatigued beyond description. Add to this, the want of fresh provisions, the heat of the climate, and the insupportable fatigue which both officers and men underwent, made many give themselves up to despair, and they died in consequence of their misery. They were, however, shortly after relieved by the arrival of two fleets, one from New York, and another from Jamaica, having on board a quantity of provisions necessary for their relief.

That no time might be lost, it was agreed that miners should be employed; but having a deep ditch to cross, it was with great difficulty they got over it, and entrenched themselves under a rock, where they were not perceived by the enemy. The governor of the Havannah, sensible that the English would make themselves masters of the Moro Castle, unless he could send reinforcements to it,

(i) In the course of this service the Raisonable, a ship of the line, was, by the ignorance of the pilot, run upon a reef of rocks, from whence she could not be got off; but the crew were happily saved, together with her stores and artillery.

(k) The surrender of Martinico was followed by that of all the dependent islands, by which the English became sole possessors of all the Caribbees, and held that chain of innumerable islands which form an immense bow, extending from the eastern point of Hispaniola almost as far as the continent of South America.

(l) The entrance to the harbour is extremely narrow, and upwards of half a mile in length, at the end of which is a large bason, where a thousand ships may ride in safety. On one side of the narrow passage is the Moro Castle, built for the defence of the place, and to prevent any ships from coming in but such as have passports. To the westward of the harbour stands the town strongly fortified with a parapet, redoubts, and bastions; the whole being surrounded by a ditch, and batteries erected in proper directions.

(m) There was no fresh water to be had; and as the British troops were obliged to cut their way through woods, and drag the cannon along with them, many of them died through the heat of the climate, and the fatigues they underwent in the service of their country.

ordered one thousand two hundred men to land and attack the English. Accordingly, these men attacked our forces in three different places, but with so little success, that upwards of four hundred were left dead on the field, and the rest, with difficulty, saved themselves by taking to their boats. On the 30th of July the marines blew up a part of the wall, by which a breach was made; and although it was small, yet the engineers were of opinion, that the army might attack it. The English troops then mounted the breach in good order, and the enemy became intimidated, above four hundred of them being killed, among whom was the marquis de Gonsales, the second in command, a brave officer, who died animating the soldiers to defend the place. The same fate attended Don Lewis de Velasco, the commander in chief, who, disdaining to ask quarter, fell by a promiscuous shot, whilst exhorting his troops to support the glory of the Spanish arms.

The English being now in possession of the fort, after a siege of forty-four days, turned their cannon against the town. The earl of Albemarle sent a message to the governor, desiring him to surrender, as it would be in vain to hold out any longer; but the governor refused to comply, declaring he would defend the place to the last extremity. The firing then recommenced on both sides; but in about six hours the enemy's artillery was silenced, and the north bastion of the city was nearly disabled. This gave another turn to affairs, white flags were displayed, and soon after a flag of truce was sent to the British head quarters with proposals for a capitulation (n). The terms, however, which the Spaniards transmitted were not agreed to, and hostilities recommenced. This produced the desired effect: the enemy receded from their proposals, and treated upon different terms. This important conquest had great effect on the Spanish power, and operated greatly against that nation.

Although the British arms had been so successful in the West Indies, they were no less triumphant over those of Spain in other parts of the world. A plan had been projected for making a descent on the island of Manilla in the Pacific Ocean; from which place two large ships were annually sent across the South Sea to Acapulco, one of the Mexican ports in North America: these were richly laden with spices, stuffs, jewels, and other rich merchandise of the East Indies. Part of the squadron commanded by vice-admiral Cornish, and a body of troops under brigadier-general sir William Draper, were destined for the expedition. The troops employed by the English on this occasion consisted of one regiment, with a company of royal artillery; some experienced officers from Madras, about thirty men of the company's artillery, six hundred sepoys, a company of Caffres, one of topazes, one of pioneers, and two companies of French deserters, with a few hundreds of lascars, for the use of the engineers. The preparations being completed, captain Grant was dispatched, in the Sea Horse, to the entrance of the Chinese Seas, with orders to intercept all vessels bound for the Manillas, that the Spaniards might not be apprized of their design. On the 23rd of September, the British ships anchored in the bay of Manilla, where the enemy was but ill prepared for a defence, and greatly alarmed at their unexpected visit. The governor was the archbishop, who assumes the title of captain-general of the Philippine Islands; but the garrison, consisting of eight hundred men, was commanded by the marquis de Villa Medina, who now reinforced it with ten thousand undisciplined Indians, from the province of Pamgana. The admiral immediately made the proper dispositions for landing the troops. The three frigates, Argo, Sea Horse, and Seaford, were stationed near the shore, to cover the descent, three divisions were put on board the boats of the fleet, and soon landed at the church and village of Malata. The enemy assembled in great numbers to oppose the descent; but the frigates kept such a constant fire of cannon and small arms, that they soon dispersed, and sought their safety in a precipitate flight; the troops were therefore disembarked without the loss of a man. The day following, the general took possession of the Polverista, a small fort which the Spaniards had deserted. The curate's dwelling house formed the head quarters, and was guarded by the seventy-ninth regiment. The church of the Hermitage was occupied by colonel Monson, with an advanced party of two hundred men. The marines were left at the Malata, in the neighbourhood of the Polverista, to secure the communication with the fleet, and protect the stores and artillery. A body of men in the mean time approached within a hundred yards of the town, and took possession of the church of St. Jago, which they maintained, notwithstanding the fire of the enemy; and the admiral landed a battalion of seamen. The Spaniards were not inactive on this occasion: they determined, if possible, to hinder the destruction of their city; therefore they sent four hundred troops under the chevalier Fayette, with two field-pieces, on the right of the English advanced post, the flank of which they began to cannonade; but their attempt was soon frustrated: colonel Monson, at the head of the piquets, and a small reinforcement of marines, attacked them with such fury, that they retreated with precipitation, leaving one of their field pieces behind them. The English general, from the smallness of his army, was obliged to confine his operations to one part of the town, which he resolved to attack in the front. A detachment under captain Fletcher happily passed a ditch, with the loss of only three men, though exposed to the whole fire of the enemy. The bombardment now began, and continued day and night without intermission, and on the 29th, the admiral ordered the Elizabeth and Falmouth to lie as near the city as the depth of water would permit, and enfilade the enemy's front, in order to second the operations of the besiegers. The task was executed with intrepidity, and the inhabitants thrown into the utmost confusion. In the beginning of October, the weather grew stormy and tempestuous, but did not hinder the besiegers from carrying on their works with ardour. A furious sally was made from the town, on the 4th, before day-break, in which the regular troops of the fort were reinforced by a considerable body of the native Indians, armed only with bows and lances, who fought with astonishing perseverance; advancing even to the muzzles of the English muskets, and with savage ferocity, biting the bayonets, when they experienced the agonies of death. They were, however, repulsed with great loss; and the works having sustained considerable damage, it was resolved to storm the town. The governor, with the principal magistrates, withdrew into the citadel, and the town was exposed for some hours to all the horrors of a pillage. At length, the citadel being in no condition of defence, the marquis de Villa Medina, the archbishop of Manilla, and the officers of the garrison, surrendered themselves prisoners of war. The Spanish officers, on giving their parole of honour, were enlarged, and all the Indians dismissed with safety. This important conquest cost the English only one hundred men, including officers. By the capitulation it was agreed, that the town and ports of Cavite, with the islands and ports depending upon Manilla, were to be delivered up to his Britannic majesty; and four millions of dollars paid as a ransom for the city of Manilla, and the effects of the inhabitants, who, in return, were to be protected in their religion and private property (o). The fleet, which also fell into the power of England, consisted of nine ships of the line, and four frigates. The garrison was allowed the honours of war, and a safe conveyance to Spain.

While the siege was carrying on, some intercepted letters to the Spanish governor were procured by admiral Cornish, which informed him, that the galleon, St. Philippina, was arrived from Acapulco at Cayjaygan; he therefore resolved to dispatch some vessels, in quest of her. The Panther man of war, and Argo frigate, were accordingly sent on this service; and on the 30th of October, being off the island of Capul, they discerned a sail standing to the northward. The Panther was driven by the current among the Narangoes, and obliged to drop anchor, but the frigate continued the chace, and came up with and engaged her for near two hours, during which her (n) By the capitulation, which was signed on the 13th of August, the inhabitants were secured in the enjoyment of their own laws, religion, and private property; and on the following day the English took possession of this important conquest. The Spanish garrison, which was reduced to about seven hundred men, including officers, were permitted to march out with the honours of war; and it was stipulated that they and the sailors should be conveyed to Old Spain. About five hundred of the British troops, including fifteen officers, were killed, or died of their wounds, during the progress of this siege; and seven hundred were carried off by disease. The conquerors found great quantities of artillery, small arms, ammunition, and warlike stores. Twelve ships of the line, two upon the stocks, and several trading vessels also fell into the hands of the English. They also acquired to the amount of three millions sterling in silver, tobacco, and valuable merchandize, collected on his Catholic majesty's account.

(o) The English had scarcely men sufficient to garrison their conquests.

rigging suffered greatly, and obliged the captain to give over the attack till it could be repaired. In the mean time the Panther got under sail again, and in her turn engaged the enemy, who soon after surrendered; but instead of the St. Philippina, the prize proved to be the Santa Trinidada, pierced for sixty guns, which had departed from Manilla for Acapulco, on the first of August; but meeting with stormy weather, in which she was dismasted, had been obliged to put back and refit (p).

The kingdom of Portugal being in a defensive alliance with Great Britain, was, in consequence of the war, exposed to invasion both from France and Spain, those powers having presented a joint memorial by their ambassadors at the court of Lisbon to the Portuguese ministry, exclaiming against the conduct of Great Britain, and exhorting the court of Portugal to take part with them against its ally. But notwithstanding the extraordinary memorial, the firmness of his Portuguese majesty compelled him to answer this insulting proposition with a moderate but intrepid resolution. He observed, "That the ties which equally united him to Great Britain, and the crowns of France and Spain, rendered him a proper mediator to each party, and consequently it was improper for him to declare himself an enemy to either: that his alliance with England was ancient, and consequently incapable of giving offence at this juncture: that it was merely defensive, and therefore innocent: that the late calamities of Portugal had rendered her incapable of taking part in any offensive war, into which neither the love his most faithful majesty bore his subjects as a father, nor the duty by which he was bound to them as a king, could suffer him to plunge them." This moderate answer, however, was not satisfactory to the princes of the Bourbon family. They denied that the alliance with England was either purely defensive, or innocent; adding, that if the king of Portugal did not comply with their requisitions, that Spanish troops should enter his country, seize his forts, and shut them up; and declared that no choice was therefore left to his majesty, but that of receiving them as friends, or treating them as enemies. But this insulting treatment neither diverted his Portuguese majesty from his resolution, nor provoked him to depart from his moderate language. He declared he would keep his treaties with England inviolate, and asserted they were such as the law of God, of nature, and of nations had always deemed innocent; and protested, that if the troops of France and Spain should enter his dominions, he would in defence of his neutrality, repulse them with all his forces, joined by those of his allies. On receiving his Portuguese majesty's final resolution, the ambassadors of the two crowns demanded passports, which being granted, they set out for their respective courts; and France and Spain, in the month of June, published a joint declaration of war against that kingdom. In the mean time about eight thousand troops, with large supplies of stores and ammunition, arrived in Portugal from England. The command of the Portuguese army had been conferred upon the count de Lippe Buckebourg, an officer of abilities, who, during the whole course of the war, had directed the British artillery in Germany. The English forces were conducted by lord Tyrawley and the earl of Loudon, assisted by several officers of experience. These forces had not been long in Portugal before lord Tyrawley, disgusted at the behaviour of the court of Lisbon, requested to be recalled: his request was granted, and the earl of Loudon succeeded to the chief command.

In the month of May this year, M. de Ternay sailed from Brest with a squadron under his command, and escaped the vigilance of sir Edward Hawke, who was sent with seven ships of the line and two frigates to intercept him; but the destination of Ternay was not even conjectured. Sir Edward Hawke returned to the channel, and De Ternay pursued his course to Newfoundland, where, on the 24th of June, he landed some troops in the Bay of Bulls, with which he advanced to the town of St. John's, which not being in a posture of defence, was obliged to surrender. But the triumph of the French was of short duration; for sir Jeffrey Amherst and lord Colville, who commanded by land and sea in North America, were no sooner informed of this loss than the latter sailed from Halifax, and blocked up the harbour. Colonel Amherst soon after followed him with eight hundred men, which were landed after a slight opposition. On the 16th of September, colonel Amherst took post in the neighbourhood of St. John's, and after a short time the French capitulated, on condition that himself and the garrison should be conveyed to France by the first opportunity, which was accordingly done. M. de Ternay escaped with the whole of his fleet.

On the resignation of Mr. Pitt, the direction of affairs in Great Britain was vested wholly in the earl of Bute, who enjoyed the entire confidence and esteem of his sovereign. The duke of Newcastle, who still held the office of first commissioner of the treasury, received an intimation in May 1762, that his resignation was expected; when he was also informed, that the king intended to grant him an adequate pension, in consideration of his past services: but the duke nobly replied, that, "if he could no longer be permitted to serve his country, he was at least determined not to be a burthen to it." The dismission of this nobleman, who had always been distinguished for his zeal and attachment to the Hanoverian line, and had injured his fortune in defending it, excited great disgust in the Whig party; who thought it ungrateful to discharge an old and faithful servant, though his talents were not above mediocrity. The duke of Devonshire indignantly resigned his office of lord chamberlain, and was struck out of the list of the privy council. The earl of Hardwicke retired; the duke of Grafton, and the lords Ravensworth, and Ashburnham now appeared on the side of opposition. Mr. George Grenville was appointed secretary of state, as successor to the earl of Bute; and many other singular promotions took place.

On the 12th of August, this year, the prince of Wales was born. On the 17th he was created Prince of Wales, and on the 12th of September he was baptized, and named George Augustus Frederic. The first grand object of the new minister, now honoured by a flattering association with the duke of York, with the order of the garter, after his open assumption of the office and authority of premier, was the restoration of a peace; a design which was attended with some difficulty. The majority of the nation wished for the continuance of war, in the expectation of new victories. It may be necessary, however, to remark, that the earl of Bute had given great disgust by the general tenor of his conduct, his precipitate measures of expelling the members of the old administration, and intruding himself and his partizans into all the efficient offices of government.

It is necesssary now to direct our attention to the affairs of the war in Germany. Before the allied armies had commenced their operations, a detachment of four thousand men was sent from the French garrison of Gottingen, to surprize the east chain of the allied cantonments; the plan was rendered abortive by the retreat of the troops; in consequence of which the French only made a small impression upon their rear. Prince Ferdinand, to prevent a similar attempt, sent three thousand men to take post at Embeck, which effectually answered the intended purpose. On the other hand general Luckner, who had made several successful incursions into the country possessed by the enemy, obtained a considerable advantage over the marquis de Lortange, who had marched out of Gottingen, at the head of eighteen hundred horse, and two thousand infantry, to intercept Luckner; but the latter falling unexpectedly on the marquis, obliged him to retire, with considerable loss, to Gottingen. About the same time, a party of French irregulars were made prisoners at Eichffeld, by major Wingerode, commander of the Hessian hussars.

The castle of Roer, which had been occupied for some time by the French, was besieged in April by the hereditary prince of Brunswick. His batteries had hardly began to play when the fort was set on fire. Every method was pursued by M. de Muret, who commanded in the castle, to stop the progress of the flames, which being unable to effect, he was obliged, with his whole garrison of two hundred and thirty men, to leap over the walls and surrender at discretion.

On the 24th of June, prince Ferdinand made dispositions for attacking the French camp, between Grœbenstein and Meinbrexen. That he might execute this plan with success, general Luckner quitted his camp on the morning of the 23rd, crossed the Weser, and early the next morning arrived between Mariendorff and Undenhausen. General Sporcken passed the Dymel at Siemel, at the head of twelve Hanoverian battalions, and part of the cavalry of the left wing, in order to engage the enemy's flank, while Luckner attacked them in the rear. Prince Ferdinand passed the river at the head of twelve British battalions, eleven battalions of the Brunswick troops, eight regiments of Hessians, the English cavalry, and part of the German horse of the left wing. On gaining the bank on the opposite side, he drew up his forces in order of battle behind the ponds of Kalse. All the preparations were conducted with such judgement, that the French were attacked with the utmost impetuosity in front, flank, and rear, before they were aware of the approach of the allied army. Terrified at this unexpected assault, a precipitate retreat soon followed, and would probably have ended in a total defeat of the whole army, had not M. de Stainville, at the head of a chosen body of troops, thrown himself into the woods of Willemstahl, where he made a noble stand, and covered the retreat of the French marshals, who retired in confusion, under the cannon of Cassel. Stainville was attacked by lord Granby with his usual impetuosity, and the whole body, except two battalions were either killed or taken; the prisoners amounting to two thousand five hundred and fifty men.

(p) The merchandize on board this Manilla ship was estimated at one million and a half of dollars, (which, at four shillings and six-pence each, amounted to three hundred and thirty-seven thousand five hundred pounds sterling,) and the whole cargo was supposed to be worth double that sum. The Santa Trinidada was not the only valuable prize taken from the enemy in the course of the present year: the Hermione, a Spanish register ship, bound from Lima to Cadiz, laden with treasure and valuable effects, was captured in May by two English frigates, which were on a cruise off Cape St. Vincent. She was carried into Gibraltar, and afterwards brought to England. Her cargo was estimated at one million sterling.

Prince Ferdinand then attempted to cut off the communication of the French from Frankfort, while they continued in their strong camp at Cassel. This communication was preserved by M. Rochambeau, who, at the head of a body of horse and some brigades of infantry, possessed a strong post near Hamburgh. The marquis of Granby and lord Frederick Cavendish advanced, with a considerable detachment, to dislodge them. At their approach the enemy began to retreat, upon which the marquis ordered his horse to attack them in the rear. In performing this service they were in imminent danger of being overpowered by the French cavalry, who, suddenly facing about, attacked them sword in hand; but the infantry coming to their assistance, the enemy were obliged to fly in their turn, and it was with the utmost difficulty they effected a retreat.

Prince Ferdinand then resolved to attack the French, who had withdrawn to their camp at Mulsengen, in order to maintain their communication with Franckfort, and facilitate their junction with the prince of Condé, who had received orders to advance from the Lower Rhine. On the 25th of July, Ferdinand crossed the Eder, and joined the marquis of Granby on the heights of Falkenberg, after which he reconnoitered the enemy's situation, when he perceived there was no probability of engaging them with success: and having cannonaded their camp, he re-crossed the Eder, leaving the marquis of Granby on the heights of Falkenberg. The French now crossed the Fulda, and retired to Cassel, having left a body of troops under M. de Guerchy, opposite the camp they abandoned: at the same time the marquis of Granby took possession of Mulsengen, and again cut off the enemy's communication with Franckfort. A body of their dragoons advancing towards Ruthenburn, fell into an ambuscade at Morschen, and were entirely routed. This was followed by the loss of Gottingen, which place they relinquished, after having destroyed the fortifications. The French now secured themselves in a strong camp on the banks of the Fulda, whence they dispatched orders to the prince of Condé to hasten to their relief. That general began his march from Coesfeldt on the 16th of July, and passed the Lippe at Halderen. He was followed by the hereditary prince, at the head of a strong detachment from the allied army: who being informed, that a large body of the enemy were on their march to meet the prince of Condé, he resolved to attack them before their arrival. In the beginning of this action, the French were driven from the heights into the plain; but while the troops were pursuing their advantage, the main army of the enemy arrived. Such a powerful reinforcement turned the balance in their favour. The allies were totally defeated, having lost upwards of three thousand men. To add to the misfortune, the hereditary prince received a wound from a musquet ball in his hip-bone, by which his life was long in danger. From their victory, however, the French acquired no advantage.

That part of the French army which was commanded by generals de Castries and Saarsfelt being posted on the side of the Ohme, and opposite to them a strong detachment under the marquis of Granby, and general Zastrow on the other, a furious cannonade succeeded. The castle of Ameneburg, in the neighbourhood of the allies, was furnished with a garrison of seven hundred men, under captain Cruse. This fortress the enemy resolved to make themselves masters of; but, to conceal their intention, they attacked a post of the allies called Bruckermulk, which defended the passage of a bridge over the Ohme. After an obstinate engagement, darkness terminated the dispute, the French having sustained a loss of upwards of a thousand men, and the allies near six hundred. A few days after this action, prince Ferdinand invested Cassel; and notwithstanding the resolution of a numerous garrison, commanded by baron Diesbach, the operations were carried on with remarkable vigour, so that on the 10th of October the city capitulated. This was the last action between the French and the allies in Germany. Prince Ferdinand, indeed, was preparing to besiege Ziegenheim, the only place now possessed by the French in Hesse; but before he could carry his design into execution, the preliminaries of peace were signed between France and England, at Fontainebleau; in consequence of which a cessation of arms took place between the two armies.

Preliminaries of peace being signed, and the definitive treaty in an advanced stage, the parliament was convened and assembled on the 25th of November, when his majesty opened the session with a speech from the throne; in which he observed, that nothing was more desirable to him than a permanent peace, procured him on such honourable terms as would secure the happiness of his people. For that purpose, he had condescended to renew the negociation that had been broken off before: and he mentioned the conduct of his army and navy in the highest terms of approbation. He observed, that he had been obliged to send an armed force to support his good ally the king of Portugal, who was threatened by the whole Spanish army, in consequence of the intrigues of the French. He concluded by assuring them, that nothing gave him so much unhappiness, as the consideration that his subjects were burthened with heavy taxes; but there was a necessity for it, as it would otherwise have been impossible to have defeated the enemy's schemes, and render their undertakings abortive. He desired the commons to consider of such methods, in the settlement of the new acquisitions as should tend to the security of those countries, and to the improvement of the British trade and navigation. He recommended to their care and attention his gallant subjects, by whom these acquisitions were obtained. He observed, that union at home was necessary to lay the foundation of that œconomy which they owed to themselves and their posterity, and which alone could relieve the nation from the heavy burthens entailed upon it by the necessities of a long and expensive war. In answer to this speech, addresses were presented by both houses, containing general compliments upon the approach of peace, as well as upon the birth of the prince of Wales. The next day a cessation of arms was proclaimed; and orders were issued for opening again all the channels of communication with the powers we had been at war with.

But the preliminaries of peace were severely scrutinized by the parliament; though they were at length approved by a majority in both houses, and each presented an address to the king on the occasion; in which they declared, "That they owed the utmost gratitude to his majesty for the re-establishment of the public tranquillity upon terms of honour to the crown, and of advantage to the people (q)."

In speaking of the affairs of this year, it may be necessary just to mention that on the 5th of January, died Elizabeth empress of Russia; she was succeeded by Peter III. who, from motives of jealousy, had been kept at a distance from court. His understanding was below mediocrity, and his disposition indolent; but, having formed a friendly attachment to the king of Prussia, he negociated and concluded a treaty of peace and friendly alliance with that sovereign; in consequence of which, the army under Czernichef, consisting of twenty thousand men, was transferred to the service of Frederick. The feeble character of the emperor rendered him highly unpopular, and ambition stimulated Catharine, his consort, to a vigorous exertion of authority. A conspiracy was formed against him; he was deposed, signed an abject instrument of abdication; was imprisoned, insulted, neglected; and, at length, an uncontradicted report declared him to have been privately assassinated.

(q) When an address to his majesty on occasion of the peace, came under the consideration of the house of commons, Mr. Pitt declared his entire disapprobation of the tenor of the treaty, as derogatory to the honour and interests of the kingdom. "He was determined," he said, "afflicted as he was with illness, at the hazard of his life to attend the house that day, to raise up his voice, his hand, and his arm against the preliminary articles of the treaty, which obscured all the glories of the war, surrendered the dearest interests of the nation, and sacrificed the public faith, by abandoning our allies." But in the house of lords the minister himself vindicated the treaty with great energy and spirit, and concluded his harangue in the following impressive terms: "That he wished no other epitaph to be inscribed on his tomb, than that he was the adviser of the peace, on the merits of which they were called upon to decide."

A bill being brought into parliament for a duty upon cyder, the clamour against it became extremely violent and general. The city of London presented a petition against it at the bar of the house of commons; but the bill passed both houses by considerable majorities. In the cyder counties the measure was held in such abhorrence, that it was found extremely difficult to enforce the odious impost.

But no sooner was this favourite measure carried into execution, than the kingdom received the astonishing intelligence of the resignation of the minister, who after having vaunted of restoring peace to the world, was now determined, by retiring "to the blessings of the life he loved," to manifest that ministerial greatness had no charms for him (r).

The British cabinet, already extremely weak, was now further enfeebled by the death of lord Egremont, whose abilities and interest gave weight to the measures which he generally adopted.

The definitive treaty of peace was signed at Paris on the 10th of February, 1763; and being transmitted to England was speedily laid before the parliament. The articles of the treaty, like those of the preliminaries, occasioned vehement debates in both houses, where, after a variety of arguments on each side, the question being put, it was carried in the affirmative by a considerable majority (s). And on the 22nd of March peace was proclaimed in London, with the accustomed ceremonies.

On the establishment of peace, the ministry came to a resolution of avoiding taxation as much as the public service could possibly admit. The supplies were to be raised, first, by taking two millions of the sinking fund; secondly, by striking one million eight hundred thousand pounds in exchequer bills; thirdly, by borrowing two millions eight hundred thousand pounds on annuities; and, lastly, by two lotteries, for three hundred and fifty thousand pounds each. To pay the interest of these loans, an additional duty was imposed upon all wines of the growth of France, and in an inferior degree on all other wines. Thus far the scheme seemed unexceptionable; but another duty was added, which excited a ferment in the nation; viz. four shillings per hogshead upon cyder, to be paid by the maker, collected by the officers, and subjected to all the laws of excise. The chiefs of the opposition differed in opinion from the treasury upon every particular in this impost. But, after a violent debate, the question was put, and carried in the affirmative by a very considerable majority. In the upper house the bill was also strongly opposed; but the ministry carried their point, and the bill received the royal assent.

On the 18th of April two ambassadors extraordinary from the republic of Venice made their public entry into London, in a very splendid and pompous manner; and on the subsequent day, the king went to the house of peers, and having given the royal assent to several bills, he prorogued the parliament with a speech from the throne, in which he expressed his thanks for the zeal and dispatch they had manifested in their proceedings.

We have to remark, that the rage of party was at this time more inflamed than ever; and the press teemed with political pamphlets on both sides, couched in terms of the utmost virulence and abuse. Of these the ministry seemed totally regardless, till the appearance of the forty-fifth number of the North Briton. A rule for an information was now granted by the court of King's Bench against the authors, printers, and publishers of that paper, which contained a severe commentary on the king's speech at the close of the session of parliament on the 19th of April. John Wilkes, Esq. member of Aylesbury in Buckinghamshire, was the supposed author of this performance. A warrant was therefore issued by the secretary of state for taking Mr. Wilkes, together with the printer and publisher, into custody. Accordingly, late at night, on the 29th of April, the messengers repaired to Mr. Wilkes's house for that purpose. On their entrance he excepted to the generality of the warrant (t), as his name was not mentioned in it, and threatened the first who should offer violence to his person in his own house, at that unseasonable hour of the night, upon any pretended verbal order which they might, or might not, have received for that purpose. The messengers therefore thought proper to retire, and defer the execution of their warrant till next morning, when they took him into custody, and conducted him to the office of the secretary of state for examination. On the intimation of this event, application was made in the court of Common Pleas, then sitting in Westminster Hall, for a Habeas Corpus, which was granted; though by reason of the prothonotary's office not being open, it could not be served till four o'clock in the afternoon. In the interim several gentlemen applied for admittance to him; which was refused, on pretence of an order from the secretary of state, which order was never produced; and though it was well known that the court of Common Pleas had granted a Habeas Corpus, and Philip Carteret Webb, Esq. was assured of the fact, Mr. Wilkes was committed to the Tower, where many of his friends were also refused admittance to him. On the 3rd of May he was brought to the bar of the court of Common Pleas, where he addressed himself to the judges on the illegality and hardships of his commitment in a very animated speech. The case was then argued by eminent lawyers on both sides; but the court, after making a polite excuse to Mr. Wilkes for the delay, (requiring further time to consider of the affair,) remanded him to the Tower till the 6th, with orders that his friends and lawyers should have free access to him. In the mean time orders were given, that Mr. Wilkes should no longer continue colonel of the militia for the county of Buckingham. On the day appointed, Mr. Wilkes was again brought to Westminster Hall, when, after another spirited address to the court, lord chief justice Pratt, a firm and invariable friend to constitutional liberty, proceeded to give his opinion on the three following points, viz. The legality of Mr. Wilkes's commitment; the necessity for a specification of those particular passages in No. 45 of the North Briton which had been deemed a libel; and his privilege as a member of parliament (u). These points were discussed by his lordship in a manner which

(r) The principal cause of his resignation, was the want of support in the cabinet. In a private letter to a friend, he thus relates the real motives of his conduct. "Single, in a cabinet of my own forming; no aid in the house of lords to support me, except two peers (lords Denbigh and Pomfret;) both the secretaries of state silent, and the lord chief justice, whom I myself brought into office, voting for me, yet speaking against me; the ground I tread upon so hollow, that I am afraid, not only of falling myself, but of involving my royal master in my ruin. It is time for me to retire!" Adolphus's History.

(s) By the treaty, which was now the subject of animadversion, Canada, Nova Scotia, and the island of Cape Breton were ceded to Great Britain; the river Mississippi constituted the boundary between the British and French colonies in North America; and in the West Indies, the king of Great Britain yielded to the French the conquered islands of Martinico and Guadaloupe, with their dependencies. The island of Belleisle was given in exchange for Minorca; and the Grenades, with the other islands depending on them, were ceded to Britain. All the British conquests on the river Senegal were confirmed to England: with respect to the East Indies, the French settlements were partly restored, and partly retained. The French were obliged to restore such places as they had taken possession of in Germany; and in consequence of the king of Spain's abandoning all pretensions to Florida, and ceding it to the English, the Havannah, with the whole island of Cuba, were to be restored. The king of Prussia, and the empress queen were to remain in the same condition they were in before the commencement of the war.

(t) Copy of the warrant to take Mr. Wilkes into custody.

Charles Earl of Egremont, and George Dunk, Earl of Halifax, Lords of his Majesty's most honourable Privy Council, and principal Secretaries of State.

"These are, in his majesty's name, to authorize and require you to receive into your custody the body of John Wilkes, Esq.; herewith sent you, for being the author and publisher of a most infamous and seditious libel, entitled the North Briton, No. XLV. tending to inflame the minds and alienate the affections of the people from his majesty, and to excite them to traitorous insurrections against the government. And to keep him safe and close until he shall be delivered by due course of law, and in so doing this shall be your warrant. Given at St. James's, the thirtieth of April, 1763, in the third year of his majesty's reign.

(Signed) "EGREMONT. L. S.
"DUNK HALIFAX. L. S."

(u) Lord chief justice Pratt declared afterwards, in his judicial capacity, which greatly redounds to his honour: and his opinion having met with the approbation of the court, Mr. Wilkes was discharged. But before he had quitted the court, a gentleman of eminence in the law, stood up, and informed the lord chief justice, that he had just received a note from the attorney and solicitor-general, to desire his lordship would detain Mr. Wilkes till their arrival, as they had something to offer against his plea of privilege. This request, however, was not complied with; and Mr. Wilkes was discharged.

Shortly after Mr. Wilkes had been released from the Tower, he erected a printing press in his house in Great George Street, Westminster, and advertised the proceedings of the administration, with all the original papers; and the North Briton was re-published. In the interim an information was filed against him in the court of King's Bench, at his majesty's suit, as being the author of the North Briton, No. 45; and on the meeting of parliament, a message was sent to the house of commons with the information his majesty had received, that John Wilkes, esq. a member of that house, was the author of a most seditious and dangerous libel. The examinations and proofs of the said libel, together with the measures that had been taken thereon, were also laid before the house: in consequence of which, the North Briton, No. 45, was adjudged a false, scandalous, and seditious libel, and ordered to be burned by the hands of the common hangman (v).

Mr. Wilkes also made a formal complaint to the house of commons concerning a breach of their privilege, by the imprisonment of his person, the plundering of his house, the seizing of his papers, and the serving him with a subpœna upon an information in the court of King's Bench, &c. He likewise commenced an action against Robert Wood, esquire, under secretary of state, for seizing his papers. The cause was tried on the 6th of December, before lord chief justice Pratt, and a special jury; when, after a hearing of nearly fifteen hours, the jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff with one thousand pounds damages, and full costs of suit (w). Previous to this, a complaint had been exhibited against Mr. Wilkes in the house of lords, for affixing the name of a member of that house to a book entitled, "An Essay on Woman;" which book was publicly produced, to the utter confusion and eternal disgrace of every person concerned in it; but Mr. Wilkes could not prefer his answer, being then indisposed, in consequence of a wound he had received in a duel with Samuel Martin, esquire, late secretary of the treasury; who, thinking himself grossly insulted in the North Briton, and, presuming Mr. Wilkes was the author of that abuse, he sent him a challenge, which being readily accepted by Mr. Wilkes, he received a dangerous wound in the belly; of which he sent immediate notice to the house of commons, who thereupon allowed time for his appearance, and afterwards, on the report of his physician and surgeon, enlarged it: but at length, suspecting some collusion between him and them, on the 16th of December, they ordered Dr. Heberden and Mr. Hawkins to attend him, that they might observe the progress of his cure, and make a report of it to the house. This being made known to Mr. Wilkes by his physician, he sent cards to the two gentlemen appointed to attend him, expressing his just sense of the care of the house for his speedy recovery, but at the same time intimated his perfect reliance on the gentlemen to whom he had committed his case, and assured them, that though he did not wish to see them at present, he was impatient for an opportunity of shewing the just regard he would ever pay to distinguished merit. Eight days after, Mr. Wilkes set out for France on a visit to his daughter, who was very ill at Paris.

The commons afterwards expelled Mr. Wilkes, for a contempt of their authority, and publishing the North Briton; it being adjudged an infamous libel. His trial came on in February, in the court of King's Bench, before lord chief justice Mansfield, for reprinting and publishing the North Briton, No. 45, at his own house: of which publication he was found guilty; as he was afterwards for printing and publishing a most obscene and blasphemous pamphlet, entitled, "An Essay on Woman, with Remarks," to which the name of Warburton, a right reverend prelate, had been scurrilously affixed. Mr. Kidgell, chaplain to lord March, clandestinely procured a sheet of this work, from one of Wilkes's journeymen printers, and caused it to be laid before the secretaries of state (x).

On the 16th of August, 1763, the queen was delivered of a second son, who was baptized by the name of Frederic, afterwards created duke of York. At this period the pulse of the nation beat high in favour of liberty; a striking manifestation of which appeared in the dignified congratulatory address to the king presented on this occasion by the city of London, in which the citizens say, "Firmly trusting, that every increase of your royal family will prove an additional security to our religion and the great Charter of Liberty, which, in consequence of the glorious Revolution, your illustrious house was chosen to defend."

On the 16th of January, 1764, princess Augusta, eldest sister to his majesty, was married to Charles William, hereditary prince of Brunswick-Lunenburgh. The ceremony was performed in the great council-chamber at St. James's, in the presence of a great number of peers, peeresses, and foreign ministers. Their serene highnesses left London on the 26th, and embarked at Harwich. Princess Augusta's dowry, granted by the English parliament, was eighty thousand pounds.

We must now return to our affairs in the East, and other foreign parts. In the beginning of this year, the East India company received advice, that the dispute between their servants and the reigning nabob, Cossim Ali Khan, had been productive of such animosities and jealousies, on the part of the latter, that it was thought highly necessary to use every means to allay them: and for this purpose Messrs. Amyatt and Hay, two gentlemen of the council, were deputed to wait upon the nabob to endeavour to adjust the difference amicably. When they ar-pacity, this warrant unconstitutional, illegal, and absolutely void. "If it be good," continued he, "a secretary of state can delegate and depute any of his messengers, or any even from the lowest of the people, to take examinations, to commit or release, and, in fine, to do every act which the highest judicial officers the law knows, can do, or order. There is no authority in our law books that mentions these kinds of warrants, but in express terms condemns them. Upon the maturest consideration, I am bold to say this warrant is illegal; but I am far from wishing a matter of this consequence should rest solely on my opinion. It may be referred to the twelve judges, and there is still a higher court, before which it may be canvassed, and whose determination is final. If these superior jurisdictions should declare my opinion erroneous, I submit as will become me, and kiss the rod; but I must say, I shall always consider it as a rod of iron for the chastisement of the people of Great Britain."

(v) The operation of burning the North Briton, according to the sentence, was committed to the superintendance of Mr. alderman Harley, sheriff of London, and one of the city members. The officers who assembled at the Royal Exchange to perform this duty, were assailed by a furious mob, pelted, and grossly insulted; and the glass of Harley's chariot was broken by a billet of wood. The pieces of the libel which remained, were carried off in triumph to Temple Bar, where a bonfire was prepared to receive and consume a huge Jack-Boot, typically signifying John earl of Bute. On the day appointed for enforcing this sentence, December the 3rd, a great number of persons assembled at the Royal Exchange, who insulted the sheriffs, one of whom received a slight wound in the scuffle, which obliged him to retire. The North Briton, however, was partly consumed by means of a lighted link, but some scraps of it were carried off in triumph by the populace, who, in the evening, displayed them at Temple Bar, where a bonfire was made, and the greatest rejoicings exhibited on the occasion.

(w) On the evening of the day that the verdict was obtained, a person knocked at Mr. Wilkes's door, requesting to speak with him on particular business: but it appearing by his dialect that he was a North Briton, and being besides an entire stranger, he was refused admittance; on which he went to a coffee-house in Parliament Street, where a person made affidavit, that he heard him declare, himself and ten more were determined to cut off Mr. Wilkes, let the event be what it would. This person, the next morning, gave information to Mr. Wilkes, desiring him to be ever on his guard. According to the information, the person sworn against, as was supposed, bringing a letter to Mr. Wilkes's house, signed Alexander Dun, (the purport of which was to beg an interview with him on business of importance,) he was desired to call again at one o'clock, which he did accordingly; and seven o'clock in the evening being then appointed, he again attended; but as he was stepping out at the parlour door, two gentlemen, who had placed themselves behind it for that purpose, seized him by the arms, and threw him on his back. On searching his pockets a new penknife was found, which he pretended to have purchased nine months before; but after many equivocations, he acknowledged to have bought it at Chatham within a fortnight. From these circumstances he was taken into custody, and the next morning carried before one of the judges; after which a complaint was exhibited against him in the house of commons, and he was ordered to be brought to the bar of the house, when, after an examination, he was discharged, being generally supposed to be insane.

(x) In the proceedings against Mr. Wilkes, lord Temple was his avowed supporter and patron, and shared the popularity resulting from the contest. The king having deprived Wilkes of his commission as colonel of the Buckinghamshire militia; it was the duty of lord Temple, as lord lieutenant, to announce that resolution, which he did in the most gentle terms, accompanied with assurances of regret and complimentary testimonies. This behaviour, on the part of lord Temple, was considered in so offensive a light, that he was struck off the list of privy-counsellors, and dismissed from the lord lieutenancy of Buckinghamshire, which was given to sir Francis Dashwood, who had recently attained the title of lord Le Despenser. Vid. Adolphus's Hist. i. 136.

rived at Mongheer, where the nabob resided, they held many conferences with him, in which he manifested a great aversion to an accommodation upon the terms which were proposed to him; and about this time, a supply of five hundred arms, on the road to Patna, was stopped by his officers. Other acts of hostility were likewise committed, which brought affairs to such an extremity, that a war with the nabob appeared inevitable. Messrs. Amyatt and Hay were recalled, and the former of those gentlemen, having received the usual passports, set out for Calcutta, accompanied by Messrs. Amphlett, Woollaston, and Hutchinson; the lieutenants Jones, Gordon, and Cooper, and Dr. Crooke; Messrs. Hay and Guiston being left with the nabob as hostages. As the boats were passing Moorshedabad, they were attacked by a number of troops, assembled on both sides of the river for that purpose, and some of the gentlemen in the boats being slain, Mr. Amyatt immediately landed with a few sepoys, whom he had ordered to fire. He then endeavoured to make the enemy understand that he was furnished with the nabob's passport, and had no intention of committing hostilities; but the Moorish horse advancing, some of the sepoys inadvertently fired, and, in the confusion which ensued, Mr. Amyatt, with most of his small party, were killed. In consequence of this disaster, Mr. Ellis, and the other gentlemen in council at Patna, agreed, with the approbation of captain Corstairs, to attack the city of Moorshedabad. This resolution was successfully executed on the 25th of June, and captain Corstairs, with his party, were in possession of the city for four hours, the Moorish governor, and his people having fled. But he speedily returned, resolving to make an effort to regain the place, in which he succeeded. Most of the sepoys and Europeans being fully occupied in plundering the place, were not prepared to receive him, and were consequently easily dispossessed. They then repaired to the factory, but the men were so dispirited, and the sepoys deserted in such numbers, that it was found impossible to make any stand there; upon which a resolution was taken to proceed to Sujah ed Dowlah's dominions.

They crossed the river on the 26th in the evening, and met with no obstruction till they passed the Churpa; when on the 30th they were attacked by the Fouzdar, with about two thousand men, whom they easily routed; but he being joined by about five hundred sepoys from Bugepore, with six field-pieces, he attacked the Europeans, who, quitting their ranks at the first onset, were entirely defeated. Fifty of them were killed, among whom was captain Corstairs, Mr. Ellis and the rest were made prisoners. From these and other acts of hostility committed by Cossim Ali, a resolution was formed to declare war against him, and to restore Meer Jaffier, the former nabob, who had been deposed, to the subah; after engaging him to enter into a treaty with the English company.

The treaty between Meer Jaffier and the company, was executed at Fort William, on the 10th of July, 1763, and a few days after Meer Jaffier set out to join the army under major Adams, then on his march towards Moorshedabad. On the 19th of July, a battle was fought opposite Cutwa on the Cossimbuzar side of the river, in which the English were successful. They also obtained possession of the fort of Cutwa, on the other side of the river, together with all the enemy's artillery. After this successful enterprize, major Adams pursued his march to Moorshedabad, which he entered on the 24th, at night, with very little opposition; and here the army halted for some days, during which Meer Jaffier was formally proclaimed. On the 28th of July, the army was again put in motion, and on the 2d of August, they arrived in the neighbourhood of Sooty, at the head of Cossimbuzar river; where a numerous army of the enemy's best troops, with artillery, occupied a very advantageous post.

These were immediately attacked by major Adams, and for four hours they made an obstinate defence; but, being at length thrown into confusion, they were easily defeated. In this engagement the loss of the English consisted of six officers, and forty Europeans; together with two hundred and ninety-two sepoys and black cavalry, killed and wounded. Twenty-three pieces of cannon, and one hundred and fifty boats, laden with military and other stores, were taken. Shortly after this engagement, major Adams advanced to the neighbourhood of Ragamaut, about three or four miles from which place the enemy had thrown up a strong entrenchment from the hills to the river. This the major determined to attack, and every thing being ready for the assault on the 5th of September, it was carried on with such vigour, that in a short time the enemy were obliged to abandon the entrenchment to the conquerors. By this victory, the province of Bengal was entirely secured to the English.

Intelligence was received in July, from North America, importing, that the military operations in that quarter had been carried on with great vigour; but that sir William Johnson had at length succeeded in bringing the Seneca nation to concessions highly advantageous to Great Britain, and that they had entered into a treaty of peace, friendship, and alliance with the English, which was reciprocally signed in a congress held for that purpose at Niagara. The forces commanded by the colonels Bradstreet and Bouquet were as successful as those under sir William Johnson. The Delaware and Shawanese Indians had refused to meet sir William at the congress of Niagara, but being intimidated by the march of such a number of troops towards their country, they met colonel Bradstreet at Presque Isle, and submissively sued for peace, which was granted them with readiness.

The peace, however, with the Delawares and Shawanese was but of short duration: they soon after revolted, and committed outrages with aggravated insolence. In consequence of this perfidy, major-general Gage, commander in chief of his majesty's forces in those parts, resolved to penetrate into the heart of their country. The regular and provincial troops, commanded by colonel Bouquet, having been joined by a large body of volunteers from Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, in the beginning of October, marched from Fort Pitt, and about the 16th, arrived at Tuscarowas. The sight of these troops threw them into the utmost consternation; they having hitherto depended on their woods for protection, and had frequently boasted that their situation secured them from the attacks of our army: but not being willing to come to an engagement, they had again recourse to negociation, and were informed, that they might obtain peace, but every prisoner in their possession must first be delivered up. They brought up about twenty, and promised to deliver up the rest; but as their promises were not regarded, they engaged to send the whole on the first of November, to a fort about two hundred and fifty miles from Fort Pitt, the center of the Delaware towns, and near the most considerable settlement of the Shawanese. Colonel Bouquet determined not to lose sight of them, moved his camp to that place; and soon obliged the Delawares, together with some broken tribes, to bring in all their prisoners. They were then informed, that they must appoint deputies to go to sir William Johnson, in order to receive such terms as he might think proper to mention, which the nations must agree to ratify; and they were obliged to leave a considerable number of their chiefs in the hands of the English, as a security for the performance of this agreement. All the nations readily agreed, except the Shawanese, who disapproved of the conditions, and were particularly averse to the delivery of hostages: but finding their obstinacy would only tend to their destruction, they at last consented, gave up forty principal chiefs as hostages, and appointed their deputies to repair to sir William Johnson, in the same manner as the others had done. The number of prisoners delivered up by these nations exceeded three hundred, and it was expected that the English parties would bring in near one hundred more from their different towns.

Several accounts were received from the Bay of Honduras, in June, complaining that our logwood cutters there had not only been disturbed in their business, but had been ordered to remove from their usual places of settlement, on pretence of their having no proofs that they were subjects of his Britannic majesty; and supposing they were, that they had roved too freely about the country, gathering the fruits of it as if it belonged to them. In consequence of these proceedings, a remonstrance was presented to the Spanish court by the English ambassador at Madrid: and on the 27th of September, a messenger arrived in London, with a duplicate of the orders, which were instantly dispatched to Don Felix Raming de Estenoz, governor of Yucatan; by which it appeared, that the Spanish monarch disapproved of the proceedings of the said governor, and expressed his desire of giving the greatest proofs of his friendship to his Britannic majesty.

The British parliament met again on the 10th of January, 1765, when his majesty opened the session with a speech from the throne; in which he said, "I have now the satisfaction to inform you, that I have agreed with my good brother the king of Denmark, to cement the union which has long subsisted between the two crowns by the marriage of the prince royal with my sister the princess Carolina Matilda, which is to be solemnized as soon as their respective ages will permit."

Both houses presented loyal and affectionate addresses to his majesty, on account of his speech; and the commons, that they might raise the supplies for the ensuing year, resolved to put the Americans on the same footing as the inhabitants of Great Britain, by compelling them to pay stamp duties. Great opposition was made to this bill; but at length it passed both houses, and on the 22nd of March received the royal assent. Shortly after this his majesty ordered, that America should be divided into two districts, viz. northern and southern, by the river Potomack, and a line drawn due west from the head of the main branch of that river, as far as his majesty's dominions extend, and that a surveyor general should be appointed in each, to make general surveys both of the sea coast, and the inland country, in order to facilitate the navigation, and to promote the speedy settlement of the new acquisitions. Commissioners were likewise appointed to settle the new ceded islands in the West Indies, who were directed to divide each island into parishes and districts; then in every parish to trace out a town, its streets, market-place, &c. and to parcel out the ground into proper allotments to build on, with a small field annexed to each. The land was to be sold at a small quit-rent.

In the month of April, the trial of lord Byron for murder came on in Westminster Hall, before the peers; of which the following are the particulars: In January, at a meeting of the Nottinghamshire club, a dispute arose between lord Byron and Mr. Chaworth, a gentleman of that county, concerning the quantity of game on their respective estates. The warmth of the dispute produced a quarrel, and a duel was the consequence, which was fought at the Star and Garter tavern in Pall Mall, when the latter was unfortunately killed, and some time after lord Byron surrendered himself to be tried by his peers. Accordingly, on the morning of the 26th of April, his lordship was conveyed from the Tower to Westminster Hall, where the trial took place. The number of witnesses on the part of the crown was so great, that they could not be all examined that day. On the next, the trial being resumed, and the examinations against the prisoner finished, the solicitor-general summed up the evidence; after which lord Byron, who declined examining any witnesses on his own behalf, told their lordships, "That what he had to offer in his own vindication he had committed to writing, and begged that it might be read by the clerk, as he feared his own voice, considering his present situation, would not be heard." This request being complied with, the clerk, in a very audible and distinct manner, read his speech, which contained an exact detail of all the particulars relating to the melancholy affair between him and Mr. Chaworth. He said, "he declined entering into the circumstances of Mr. Chaworth's behaviour farther than was absolutely necessary for his defence, expressed his deep and unfeigned sorrow for the event, and reposed himself with the utmost confidence on their lordship's justice and humanity, observing that he would with chearfulness acquiesce in the sentence of the noblest and most equitable court of judicature in the world, whether it were for life or death." When the clerk had concluded, the peers adjourned to their own house; and, after some time, returned, when they found his lordship guilty of manslaughter: and, as by an old statute, peers are, in all cases where benefit of clergy is allowed, to be dismissed without burning in the hand, loss of inheritance, or corruption of blood, his lordship was immediately dismissed on the payment of his fees.

His majesty, who had been for some time indisposed, went to the house of peers, on the 24th of April, and, after signing such bills as were ready, made a speech from the throne; in which he recommended the appointment of a regent in case of his demise, during the minority of the prince of Wales; and in which he said, "The tender concern which I feel for my faithful subjects, makes me anxious to provide for every possible event which might effect their future happiness or security. My late indisposition, though not attended with danger, has led me to consider the situation in which my kingdoms and my family might be left, if it should please God to put a period to my life, whilst my successor is of tender years. The high importance of this subject to the public safety, good order, and tranquillity; the paternal affection which I bear to my children, and to all my people; and my earnest desire that every precaution should be taken which may tend to preserve the constitution of Great Britain undisturbed, and the dignity and lustre of its crown unimpaired; have determined me to lay this weighty business before my parliament. And as my health, by the blessing of God, is now restored, I take the earliest opportunity of meeting you here, and of recommending to your most serious deliberation the making such provision, as would be necessary, in case any of my children should succeed to the throne before they shall respectively attain the age of eighteen years. To this end, I propose to your consideration, whether, under the present circumstances, it will be expedient to vest in one the power of appointing, from time to time, by instruments in writing, under my sign manuel, either the queen, or any other person of my royal family, usually residing in Great Britain, to be the guardian of the person of such successor, and the regent of these kingdoms, until such successor shall attain the age of eighteen years; subject to such restrictions and regulations as are contained in an act, passed upon a similar occasion, in the 24th year of the reign of the late king, my royal grandfather. The regent so appointed to be assisted by a council, composed of the several persons, who, by reason of their dignities and offices, are constituted members of the council established by that act, together with those whom you may think proper to leave to my nomination." To his majesty's speech each house presented a loyal address; and in conformity to his majesty's request, a bill was ordered to be brought into the house of lords, where it was passed, and sent to the house of commons. Here, however, it met with some opposition; but an amendment being made, which was approved of by the lords, it received the royal assent on the 15th of May (y). The affair of the regency being settled, his majesty prorogued the parliament by commission, on the 25th, being so indisposed as to be unable to attend in person.

When the king repaired to the house to give his assent to the regency bill, a vast concourse of journeymen silk-weavers appeared at Saint James's, some of them displaying black flags, declaring they were reduced to a state of famine by the encouragement of French silks. They surrounded the two houses of parliament, insulted them, and proceeded to commit other outrages. They also attended the two following days, but were at length repressed by the posse comitatus and the military.

To prevent frauds committed by smugglers, the Isle of Man was this year annexed to the realm. It was before a part of the crown, but not of the realm of England: it was under the allegiance of the king, but governed by its own laws. This extraordinary inheritance had for almost four centuries been vested, by parliamentary charter, in the family of the duke of Athol.

A short time after the prorogation of the parliament, accounts were received of the success of his majesty's arms in conjunction with the company's troops, in the East Indies. On the 22d of October, 1764, major Monro, who, on the decease of major Adams, had succeeded to the command of the king's forces in that part of the world, came up with the Indian army at Buxard, on the river Cammassary, about one hundred miles above Patna. They were most advantageously encamped, having a morass in their front, judiciously lined with cannon, so that whichever way the English should move, they could greatly annoy them. The major, however, not being intimidated by the advantageous situation of the enemy, ordered the line of battle to be formed next morning; about nine the Indians began to cannonade the English; and in half an hour the action became general. The morass in the front of our troops prevented their advancing for some time, during which they were greatly galled by the enemy's artillery. The British forces charged the enemy with such success, that before noon their whole army was put to flight, leaving six thousand men on the field, with one hundred and thirty pieces of cannon, a proportionable quantity of military stores, and all their tents ready pitched. The loss of the victors was comparatively small, for they had only thirty Europeans, and two hundred and thirty-nine Indians killed; and fifty-seven Europeans, and four hundred and seventy-three Indians wounded. Such was the situation of affairs in the East Indies, when major Monro was recalled; and sir Robert Fletcher, an officer brought up in the company's service, was appointed to command in his room. He took the field as soon as he arrived; and marched about one hundred and fifty miles up the Ganges, when he attacked several of the enemy's forts, and made the garrisons prisoners of war.

On account of the stamp-act great disturbances arose in America. The first intelligence that arrived there of such a bill being in agitation, threw an universal melancholy on the countenances of all the people; but when it was known that the bill had passed both houses, and received the royal assent, they were fired with indignation, and the utmost scene of confusion took place throughout most of the provinces. When the news arrived at Boston, the ships in the harbour hung out their colours half mast high, in token of the deepest mourning; the bells were rung muffled: copies of the act were printed, with a death's head in the place where it is usual to fix the arms, and cried publicly about the streets by the name of "The Folly of England and Ruin of America." Essays soon followed, not only against the expediency, but even the equity of it, in several newspapers, one of which bore the significant title of "The Constitutional Courant, containing Matters interesting to Liberty, and no ways repugnant to Loyalty; printed by Andrew Marvel, at the Sign of the Bribe Refused, on Constitution Hill, North America." The head-piece to this paper was cut in small pieces, with the initial letters of the names of the several colonies, from New England to South Carolina, affixed to each piece, and above them the words "Join or Die." To these were added caricatures, pasquinades, puns, bonmots, and such sayings, suited to the occasion, as by being short could be most easily circulated and retained, at the same time that, by being extremely expressive, they carried with them the weight of a great many arguments (z). By the time the act itself, as printed at the king's printing-house, reached the colonies, the populace were every where exasperated against it to such a degree, as to shew it the most public marks of contempt. In several places it was burnt, together with the effigies of those who were supposed to have voted for, or otherwise had any hand in favour of it (a).

When the news of the American discontents arrived in England, several masters of ships refused to take any stamps on board for the colonies; and it soon appeared that their precaution was well founded; for such as ventured to take them had sufficient cause to repent of their temerity on their arrival at their destined ports, where, to save their vessels from fire, and their persons from the gallows, they were most of them obliged to surrender their noxious cargoes into the hands of the enraged multitude, which they treated in the same ignominious manner they had done the act: the other vessels were obliged to take shelter under such of the king's ships as happened to be at hand to protect them. Those gentlemen who went from England with commissions to act as distributors of the stamps, met with still worse treatment. Many of them were compelled to renounce, upon oath, all manner of concern in them: others thought it most prudent to return home; whilst some, who were suspected of obstinately persisting in endeavouring to enslave their country, as it was termed, or of having spoken too freely concerning the behaviour of the people on this occasion, had their houses burnt, and their most valuable effects plundered or destroyed. Even those who, without their solicitation or knowledge, had been named, or were obliged in virtue of the offices they already filled, to superintend the distribution of the stamped paper, were treated in a similar manner; and the populace having suspected one person of writing to England in disrespectful terms concerning their proceedings, surrounded his house, and, notwithstanding the most earnest entreaties, obliged him to deliver up the copies of his letters, and thereby turn evidence against himself. Even ships bringing stamped mercantile or custom-house papers, merely in their own defence, from such of the colonies as had thought proper to submit to the stamp act, were forced to part with them to be stuck up in derision in coffee-houses and taverns, and were afterwards publicly burnt.

Several persons of the higher classes now began to join these popular tumults. One in particular set the act openly at defiance, by advertising under his hand, that those whose business it was to enforce it, might save themselves the trouble of calling upon him for that purpose; for that he was resolved to pay no tax but what was laid upon him by his representatives. The provincial assemblies themselves even declined giving the governors any advice concerning their behaviour on this critical occasion, and although they disavowed these riotous proceedings, and offered rewards for apprehending the rioters, yet they would not condemn them further than decency required; and absolutely refused, when exhorted to it by the governors, to make any compensation to the injured parties; much less would they strengthen the hands of the executive power, so as to hinder any future commotions; which they did not think proper to consider as objects of military restraint. The conduct of the general assemblies was not only approved, but openly encouraged, by assemblies of the freeholders and principal inhabitants of some places, who directed their representatives not to agree to any steps for the protection of stamped papers, or stamp officers, though they owned there had been already some tumults and disorders relating to them; and likewise cautioned them against all unconstitutional draughts on the public treasury. The general assemblies went still farther: for, instead of conniving at the people's asserting their independence by tumultuous acts, they avowed themselves, and established committees to correspond with each other concerning the general affairs of the whole; they even appointed deputies from these committees to meet in a congress at New York. But such harmony already prevailed in the sentiments of the general assemblies of the several provinces, that the deputies, who met, had little more to do than to congratulate each other upon it, and put their hands to one general declaration of their rights, and the grievances they laboured under; and to one general petition expressive thereof, to the king, lords, and commons of England. At length, those invested with the subordinate executive powers began to join the legislative; and they resolved rather to give up their business, than carry it on with stamped papers.

By the first of November, when the act took place, not a sheet of stamped paper was to be had throughout the several colonies of New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Maryland, or the two Carolinas, except a small parcel, which the governor of New York, terrified by the threats of the enraged multitude, had surrendered into the hands of the corporation of that place, on condition of their not being destroyed; so that all business, which could not be legally carried on without stamps, was at once put to a stand, except that of news-printing, which the printers still continued, pleading in excuse, that, if they did not, the populace would serve them as they had done the stamp masters themselves. The courts of justice were closed, and the ports shut up. Even in those colonies where stamps were to be had, the people of the best fortune submitted to be asked in church, rather than take out licences for private marriages (b).

The merchants of all those colonies which ventured openly to oppose the act, now entered into the most solemn engagements with each other, not only not to order any more goods from Great Britain, let the consequences be what they might, and recal the orders they had already given, if not obeyed by the first of January, 1766, but (z) The two chief articles urged in these newspaper essays were, first, that the person acting under this statute had it in his power to bring an action, the cause of which had arisen at one extremity of the North American colonies, and extended itself to the other, at almost two thousand miles distance, without the traders being entitled to recover damages, in case the judge certified that there was any probable cause for the prosecution. The second was, the judge having an interest in giving a decree in favour of the party suing for the penalties of the act, on being allowed, by way of commission, a very large share in these penalties.

(a) It was agreed by the Americans, at the meeting of those in higher rank, that thanks should be given to general Conway and colonel Barré, two gentlemen whom they considered as the most strenuous opposers of it in the British house of commons; that their speeches against it, and their pictures, should be requested. The pictures to be hung up in their places of meeting; and their speeches to be inserted in the books destined to record all their principal transactions.

(b) The consequences of the stagnation of business which took place on account of the stamp act soon began to be so severely felt, that the inhabitants found it necessary to try some expedient by which they might elude the act. Accordingly, one of them sent a thin piece of bark to the printers at Boston, on which he had written, "That it being neither paper, parchment, or vellum, he would be glad to know, if instruments written on such stuff might not be valid, though not stamped; in which case he was ready to supply, with good writing bark, all those whose consciences were bound by the late act."

that even not to dispose of any British goods sent them on commission, that were not shipped before that day; or, if they consented to any relaxation from these engagements, it was not to take place till the stamp act, and even the sugar and paper money acts were repealed. The people of Philadelphia also resolved, though not unanimously, that, till such repeal, no lawyer should put in suit a demand for money owing by a resident in America, to one in England; nor any person in America, however indebted in England, make any remittances to that country. These resolutions were adopted by the retailers, who unanimously agreed, not to buy or sell any British goods shipped contrary to their express meaning and declaration.

The only place that received any material benefit from these proceedings was Ireland, as what goods the colonies could not possibly do without they took from that country in exchange for their hemp-seed and flax-seed, of which they annually exported very large quantities. In the mean time they endeavoured to free themselves even from this dependence. A society of arts, manufactures, and commerce, on the plan of the London society, was instituted at New York, and markets were opened for the sale of home-made goods; by which it soon appeared, that neither the natives nor the manufacturers, had been idle. Linens, woollens, the coarser but most useful kinds of iron ware, malt-spirits, paper-hangings, &c. were produced to the society, and greatly approved; and when brought to market every body appeared desirous of purchasing them. At the same time, lest the new woollen manufacturers should come short of materials, many of the inhabitants came to a resolution not to eat any lamb; and to extend the influence of their resolution to those who did not join them in it, not to deal with any butcher that should kill or expose any lamb to sale.

In the mean time the nation suffered a loss in the death of his royal highness William, duke of Cumberland, uncle to his majesty, who died on the 31st of October, in the forty-fifth year of his age. His royal highness was at court in the morning, dined with lord Albemarle, and drank tea with the princess of Brunswick at St. James's, whence he came to his own house in the evening, to be present at a council to be held on affairs of state. So soon as he entered the house he complained of a pain in his shoulder, and desired to be laid on a couch, where, in about twenty minutes, he expired. On examining the body a coagulation of extravasated blood was found in the right ventricle of the brain, which was the cause of his death; but all the other parts were sound, except the membrane between the lobes of the brain, which had become ossified.

In consequence of the distracted state of America, his majesty thought proper to assemble the parliament on the 17th of December (c), which was considerably sooner than he intended. After having adjourned for the holidays, the house met again on the 14th of January, when his majesty addressed the parliament in a short speech, in which he acquainted the lords and commons, that he had ordered "All the papers that give any light into the origin, the progress, or the tendency of the disturbances which have of late prevailed in some of the northern colonies, to be immediately laid before them."

The merchants of London, Bristol, Lancaster, Liverpool, Hull, Glasgow, and, in short, most of the trading and manufacturing towns and boroughs in the kingdom, now presented petitions to parliament, wherein they set forth the great decay of their trade, owing to the new laws and regulations made for America: the vast quantity of our manufactures, (besides those articles imported from abroad, which were purchased either with our own manufactures, or with the produce of our colonies,) which the American trade formerly took off our hands; by all which many thousands of manufacturers, seamen, and labourers, had been employed, to the great benefit of the nation. That in return for these exports, the petitioners had received from the colonies, rice, indigo, tobacco, naval stores, oil, whale-fins, fins, and pot-ash, with other staple commodities; besides a large balance in remittances by bills of exchange and bullion, obtained by the colonists for articles of their produce, not required for the British markets, and therefore exported to other places: that from the nature of this trade, consisting of British manufactures exported, and of the import of raw materials from America, many of them used in our manufactures, and all of them tending to lessen our dependence on neighbouring states, it must be deemed of the highest importance in the commercial system of this nation, that this commerce so beneficial to the state, and so necessary for the support of multitudes, than lay under such difficulties and discouragements, that nothing less than its utter ruin was apprehended, without the immediate interposition of parliament: that the colonies were then indebted to the merchants of Great Britain, to the amount of several millions sterling; and that when urged for payment, they appeal to past experience in proof of their readiness upon all proper occasions; but declare it is not in their power at present to fulfil their engagements, alledging that the taxes and restrictions laid upon them, and the extension of the jurisdiction of the vice-admiralty courts, established by some recent acts of parliament, particularly by an act passed in the fourth year of his present majesty, for granting certain duties in the British colonies and plantations in America, and by an act passed in the fifth of his majesty for granting and applying certain stamp duties, &c. in the said colonies, &c. with several regulations and restraints, which they represent to have been extending in such a manner as to obstruct and embarrass legal commerce and harrass the fair trader; insomuch that the state of the several provinces were thrown into confusion, and so great a number of actual bankruptcies were occasioned, that the former opportunities and means of remittances were no longer remaining. That the petitioners were by these unhappy events, reduced to the necessity of applying to the house, to secure themselves and their families from impending ruin; to prevent a multitude of manufacturers from becoming a burthen to the community, or of seeking their bread in other countries, to the irretrievable loss of the kingdom; and to preserve the strength of this nation entire, its commerce flourishing, the revenues encreasing, our navigation, the bulwark of the kingdom, in a state of growth and extension, and the colonies from inclination, duty, and interest, firmly attached to the mother country. Petitions of a similar kind were also presented from almost every part of the kingdom, and from the agents of Virginia and Georgia, setting forth their inability to pay the stamp duty.

The projectors, however, were determined to support their favourite act, and could not be prevailed on to alter in the least their resolution. Such petitions they represented as the effect of ministerial artifice, and observed, that supposing the distress of trade was as real and great as it was represented, a temporary inconvenience ought to be submitted to, rather than by a repeal of the act, to hazard the total annihilation of the superiority of Great Britain over her colonial subjects. Those who contended for the repeal of the stamp act were divided in their opinion, respecting the right of this nation to tax America; the more numerous body, among whom were the ministry, insisted that the legislature of Great Britain had an incontestible right to tax the colonies, but acknowledged the inexpediency of the present tax, as ill adapted to the condition of the colonies, and framed upon principles destructive to the trade of Great Britain. Those who denied the right of taxation were not so numerous: but they consisted of some of the most distinguished and popular characters in the kingdom. Though this affair was attended to in the house with the most unwearied application, yet the nature of their enquiries, the number of petitions they received, and the multitude of papers and witnesses they had to examine, occasioned great delay, which could not easily be avoided. In the mean time there were continual debates, and the opposition made the most strenuous efforts for enforcing the stamp act, and by every means to prevent the repeal.

Two questions arose in the course of the contest upon which the whole argument seemed to turn. The first was, whether the legislature of Great Britain had a right of taxation over the colonies or not? The second was confined to the expediency or inexpediency of the late laws. The arguments against the right of taxation were supported by the authorities of Locke, Selden, Harrington, and Puffendorf; and it was asserted, that the charters of the colonies, which are derived from prerogatives, and are in fact only so many grants from the crown, are not the only right the colonies have to being represented before they are taxed. They, as British subjects, derive their rights and liberties from a higher origin than their charters. They flow to them from the same origin and fountain which confer them on all Englishmen, from Magna Charta, and the natural right of the subject. By that rule of right, the charters of the colonies, like all other crown grants, are to be restricted and interpreted, for the benefit, not the prejudice of the subjects. Many other arguments were adduced, and several instances brought from ancient history, of the conduct of some of the most celebrated republics, with respect to their colonies; and likewise of colonies which outgrew their mother countries, such as Carthage, the northern emigrants, &c. Precedents were also quoted from events in the United Netherlands and other places, which should serve as a beacon to warn us from pursuing such measures as accelerated those revolutions (d).

The partizans of the other side contended, that it was necessary to clear away from the question all that mass of dissertation and learning, displayed in arguments which have been brought from speculative men, who have written upon the subject of government: that the refinements upon that subject, and arguments of natural lawyers, as Locke, Selden, Puffendorf, &c. are little to the purpose in a question of constitutional law: that it is absurd to apply very ancient records to our present constitution; because the constitution is not the same; and it is impossible to declare what it was at some of the times that are quoted: that there are things even in Magna Charta which are not constitutional now, and that those records are no proofs of our constitution as it now is: that the constitution of this country has always been in a fluctuating state, either gaining or losing something: that the representation of the commons of Great Britain was not formed into any certain system till Henry VII. that with regard to the modes of taxation, when we get beyond the reigns of Edward I. or king John, we are lost in obscurity, the history of those times being entirely uncertain.

And it was argued, that protection is the ground that gives a right of taxation: that the obligations between the colonies and the mother country is natural and reciprocal, consisting of defence on the one side, and obedience on the other; and that common sense dictates, that they must be dependent in all points on the mother country, or not belong to it in any degree; that the question is not, what was law? or what was the constitution? but the question is, what is law now? and what is the constitution now? That if a matter of right has been generally exercised, and as generally held to be law, as has been proved in numberless instances, without having ever been questioned before, it is now the constitution. It was also observed, that the colonies had proceeded to extremities; and it was even insisted, that, by appointing deputies from their respective assemblies, to confer together, they had absolutely forfeited their charters.

At length the debates being ended, and the question stated, the power of the legislature of Great Britain over her colonies, in all cases whatsoever, and without any distinction in regard to taxation, was confirmed without a division. But not being dispirited at the seeming triumph of the ministerial party, the opposition gained new vigour, and still urged the repeal in all the stages of its progress.

So many instances of the inexpediency of the stamp duty had already occurred, that the question was considered as no longer controvertible; therefore, instead of entering into the merits of that part of the controversy, the ministry rested their chief defence upon the resolutions, on which the late bill for securing the dependency of the colonies had been founded. They argued thence, that the total repeal of the stamp act, while such an obstinate resistance continued, would for the future weaken the authority of Great Britain, and make it appear contemptible: that such a submission of the supreme legislature would be in effect a surrender of their ancient unalienable rights, to subordinate provincial assemblies, established only by prerogative; which in itself it had no such power to bestow; that a concession of this nature carried with it such an appearance of weakness and timidity in government, as might tend to encourage fresh insults, and lessen the respect of his majesty's subjects to the dignity of his crown, and the authority of the laws. Many other arguments were urged in order to manifest the heavy burthens with which the mother country was loaded; the ability of the Americans; their exemption from all manner of taxation; and their peremptory and refractory refusal to contribute in any degree towards defraying the public expences. These arguments were strongly opposed, and on the question being put, the bill passed by a majority of one hundred and eight, and was carried up to the lords by above two hundred members of the house of commons. Notwithstanding the manner in which it was introduced, it met with a strong opposition in the upper house; a protest was entered against it at the second reading by thirty-three lords, and at the third by twenty-eight; but it was carried by a majority of thirty-four: and on the 18th of March received the royal assent (e).

The national business being now finished, his majesty went to the house of peers on the 16th of June, and terminated the session with a speech from the throne; in which he declared, that "It was with the utmost satisfaction he had observed the wisdom and moderation by which the parliament had been uniformly guided, through the important deliberations in which they had been engaged." His majesty also observed, that "The many regulations which had been made for extending and promoting the trade and manufactures of Great Britain, and for adjusting the mutual intercourse of his kingdoms and plantations, in such a manner as to provide for the improvement of the colonies, on a plan of due subordination to the commercial interests of the mother country, were the strongest proofs of their equitable and comprehensive regard to the welfare of all his dominions." He added, "That it should be his endeavour, that such care be taken, as might tend to secure and improve the advantages which might be expected from such wise and salutary regulations."

Shortly after the rising of the parliament his majesty made the following change in the ministry: his grace the duke of Grafton was appointed first lord of the treasury in the room of the marquis of Rockingham; the earl of Shelburne succeeded the duke of Richmond as secretary of state; lord Camden was created lord high chancellor, as successor of the earl of Northington, as was the honourable Charles Townshend chancellor of the exchequer, in the room of the right honourable William Dowdeswell; and the right honourable William Pitt, who some days before had been created viscount Pynsent and earl of Chatham, was appointed lord privy seal.

The immoderate price of provisions at this time occasioned a commotion among the poor in several parts of the kingdom; when they destroyed the flour-mills, seized the corn, and other necessaries of life, which they sold at a moderate price, and delivered the money to the owners. In some places they were much more violent: they ripped open the sacks, and wantonly scattered the corn about, seized butter, cheese, and bacon in the shops of the inhabitants, which they threw into the streets; and behaved in the most outrageous manner to the proprietors of the food they were thus demolishing. To prevent the dreadful consequences which might ensue, a proclamation was issued on the 11th of September, for putting in execution the laws against forestalling, regrating, and engrossing of corn. And on the 23rd of the same month two other proclamations; by the first of which an embargo was laid on all vessels laden, or to be laden, with wheat or flour for exportation, till the 14th of November; and the other prohibited the distillation of spirits from wheat.

(d) In the debates upon this subject, Mr. Pitt declared his opinion, that Great Britain had no right to lay a tax upon the colonies, though he asserted the authority of Great Britain over them to be sovereign and supreme in every case of legislation. In support of this opinion he said, "The colonists are subjects of this kingdom, equally entitled with yourselves to all the natural rights of mankind, and the peculiar privileges of Englishmen. The Americans are the sons, not the bastards of England. Taxation is no part of the governing or legislative power. Taxes are the voluntary gift and the grant of the commons alone. In legislation, the three estates of the realm are alike concerned, but the concurrence of the peers and the crown to a tax, is only necessary to clothe it with a form of law. The gift and grant is of the commons alone.—When in this house we give and grant, we give and grant what is our own; but in an American tax, what do we do? We your majesty's commons for Great Britain, give and grant to your majesty, what? Our own property? No, we give and grant to your majesty, the property of your majesty's subjects in America. It is an absurdity in terms!"

In the upper house, lord Camden averred that taxation and representation were inseparable: this, he said, was no novelty: it did not originate in Edward's or in Henry's reign, but was coëval with the constitution. There is not, he declared, a blade of grass growing in the most obscure corner of this kingdom, which is not, which was not ever represented since the beginning of the constitution: there is not a blade of grass which, when taxed, was not taxed with the consent of the proprietor: he therefore refused his assent to any bill for taxing the American colonies, while they remained unrepresented.

(e) The American merchants attended in great numbers upon this occasion, to express their joy and gratitude; the ships in the river displayed their colours; several houses in the city were illuminated; and every method was taken to demonstrate the just sense that was entertained of his majesty's goodness, and the wisdom of parliament, in conciliating the minds of the people at this critical period.

On the first of October, this year, her royal highness Carolina-Matilda, his majesty's youngest sister, was married to the king of Denmark, at the Chapel Royal at St. James's, the duke of York being proxy for the Danish king. On the following morning her majesty set out from Carlton House for Harwich, accompanied by his royal highness the duke of Gloucester, lady Mary Boothby, and count de Rothmar, her majesty's vice-chamberlain. The next day her majesty embarked with her whole retinue, and on the 18th landed at Altena, in his Danish majesty's dominions, amidst the acclamations of her subjects. Her marriage portion was one hundred thousand pounds.

When the parliament met on the 18th of November, his majesty opened the session with a speech from the throne. As the ministry had lately been changed, strong opposition, as is usually the case on such occasions, was made to every thing proposed by the administration; and some of the discarded ministers had the temerity to attempt to palliate and even excuse the rioters, who had given rise to the disturbances which had lately taken place in different parts of the kingdom. But, notwithstanding their dissentions, it was at length agreed, that addresses of thanks should be presented to his majesty for his speech, which being done, they adjourned till after the holidays.

This session the attention of parliament was drawn to an object of great importance, respecting the East India Company, which was become extremely rich, and even had began to exercise a sovereign authority over their settlements. In consequence of this circumstance, a committee of the house was appointed to examine into the particulars of the affair. The company's charter was ordered to be produced, and that the house might be in possession of whatever related to their transactions in the East, they were obliged to lay before the parliament the originals of such treaties as they had entered into with the native princes; and also an account of all the expences incurred by the government for the support of the company (f). By the charter granted to the East India Company, that company was prohibited from making any conquests; and yet it was certain that they had subdued several of the native princes in India, and annexed their dominions to their own settlements. The disputes between the partizans for and against the company, were carried on with intemperate zeal, the result of which was, that the company should, for the space of two years ensuing, pay four hundred thousand pounds to government; and that no dividend of their stock should be made without the consent of a general court of proprietors. On the 24th of June his majesty went to the house of peers, and, after signing such bills as were ready, prorogued the parliament.

On the 27th of September, this year, (1767,) captain Wrottesley arrived in town from Monaco, a town of Genoa in Italy, with intelligence of the death of Edward duke of York, the king's eldest brother, on the 17th of the same month. The body was afterwards brought to England, and interred in the family vault in Henry the VIIth's chapel (g).

For some time the feelings of the public had been in a peculiar manner interested, and their attention engaged, by the situation of the island of Corsica, which, neglected as it had been by one administration after another, now at length forced itself upon the notice of the government. This island, so celebrated in all ages for its ardent and invincible passion for liberty, was, on the fall of the Roman empire, possessed by the Goths, and afterwards by the Saracens, from whom it is said to have been wrested by the famous Charles Martel. In a short time, Corsica was resigned by the kings of France as a free gift to the Holy See, which, from the incessant eruptions of the Saracenic powers, and the ungovernable spirit of the natives, finding the acquisition very unprofitable, ceded the island to the republic of Pisa, then in the meridian of its greatness. But Genoa gaining the ultimate ascendancy over this rival nation, Corsica, unfortunately, about the beginning of the fourteenth century, fell under her dominion, which from its very commencement was distinguished by the most cruel and oppressive severity.

In the wars between France and the house of Austria in the sixteenth century, Corsica made a spirited effort to recover her independency, under the protection of Francis I. and his son and successor Henry II. But the Genoese, being strongly protected by the emperor Charles V. reduced, under the auspices of the renowned Andrew Doria, the island again under their yoke; Sampieri d'Ornano, the principal leader of the insurgents, being basely assassinated, A. D. 1567, by the treachery of Genoa. Despised, plundered, and oppressed, the Corsicans, after a long succession of wretched and calamitous years, suddenly and unexpectedly rose in arms in 1729, and possessed themselves of the city of Cortes, the ancient capital of the island. The republic then applied to Charles VI. and receiving powerful succours from him, an accommodation took place, and a treaty was concluded. This being almost immediately broken by the Genoese, the Corsicans in a few years rose anew; and, after a short interval, elected the famous Theodore Baron Neuhoff for their sovereign. The republic then applied to the court of France for assistance; and in 1739 a great force was sent over under the count de Maillebois, by whose able, and relentless exertions of military skill and vigour, the island was once more vanquished; the French auxiliaries leaving it, at the end of 1741, in a state of the perfect submission, exhibiting every where marks of the most frightful desolation. Scarcely, however, had the French retired, before the Corsicans were again in motion. As if actuated by a kind of inspiration, not only men, but women and beardless boys, appeared in the field, and the whole nation burned with renewed and redoubled ardour to burst the bonds of their ignominious thraldom. The war between England and France having now commenced, and Genoa taking a decided part with the latter, the English fleet in the Mediterranean gave frequent and efficacious succours to the Corsican insurgents, and San Fiorenzo and Bastia were recovered in 1745, by their assistance, from the Genoese. In the succeeding year the Corsicans, conducted by count Rivarola, made proposals to the earl of Bristol, the English ambassador at Turin, to put themselves under the protection of Great Britain; but this was declined by the English: and on the conclusion of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, the Corsicans were, with political apathy, left to their fate. The contest was nevertheless continued with various success. In 1755 the Corsicans elected Pascal Paoli as their chief, a regular government on a free and democratic basis was formed under his invigorating influence, and great advantages were gained over the Genoese in the subsequent conduct of the war. The proclamation of the king of England in 1762, issued under the inauspicious administration of the earl of Bute, prohibiting his subjects from giving aid or assistance in any shape to the Corsican rebels—when England was in a situation to have established, by a single word, the liberty and independency of Corsica—was a terrible blow to these unfortunate islanders, and no doubt emboldened the court of Versailles to conclude the subsequent treaty with Genoa, by which the progress of the Corsican general was arrested in the midst of his victories. The aid of France was, however, granted in a mode conformable to the insidious policy of that court, which, influenced by the aspiring councils of the duc de Choiseul, was ambitious to annex Corsica to its other dominions. The Genoese, perceiving no prospect of a termination to the war, at length made a formal cession of the island to the French king; and a large body of forces was immediately ordered to embark, and take possession. This excited jealousy and alarm in the several courts of Europe most adverse to France; and England and Holland presented, by their ambassadors, strong memorials to the court of Versailles, expressive of their resolution not to suffer this addition to the power of the French monarchy. In consequence of this spirited language the duc de Choiseul began to waver; but suddenly the French court assumed a more haughty language, and breathed an air of hostility and defiance. The English ministers, astonished at this alteration, and at a loss how to decide, sent, together with a considerable supply of arms and ammunition, a private message to general Paoli, desiring full information respecting the defence he was able to make, and how long he deemed that Corsica would be competent to resist the force employed on this service. General Paoli, instead of acknowledging that the island must fall, without immediate and powerful succours from England, affirmed, that it could not be reduced in less than eighteen months; and while the English ministers were hesitating and deliberating, the French arms made a rapid and alarming progress; and Paoli, discerning no symptoms of vigour in the English councils, thought proper to make a seasonable retreat, leaving his unfortunate country to its hard and unmerited fate. He was, however, well received at the court of London, on his subsequent arrival in England, and an ample pension was settled on him in reward of his heroism, or, according to the malicious construction of some, as the guarantee of his silence (h).

(f) The proprietors of India stock were greatly chagrined at this circumstance; but what was still worse, all these papers were printed and published. The question stated by the administration was, "What right have the East India Company to exercise territorial jurisdiction?"

(g) The political principles of the duke of York are little known, but he gave his vote in parliament against the repeal of the stamp act. He is usually represented as a prince of pleasing manners, and comparative vivacity of genius; but of superficial attainments in knowledge, and very dissolute in his morals. He was of the naval profession, and had distinguished himself in the last war, when very young, in the attack on Cherbourg, under lord Howe, by his spirit and gallantry. His affability and courage, conjoined with the common advantages of youth, had acquired him no inconsiderable degree of popularity amongst the vulgar; and the esteem of the wise he never sought. Belsham.

His majesty went to the house of peers, on the 24th of November, and opened the session with a speech from the throne, in which he informed the members that he had assembled them at so early a period, to give them time to deliberate with steadiness and discretion; and he recommended to them the state of the nation with respect to the high price of provisions. The business of this session being brought to a conclusion, on the 10th of March, 1768 (i), his majesty appeared at the house of peers and thanked the parliament, for the many signal proofs they had given of their affectionate attachment to his person, family, and government; and concluded with the following words: "In the approaching election of representatives, I doubt not but my people will give fresh proofs of their attachment to the true interest of their country; which I shall ever receive as the most acceptable mark of their affection to me. The welfare of all my subjects is my first object. Nothing therefore has ever given me more real concern, than to see any of them, in any part of my dominions, attempting to loosen those bonds of constitutional subordination so essential to the welfare of the whole; but it is with much satisfaction that I now see them returning to a more proper sense of what is their own interest, no less than their duty, indispensibly requires of them; and thereby giving me the prospect of continuing to reign over a happy, because an united people." The parliament was then prorogued to the last day of the month: but on the 12th of April it was dissolved by proclamation.

It has been before observed, that Mr. Wilkes had retired to France. He had been resident in that kingdom for a considerable time; and as he had thus neglected to appear to the indictments preferred against him, he was declared an outlaw. Previously, however, to the general election he returned to England, and to the great astonishment of the public, declared himself a candidate to represent the city of London in parliament. Not succeeding in this attempt, he became a candidate for the county of Middlesex, and on the 28th of March was elected by a very considerable majority (k).

The general election was carried on with great impetuosity, and violent contests ensued in many parts of the kingdom. Nor did the disorders, which arose on this occasion, subside with it. A general dissatisfaction prevailed among the lower orders of the people, partly from other causes. The riotous assemblies of the weavers, coal-heavers, and sailors, kept the metropolis and its environs in continual alarm. From some unknown cause, just at this period, the civil power seemed to lose its force and energy, and too frequently gave occasion for the dangerous interposition of a military force in its support: the unhappy effects of which are still felt in the minds of many of the present day (l).

On the 10th of May the members of the new parliament formally took their seats in the house: and the following day the commons having re-chosen sir John Cust for their speaker, presented him to the lords commissioners for their approbation, who were pleased in his majesty's name to approve their choice. After which the lord chancellor opened the session with a speech, by virtue of his majesty's commission. A joint address was presented by the lords and commons on this occasion, beseeching his majesty to exert his authority for suppressing the disorders and tumults which prevailed to so alarming a degree; at the same time assuring him, that nothing should be wanting on their parts which might enable him to maintain the public authority, and carry the laws into due execution; and soon after an end was put to this short session.

On the 11th of August, the king of Denmark arrived at St. James's, on a visit to his majesty. He was attended by most of his great officers of state, and the utmost respect was shewed him by all ranks of people. But nothing less than the most unbounded dissipation seemed to have taken place. His Danish majesty gave orders for a masquerade, which was one of the most magnificent that had ever been seen in England; and while the necessary preparations for it were making, he visited Cambridge, where he was elegantly entertained in the hall of Trinity College. From thence he proceeded to York, Leeds, and Manchester; and on his return to London, passing through Oxford, he was met by the whole university in procession. When he arrived at the senate house, the public orator complimented him in a most elegant speech in Latin, to which (h) The present emperor of the French, Napoleon Bonaparte, was born in this island, shortly after it was taken possession of by the French; so that he could not be considered altogether as a foreigner, but was actually a native of the French monarchy.

(i) The new year (1768) began with a very severe frost, which aggravated the calamity of the lower classes of the people, who were greatly distressed from the exorbitant price of food. On the 9th of January, the river Thames below London bridge, presented the appearance of a general wreck; ships, boats, &c. lying in a confused and scattered manner; some on shore, and others injured or overset by the ice. A fish-boat was discovered near Deptford Creek, jammed in by the ice, and all the people in it were frozen to death: one of whom, a youth of seventeen, was found sitting erect, and had all the appearance of being perfectly alive.

(k) On the 20th of the same month he surrendered himself to the court of King's Bench, and on the 27th was committed to the King's Bench prison. Soon after his trial came on in that court, and being found guilty, he received the following sentence: "That for the republication of the North Briton, No. XLV. he should pay a fine of five hundred pounds, and be imprisoned ten calender months; and for publishing the "Essay on Woman," that he should likewise pay a fine of five hundred pounds, and be imprisoned twelve calender months, to be computed from the expiration of the former imprisonment, and that he should afterwards find security for his good behaviour for seven years, himself in the sum of one thousand pounds, and two sureties in five hundred each."

(l) The most fatal of the disturbances at this time was that which happened in St. George's Fields on the 10th of May, and evinced the rash violence exercised against the people on account of their attachment to Mr. Wilkes, then a prisoner in the King's Bench. The particulars of this remarkable affair are as follow: The parliament being to assemble on that day, great numbers of people assembled about the prison, expecting that Mr. Wilkes would, on that account, obtain his liberty, and intending to conduct him to the house of commons. Finding themselves disappointed, they grew tumultuous, and a party of the third regiment of guards was sent for. The riot was much increased by a paper, that had been stuck against the wall of the prison, which was forcibly taken down by one of the justices for the Borough. The populace insisted on the restoration of this paper, which the justice not regarding, the tumult became extremely violent; the drums beat to arms, and the riot act was read, during which great quantities of stones and filth were thrown by the populace. William Allen, a youth, son of Mr. Allen, keeper of the horse-shoe inn, in Blackman Street, Southwark, being pursued with others, was unfortunately singled out, rancorously pursued by three soldiers, and shot to death. These measures not having any tendency to disperse the mob, an additional number of the guards was sent for, as also a party of horse grenadiers; but the people becoming still more numerous, they were fired on by the soldiers, when five were killed upon the spot, and about fifteen wounded. Among the latter were two women, one of whom afterwards died in St. Thomas's hospital. The following day an inquisition was taken by the coroner for Surrey, on the above William Allen, when the jury gave their verdict, that Donald Maclaine was guilty of wilful murder, and Donald Maclaury, and Alexander Murray, (the last of whom was commanding officer), were aiding and abetting therein. This inquest was held at the house of Mr. Allen; and it appeared on examination, that the deceased was only a spectator, and on seeing some persons run, he ran also, but was unhappily mistaken, and followed by the soldiers into a cow-house, where he was fired at. Maclaury and Murray were admitted to bail, but Maclaine was committed to prison for the murder. He was afterwards tried at the Surrey assizes at Guildford, and acquitted. Mr. Allen was buried in the church yard of St. Mary, Newington Butts, where an elegant tomb, enclosed with iron rails, was erected to his memory, on which were engraven several pertinent passages; and many people still resort to the spot, and lament the rashness of the military which caused the death of this unfortunate young man. Two other inquisitions were taken in the Borough on persons killed by the soldiers in this riot; one on the body of Mary Jeffs, who having a basket with oranges, was shot in removing them; the other on William Bridgman, who was shot on the top of a hay cart, as he was observing some of these outrages at a distance; on both these inquisitions, the jury brought in their verdict "Chance-Medley."

The populace were also much irritated by the grant of the royal pardon to two rioters, who had been convicted of murder at the election for Middlesex, to succeed Mr. Cooke their late member, who was deceased. The court recommended this clemency, as it did not clearly appear to the best chirurgical judges that the blow, which some considered as fatal, did occasion the death of the supposed murdered person.

The spirit of revenge against the supporters of government in the late proceedings, was carried to a considerable excess. Gillam, the magistrate, who authorized the guards to fire, was indicted for murder; but the jury acquitted him on the evidence for the prosecution.

his majesty replied in the same language. He was then presented with a diploma as doctor of the civil and canon laws, and walked in honorary robes with the doctors and regents. Early in the month of October, his Danish majesty left England; and nearly at the same time, several changes occurred in the English cabinet.

Violent disturbances happened in America on account of some duties which had been imposed on glass, salt, and other commodities imported from England. It was thought that the repeal of the stamp act would have given some satisfaction to the colonists, but they still insisted that it was their inherent privilege to tax themselves. At Boston the people assembled in a large body, and entered into several resolutions not to import any goods of a superfluous nature, but to be regulated by the strictest œconomy, both in apparel and furniture. A subscription was opened for the encouragement of their own manufactures, and the establishment of new ones. The freeholders, and all the inhabitants of Massachusett's Bay, had reposed the greatest confidence in their representatives, and a continual contest existed between them and their governor (m). Governor Barnard had dissolved the assembly of representatives, and new ones having been chosen, he insisted on their making a public act to declare their disapprobation of the conduct of the late assembly. They, however, requested to see a copy of the governor's instructions, which was granted them; and, to their astonisment, they found, that if they refused to comply with his request, they were to be dissolved, and an account of their conduct transmitted to England, to be laid before the next session of parliament. This set the whole colony in a flame; and when the bill was brought in to pass a censure on the conduct of the last assembly, ninety-two voted against it, and no more than seventeen for it. The rest of the colonies took the alarm, and followed their example; while combinations were formed almost every where not to take any goods from England, except such as were absolutely necessary for the preservation of their lives.

The discontents among the people of Boston now broke out into open violence: a ship having landed a cargo of wine, and taken on board another of oil, without paying any attention to the new laws by which the new customs were to be regulated, the officers displayed a signal to the Romney man of war, who instantly sent her boats; and having cut down the masts of the trading vessel, hawled her alongside of the king's ship. This was so highly resented by the populace, that they rose in great numbers, demolished the habitations of the custom-house officers, seized the commissioners boat, dragged it on shore, and set it on fire. During these tumults in the town, the governor dissolved the assembly; but that was of no avail, for the disturbances daily increased; two regiments were consequently sent from Ireland to support the civil power. Their place of rendezvous was to be at Halifax in Nova Scotia; and no sooner had the people of Boston received intelligence that they were landed there, than they assembled and chose a president from among themselves, who was deputed to wait on the governor, to know for what reason, or with what view, his majesty's forces were to be sent among them. They desired, at the same time, that a general assembly might be summoned to meet; but he informed them, that it was their duty to break up their tumultuous meetings, and submit quietly to the laws. He added, however, that as they seemed ignorant of the offence they had committed, he must take the liberty to assure them, that, unless they submitted to the government, he should be obliged to treat them as rebels. From this period, the governor refused to receive any messages from them; in consequence of which they sent a detail of their grievances to London, to be laid before the ministry. In the mean time, the transports, with the two regiments, and a train of artillery, arrived from Halifax, and were quartered in the houses of the townsmen; but as the military laws did not extend to America, any farther than providing barracks for them, it was ordered by the governor, that they should have barrack provisions, that they might be as little burthensome to the people as possible. This part of the governor's conduct gave general satisfaction to the more moderate, but a great majority were still discontented. They beheld, with jealousy, an armed force quartered among them in a time of peace; but with respect to their late combinations, they considered them as efforts to maintain their freedom.

In the East Indies our affairs now began to wear a different aspect; and it was even feared that a revolution would take place to the disadvantage of the company, whose stock was now advanced to an astonishing height. Hyder Ally, a man who had served some time as a common soldier, and was then of the rank of a sergeant, having received an affront from his officer, quitted the army and raised a chosen band of followers, with a view of driving the English out of all their settlements in that part of the world. Having brought over the Nizam of the Decan to his interest; and having raised a large body of forces, he prepared to take the field. Colonel Smith, in the company's service, was dispatched to oppose this formidable alliance; and a most desperate engagement ensued, in which Hyder Ally displayed all the courage and conduct of the most consummate general. He made his dispositions with so much prudence, that it was no easy matter to attack him. The Asiatic general rode from one place to another, to encourage his men; but at last they gave way, and the English continued pursuing them with great slaughter. All their cannon and ammunition fell into the hands of the victors, besides a vast quantity of treasure; and the Nizam perceiving the danger he was in from his connections with Hyder Ally, concluded a peace with the company. This, however, did not terminate the war; for Hyder Ally, finding himself deserted by the Nizam, transferred the seat of war into a mountainous part of the country, where it was extremely difficult to attack him, as he was exceedingly well acquainted with all the passages and defiles, and could defend himself even against a great superiority of numbers.

By the death of Mr. Townshend, the chancellor of the exchequer, the English ministry were thrown into some confusion. As a change in the ministry was the natural consequence, lord North was appointed chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Thomas Townshend, paymaster of the forces, earl Gower president of the council, lord Weymouth one of the secretaries of state, and Mr. Rigby was nominated one of the vice-treasurers of Ireland. This parliament assembled on the 24th of November, when his majesty went to the house of peers, and opened the session with a speech from the throne, in which he expressed his wishes that the parliament would prosecute the consideration of those great commercial interests which had been entered upon before, but which the shortness of the last session had prevented from being brought to a termination. He animadverted on the conduct of the Americans, and observed, that the capital of one of the colonies was in an actual state of disobedience, having proceeded to measures subversive of the constitution, and attended with circumstances which manifested a disposition to disavow their dependence on the mother country; but that he did not doubt, with their assistance and concurrence, of being able to defeat the mischievous designs of those turbulent incendiaries, who, under false pretences, had too successfully deluded numbers of his subjects in America; and whose practices, if suffered to prevail, could not fail to produce the most fatal consequences to his colonies immediately, and in the end to all the dominions of his crown.

In consequence of the dearness of provisions, a bill was introduced, which passed both houses, and received the royal assent. This bill prevented, for a limited time, the exportation of corn, and gave great satisfaction to the public. The parliament then took into consideration the (m) The earl of Shelburne had sent a letter to the governor, complaining of these abuses, and it was read in the open assembly of the representatives. This occasioned most vehement debates, and some of the members declared, that the governor had misrepresented their conduct to the ministry. They denied the charges in the letter, and wrote to the earl of Shelburne on the subject, vindicating themselves, and fixing the whole blame on the governor. At the same time, the merchants at Boston ordered their agent to represent to the lords of the treasury, that unless these duties, which had occasioned so much mischief, were taken off, the trade of the province would be destroyed, as they seemed contrary to the spirit of the constitution, and inconsistent with their charter. Their representations occasioned the establishment of a new officer, who was to act as secretary of state for the colonies in America; and the first person appointed was the earl of Hillsborough, at that time first lord of trade. His lordship's first act, in this new character, was to send circular letters to the governors of the provinces informing them, that his majesty was highly displeased at the conduct of the people, as it tended to create confusion, and to throw every thing into the utmost disorder. He said, their conduct in opposing the legislative power of Great Britain was little better than an act of open rebellion; for, by giving encouragement to such practices, the government would be overturned, and the laws totally disregarded. He concluded by recommending to them to preserve the public peace, by punishing all disorders of an evil tendency; but as to mere opposition in words, or in scandalous libels, they were to treat them with the contempt they deserved.

state

state of public affairs in America. A petition was presented, signed by Mr. Danforth, president of the council of Boston, praying a repeal of the revenue acts. The petition was fraught with modesty and humility, and contained a promise, that if the acts were repealed, the people would make an ample compensation, by voluntary taxations on themselves. Much debating took place in both houses respecting this petition; those of the ministerial party adopting similar arguments to those which had been urged when the stamp act was debated upon. The lords agreed to address his majesty on American affairs; and their resolution, being adhered to by the commons, became the joint act of both. It was farther resolved, that the town of Boston was in a state of disorder and confusion, disturbed by riots and tumults of a dangerous nature, in which the officers of the revenue had been obstructed in the discharge of their duty, and their lives endangered; that neither the council of the province, nor the magistrates in general, had exercised their authority for suppressing those tumultuous proceedings; that the execution of the laws would be rendered abortive, without the assistance of a military force to support the civil power, and protect the officers of the customs; and that the resolutions of the town meetings in Boston were unconstitutional, and calculated to excite sedition and insurrection against the government. It was also agreed, that all those who had dispatched circular letters to the other colonies, were insulting the dignity of the crown, and had committed a daring insult on the legislative power of Great Britain. His majesty was therefore desired to issue a special commission, to enquire into the causes of these disorders, as authorised by the statute of the thirtieth of Henry VIII. These arguments were opposed by the opposition. It was observed, among other things, that it was the duty of those in power to promote the interest of the people both at home and abroad; but if such a measure was carried into execution, it would increase the seditions complained of in the colonies, and consequently injure the trade of the mother country. They concluded by calling upon the ministry to produce the person, who had advised his majesty to enforce the statute of Henry VIII. as had been recommended.

In the interim, Mr. Wilkes published a letter written by lord Barrington, secretary at war, to the justices of the county of Surrey, to which he prefixed an introduction (n) which greatly offended the house of lords, who voted it "an insolent, scandalous, and seditious libel, tending to inflame the minds of his majesty's subjects to sedition, and to a total subversion of all good order and legal government." The lords then complained to the commons, who confirmed the vote of the peers, expelled Mr. Wilkes their house, and ordered a new writ to be issued for the county of Middlesex: Mr. Wilkes was, however, unanimously re-chosen, and again expelled by the commons, who at the same time pronounced him incapable of being a member of that house. On the 13th of April a new election for the county of Middlesex came on at Brentford, the county town. The candidates on this occasion were Mr. Wilkes, Mr. Luttrell, (who had vacated his seat for the mere purpose of superseding Mr. Wilkes,) Mr. serjeant Whitaker, and Mr. Roach, when Mr. Wilkes had a majority of eight hundred and fifty-seven votes: notwithstanding which he was rejected by the house of commons, and Mr. Luttrell declared duly elected (o), in defiance of the laws of parliamentary election. A petition against him was, however, duly preferred, and the house confirmed their resolution in favour of Mr. Luttrell.

His majesty repaired to the house of peers on the 9th of May, and terminated the session with a speech from the throne, in which he told them, that every part of their conduct gave him the greatest satisfaction. He applauded them for their attention to the interests of the people, and the suppression of riots and tumults, which had been so frequent, not only in London, but in many parts of the kingdom.

Not many days elapsed, before the freeholders of Middlesex, who thought themselves particularly injured by the decision of the house of commons against Mr. Wilkes, in favour of Mr. Luttrell, presented a petition to the king; which contained a very long catalogue of grievances relative to infringements on the constitution, from the first prosecution of Mr. Wilkes, to his expulsion from the house of commons as member for Middlesex. The city of London, and many of the counties in England, followed the example of Middlesex, and presented petitions and remonstrances to the throne; but the only answer they received was, that his majesty would not do any thing without the consent of his parliament.

When the parliament met again, the session was opened by his majesty, as usual, with a speech from the throne; in which no mention was made of the petitions and remonstrances from the different counties relative to the Middlesex election. The articles chiefly noticed were the distracted state of America, and the distemper which had broke out among the horned cattle. The former was, in the strongest terms, recommended to their serious attention, as a matter of the utmost importance to the dignity of government. The other was mentioned as a most direful calamity, and every one was desired to exert themselves in endeavouring to impede the progress of the contagion. His majesty's speech received the severest comments from the public in general, who supposed nothing should be so much dwelt on as the petitions and remonstrances. Ridicule was circulated with the greatest freedom, especially as the distemper among the black cattle was not believed to be so universal as had been represented.

The affairs of the colonies, and also of Corsica, were discussed during this session. Various papers were desired by the members of opposition, for a due investigation of the conduct of the ministry with regard to that island; but such communications were refused by the majority. The American concerns were productive of warm debates in both houses; and a course of enquiry was followed by resolutions, condemning the proceedings of the Massachuset colonists, and by an address to the king, in which he was requested to give orders for the transmission of full information from America, respecting treasonable acts committed by any of those provincials, that the accused might be tried in Great Britain. The idea of subjecting the colonists to a remote and prejudiced judicature, met with strong and just animadversion.

When the new parliament of Ireland had assembled, the lord lieutenant made another attempt for the augmentation of the army; and a majority agreed to the scheme. But on the 21st of November, the commons rejected a pecuniary bill, because it did not originate in their house. The viceroy protested against this ground of rejection, as inconsistent with the established rights of the crown; but the commons would not suffer his declaration to be recorded in their journal, though the peers consented to the insertion of it in their register. When the supplies had been granted in the mode which the lower house preferred, a prorogation was ordered with intimations of disgust, without regard to the inconvenience which the nation sustained from this abrupt dismission of the two houses.

The parties by which Great Britain was divided, looked forward to the meeting of parliament; and, as soon as the session was opened, on the 9th of January, 1770, a great warmth of debate arose. To the address proposed by the house of commons, an amendment was offered by Dowdeswell, intimating, that an enquiry would be made into the causes of the prevailing discontent. It was denied by the courtiers, that the discontent was general, or that the petitions expressed the real sentiments of the nation; but the members of opposition, among whom Edmund Burke distinguished himself, affirmed, that the majority of the people, on just grounds, complained of the conduct of the ministry, and that it was highly expedient for the house to enter upon the proposed enquiry, and devise the means of removing the foundations of complaint. The amendment was rejected; as was also that which the earl of Chatham proposed to the peers. This nobleman had resigned his post in the autumn of 1768; and now took a decided part in opposition to the ministry. He moved, that the lords should promise in their address, to examine the proceedings relative to the incapacitation of Mr. Wilkes, by which the commons had invaded the rights of the people. Lord Mansfield attacked this amendment with spirit; and the noble earl vindicated his motion with zeal: even lord (n) For this offence, and others of which he had been convicted, and which had disqualified him from attending his parliamentary duty, the commons voted his expulsion, A. D. 1769.

(o) At the fourth election, Mr. Wilkes was again returned by the sheriffs; the votes in his favour being one thousand two hundred and forty-three, to two hundred and ninety six; but, on a petition from colonel Luttrell, he was, after a violent debate continued to a very late hour (March 3, 1769,) declared duly elected. Vid. Belsham's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 281.

Camden, who had for some years tamely acquiesced in the measures of the court, supported the opinion of his friend. For this conduct the chancellor was deprived of his office; and the honourable Charles Yorke, son of the late lord chancellor Hardwicke, (although he had positively told his brother that he would not, upon any terms, listen to the offers of the court,) was seduced, by the personal intreaties of the king, to an acceptance of the vacant employment. His brother, in consequence of his violation of his engagement to him, refused to admit him into his house; and Mr. Yorke, repenting of his dishonourable weakness, put a period to his existence in the course of three days. The great seal was then put in commission; and, after the lapse of a year, it was delivered to the custody of judge Bathurst, who was not a very able lawyer.

The duke of Grafton had proposed in the cabinet, a repeal of all the post duties imposed on the Americans in the year 1767; but a majority of the ministers differed from him, and it was resolved that the duty on tea should remain. This circumstance, added to the dismission of lord Camden, which the duke disapproved, and reinforced by the consideration of that general clamour which he had excited by an invasion of the rights of election, urged him to resign his trust, on the 28th of January, 1770, and lord North was appointed first commissioner of the treasury.

The proceedings with regard to the Middlesex election now became the topics of renewed discussion. Dowdeswell in one house, and the marquis of Rockingham in the other, moved for a declaration, that the commons, in the exercise of their jurisdiction, ought to judge of elections by the law of the land, and by the practice of parliament. The efforts of the marquis were likewise unsuccessful, though the earl of Chatham afforded the aid of his energetic eloquence. The motion was easily baffled by the ministerial peers, who assented to one which was more likely to please the commons, as it contained a strong censure of all the resolutions which might impeach their decisions, respecting those points in which "their jurisdiction is competent, final, and conclusive." After an interval of some months, the earl revived the affair, by presenting a bill for the reversal of those abjudications of the lower house, which related to Mr. Wilkes and his opponent; but it was exploded by a majority of above two to one.

The citizens of London, offended at his majesty's neglect of a petition which they had presented to him in the preceding year, renewed their complaints in a spirited remonstrance; wherein they affirmed, that, under the malignant influence of his secret advisers, the commons had violated the freedom of election, and had "done a deed which must vitiate all the future proceedings of this parliament;" that the present house, not representing the people, was an illegal assembly; and that a new appeal to the electors, and a removal of evil counsellors, were requisite preparatives to the restoration of constitutional government. His majesty, in the answer which he gave to this address, made specious professions of equity and patriotism; and expressed his surprize at the behaviour of those who had been "so far misled," as to offer him a remonstrance, the contents of which he considered as "disrespectful to himself, injurious to the parliament, and irreconcileable to the principles of the constitution (p)." The earl of Chatham urged the peers to pronounce a condemnation of this answer; but his oratory was unavailing. The commons voted, that it was unwarrantable and seditious to deny the validity of the acts of the present parliament; and both houses concurred in an address, strongly reprobating the factious spirit displayed in the remonstrance. Some of the abettors of the ministry recommended the signal punishment of the civil leaders, but the court, apprehensive of violent commotions, declined an adoption of such advice. The earl continued to favour the views of the citizens, by moving, that the lords should request the king to dissolve the parliament; but the house rejected the proposal with indignation (q).

That the discontents might be allayed which still prevailed among the Americans, who persisted in discouraging the trade with Great Britain, the new premier moved for the repeal of the late port duties, with the exception of that which related to tea. On the other hand, it was alledged, that the provincials would not be satisfied, unless this duty should also be taken off: but the minister urged the expediency of maintaining the authority of the legislature, by an assertion of that right which was disputed by the colonists; and an act was accordingly passed in pursuance of his recommendation.

Resolutions declarative of a strong disapprobation of the conduct of the court with regard to North America, were moved in both houses; and the pernicious effects of such a system were predicted. Messrs. Burke, Wedderburne, and the duke of Richmond distinguished themselves in these attacks, which, however, were unsuccessful. But before the act of partial repeal was completed, a riot arose at Boston from the jealousy which the inhabitants entertained of the soldiery; and some lives were sacrificed by the rage of military resentment. The flame of discord spread through the town; and the people insisted on the removal of the troops; a demand which met with acquiescence. The repeal contributed to calm the minds of the provincials; and the associations against the British trade were, in general, discontinued: but the reservation of a controverted right precluded a fullness of satisfaction.

On the 19th of May, the king went to the house of peers, and closed the session with a speech from the throne, in which he applauded both houses for zealously supporting the interest and honour of the nation.

A dispute between Great Britain and Spain diverted the public attention from other contentions. A settlement had been formed on one of the Malouine or Falkland islands, for the convenience of a whale-fishery, and for the facilitation of hostile enterprizes against the Spanish colonies in South America. The governor of Port Solidad, (a contemptible Spanish settlement,) considering the English as intruders upon his master's extensive claim of American dominion, desired, without effect, their retreat from Port Egmont, the commandant of which had previously ordered the Spaniards to quit the neighbourhood. The English, on the contrary, claimed an exclusive right, as the first occupants of a country which their ancestors had discovered in the reign of queen Elizabeth. Some Spanish frigates at length appeared off the coast; and a descent was made, on the 20th of June, 1770, which quickly produced the capitulative surrender of the colonists of Port Egmont, who were permitted to retire with their property. This attack was considered, by the British nation, as combining insult with injury; and, though it made less impression on the court than on the people, naval preparations were ordered. Harris, the British minister at Madrid, demanded satisfaction for the violence and indignity offered to his countrymen; but no accommodation had taken place when the parliament re-assembled. Warm addresses were then voted for the support of such measures as the king should deem most preservative of the honour of the crown and the rights of the nation. From a desire of implicating the ministry in the censure of negligence, the duke of Richmond moved for the production of such accounts as had been received at court (by the month of September last) respecting the hostilities of the Spaniards; but the peers refused to comply with his wish before an agreement was signed. In the debate which arose on this occasion, the earl of Chatham inveighed against the pusillanimity of those ministers who "made it a matter of negociation whether his majesty's dominions should be restored to him or not." Restitution, he said, ought to be immediately enforced; and it might then be justifiable to treat with the aggressors upon the satisfaction which they should make for the insult offered to the British crown. A convention was at length adjusted between the kings of Spain and Great Britain. The prince de Masserano, on the part of the former, signed a declaration, on the 22nd of January, 1771, disavowing the conduct of the Spanish officer who had seized Port Egmont, and promising the restitution of that settlement, with all its contents, the question of the sovereignty of the Malouine islands remaining undecided. The earl of Rochford signed an acceptance of this declaration; and his catholic majesty sent orders for the execution of the agreement. If this affair had thus terminated, there would have been little reason for blaming the ministry: but a secret article which was added to the convention, was dishonourable to Great Britain, as it not only imported that the king should give the first orders for disarming, but that the islands should be wholly abandoned by the subjects of this realm, after the farce of repossession should have been performed. Great Britain purchased this disgrace by such augmentations of force as added three millions to the expences of the year.

(p) The common-council of the city afterwards presented an address, praying a redress of grievances; but, as no satisfaction was obtained, William Beckford, then lord-mayor of London, muttered some expressions of displeasure, which were improved by one of his friends into a regular speech, containing severe reflections on the evil counsellors of his majesty.

(q) This session a bill was brought forward by lord Grenville, for the better regulation of the proceedings of the commons in cases of controverted election; and, though it was opposed by the minister, it passed into a law: it has been found useful in restraining the partiality of such decisions. Another act of this period mentioned felony, and some other crimes, as offences which should render incapacitation the consequence of expulsion from the house of commons. A third statute, by no means unpopular, diminished the personal privileges of members of the senate.

When an address was proposed in each house, expressing an approbation of the ostensible terms of the agreement, the members of opposition attacked the ministry, not only for having been guilty of negligence and delay, in point of negociatory remonstrance and hostile preparation, but for having disgraced the king and country by a convention which, after the expence of millions, "settled no contest, asserted no right, exacted no reparation, and afforded no security." Both houses, however, refused to admit any amendment by which the address of either assembly would have been rendered less acceptable to the court.

A most flagrant scene of corruption was discovered about this time, by the committee appointed to determine contested elections; and, in particular, that of New Shoreham, in Sussex. The returning officer for that borough had returned a candidate who had only thirty-seven votes, in preference to one who had eighty-seven, of which he doubted seventy-six, and therefore made his return without examining, as he ought to have done, whether they were legal votes or not. In the course of the examination of witnesses, it appeared, that a great number of freemen had formed themselves into a society, under the title of the Christian Club; the apparent views of which institution were to promote acts of charity and benevolence, and to answer all such purposes as were consistent with the doctrines of the Christian religion. But regardless of all these pretensions, it was evident that they made a traffic of their oaths and consciences, and offered their borough to sale to the highest bidder; while the rest of the freemen were deprived of the privilege of giving their legal votes. The returning officer had belonged to this society, but having taken some disgust at the conduct of his companions in iniquity, he had quitted their party. Being called before the committee, he assigned as a reason for having made such an unequal return, that he knew, from his own experience, that the majority of the voters had taken bribes; and, that they had absolutely proposed to sell their borough to any one who would offer the largest sum for it. This combination at Shoreham was of too flagrant a nature to be overlooked; but as the powers of the select committee did not permit them to proceed any farther, they reported the whole matter to the house, and moved, that they would make a further enquiry into the particulars of this nefarious transaction: in consequence of which, an act passed, rendering eighty-one freemen of the borough of Shoreham incapable of voting at any election, and the attorney-general was ordered to prosecute all the members of the club. The right of electing members for that borough, in consequence of this transaction, was also extended to all the freeholders in the Rape of Bramber, in the county of Sussex, who had tenements of the value of forty shillings. This act of justice gave great satisfaction to the country in general.

About this time a circumstance happened, which it was greatly feared would have been attended with the most alarming consequences. The printers of certain newspapers were in the habit of detailing the debates of the members of both houses. These communications were so gratifying to the public, that the success of a newspaper was principally dependent on the reports of parliamentary proceedings. Those members who did not conceive that justice had been done to their harangues, were offended at the freedom of the reporters, and colonel Onslow made a complaint to the house of two publishers of newspapers, Thompson and Wheble, who were cited before the house, but refused to appear; whereupon a proclamation was published with a reward for apprehending them. This produced the desired effect. J. Wheble (q), one of these booksellers, was apprehended and taken before John Wilkes (r), esquire, the sitting alderman at Guildhall: but he discovering that the person who apprehended Mr. Wheble had no accusation against him, and only apprehended him on the authority of the proclamation; and at the same time Mr. Wheble declaring that the apprehender had forcibly detained him, and brought him there, the alderman immediately discharged him, and bound him over to prosecute his accuser. Mr. Miller, also printer of a public paper, (the London Evening Post,) was likewise taken into custody by a messenger from the house of commons, who, on his refusing to go with him, took him by the arm, in consequence of which a constable was sent for, and Mr. Miller gave him charge of the messenger for assaulting him in his own house: he was therefore taken to the Mansion House, and a hearing came on before the lord mayor, and the aldermen Wilkes and Oliver. In the mean time, the serjeant at arms being informed of this transaction, came to demand the bodies of the messenger and of Mr. Miller. The lord mayor asked the messenger, if he had applied to a magistrate to indorse the warrant, or to any peace officer of the city to assist him; and on his replying in the negative, his lordship declared, that no power could seize a citizen of London, without an order from him, or some other magistrate; and that he was of opinion, the seizing of Miller and the warrant were both illegal; he therefore declared Mr. Miller to be at liberty, and proceeded to examine witnesses to prove the assault by the messenger: which being accomplished, his lordship asked the latter, if he chose to give bail. This he at first refused to do; but his commitment being actually made out, he thought proper to comply, when he himself was bound in forty pounds, and two sureties in twenty pounds, for his appearance at the next sessions at Guildhall.

This circumstance produced many and tedious debates in the house of commons, where at length it was resolved, "That the proceeding of the lord mayor and Mr. Oliver, was a breach of the privilege of that house," and they were both committed to the Tower, where they continued till the prorogation of parliament, which happened on the 8th of May, when his majesty terminated the session with a speech from the throne.

While the lord mayor and Mr. alderman Oliver continued in the Tower, they were addressed and applauded for their spirited conduct in maintaining the authority of the laws of their country, by every ward in London, and by several of the principal towns and boroughs in England. Great preparations were made for conducting the two patriots from the Tower; but the parliament being prorogued one day sooner than was expected, a few only of the aldermen could attend. The procession was, however, magnificent, and they were conducted to the Mansion House amidst hosts of applauding spectators. From this time, without dreading the effects of parliamentary displeasure, the printers have regularly published the debates of the two houses, in the newspapers of the following day: nor is it to be supposed, that the sources of that intelligence will be withheld from the people, by the legislature.

During the recess of parliament, an event occurred, which gave great surprize to the whole nation. This was the marriage of his royal highness the duke of Cumberland with Mrs. Horton, a widow lady, and daughter of lord Irnham, of the kingdom of Ireland. This circumstance occasioned great uneasiness at court, especially as it had been openly acknowledged by the parties, and not attempted to be concealed like the marriage of the duke of Gloucester with the countess dowager of Waldegrave.

The parliament meeting on the 21st of January, 1772, the session was opened by his majesty with a speech from the throne; in which he expressed much satisfaction, that neither the foreign nor domestic state of affairs required their more early attendance; that now they were assembled, they would, doubtless, attend to the interests of the nation, and regulate its internal policy, as well as its fo-

(q) Wheble was taken by Edward Twine Carpenter, a journeyman printer, and carried before Wilkes, who not only discharged him, but took recognizances for prosecuting the person by whom he was apprehended. Mr. Dowdeswell, who attempted to interest the house of commons in Carpenter's behalf, received the following whimsical answer from Mr. Wedderburne. "As to the affair of Mr. Twine Carpenter, I can see no reason for supporting him; as I understand it, the man is Mr. Wheble's devil. Wheble was arrested by his own devil: he was discharged out of the illegal arrest of this devil: the devil was bound over to answer: whether printer beats devil, or devil beats printer, is of no consequence; there may be the devil to do; there will be the devil to pay: if the devil has had the reward that was advertised, the devil has fairly outwitted the noble lord near me: whether he has or not I do not know; but I hope this house will have nothing to do with him."

(r) This gentleman obtained the office of alderman of London, by his opposition to the court; having before triumphed over the ministry, in the condemnation of the earl of Hallifax to the payment of four thousand pounds damages.

reign commerce. They were likewise informed that the king of Spain had given up Fort Egmont, and that we were on amicable terms with that court. He concluded, with recommending to them to keep the navy on the most respectable footing, to be ready in case of any necessity for the future. Addresses, as usual, were presented to the king on the subject of his speech; after which the public business began, by making proper enquiries into the state of the navy. The minister then proposed, that twenty-five thousand men should be voted for the service of the current year. After urging several arguments in support of the motion, and hearing the replies of the opponents, the question was at length put, and carried by a considerable majority.

About this time a petition was offered to be presented to the commons, by sir William Meredith, for leave to bring in a bill to excuse some of the clergy from subscribing the thirty-nine articles of religion, some of which he declared were unintelligible, absurd, and contradictory, and asserted the illiberality of their wounding tender consciences, to establish external uniformity at the expence of truth and sincerity. It was urged in favour of the motion, that they could not subscribe to doctrines of human invention, but only to the sacred scriptures; and that it was their right to explain them according to what they esteemed their genuine sense and meaning. On the other hand, it was urged, that to grant such an indulgence would be to open a door for all sorts of licentiousness: for, under a pretence, that particular tenets were the pure dictates of conscience, the fundamental doctrines of our holy religion would be subverted; and blasphemy taught in our very churches: that most of those who had associated upon this sinister business had been formerly dissenters, but had quitted their original profession, in order to enjoy some of the revenues of the church, and that they had brought their Arian and Socinian notions with them: that if their consciences were so very tender, they might give up their livings, and return to their conventicles, where they would be at liberty to disseminate what notions they pleased: that they would thus give a convincing proof of their disinterested views; but nothing could be more reasonable, than for a church established by law to bestow her honours upon those who subscribed to her doctrines, and conformed to her discipline. The motion therefore was rejected by a great majority, but not without some severe animadversions on the conduct of those who had promoted the measure.

Mr. Edmund Burke resisted the introduction of the petition, not because the church of England could not subsist independently of the thirty-nine articles, but because the petitioners, by the extraordinary latitude they had taken, rendered their objects indeterminate. "What are we to understand," said he, "by the holy scriptures, which these gentlemen desire to make a profession of their belief in? The Romish canon admits the books of the Apocrypha: the canon of Luther excludes some parts of the Pentateuch, and the whole epistle to the Hebrews; and some ancient fathers have rejected the books of Revelations. Mankind were as little likely to be of one mind in this, as on any other point." Lord North likewise reprobated the desired exemption, and a great majority of the house refused to receive the petition. It was also rejected by an extraordinary majority in the house of peers.

In this session the king sent messages, recommending to both houses to take into their serious consideration, whether it may not be wise to supply the defects of the laws now in being, and, by some new provision, more effectually guard the descendants of his late majesty, except such as were already married to foreign princes, from marrying without the approbation of his majesty, his heirs, and successors. A bill was therefore brought into the house of lords, which fully answered all the purposes intended (s).

The affairs of the East India company, which were at this time in a very perplexed situation, was then taken notice of by the parliament. On the 30th of March, the deputy chairman of the company moved the house for leave to bring in a bill for the better regulation of the servants belonging to the company in India. The grand object in view was, to restrain the governor's council; and, indeed, all the servants belonging to the company, from transacting any sort of business, and to give the directors of the company a sovereign power over their own servants. The motion being carried, an enquiry into the state of India affairs was immediately directed. All the papers belonging to the company, were ordered to be laid before a select committee of the house, and from the perusal of them, many important discoveries were made. Indeed, it was found, that the mode of government in India was, in every respect, arbitrary, unconstitutional, and not calculated for preserving the rights of the people, or the administration of justice to individuals. The committee, finding the business increasing fast, and the season far advanced, desired leave to continue sitting during the recess of parliament, or at least, till such time as they could go through with the intended enquiry.

On the 9th of June his majesty repaired to the house of peers, and closed the session. In his speech on this occasion, he mentioned the laudable conduct of his parliament, that had conducted the affairs of the public with such spirit and propriety. He thanked them for the care they had taken of his family in passing the act respecting the marriage of the royal family; and informed them of the pacific disposition of those persons with whom we had any concern. That there was great reason to believe, that the public tranquillity would not meet with disturbance. The commons were thanked in the most cordial manner for the supplies they had granted; and it was confidently hoped that the national debt would be greatly reduced.

Her royal highness the princess dowager of Wales, mother to his present majesty, died at Carlton House, on the 8th of February, in the fifty-third year of her age (t). By an act of parliament of the tenth of George II. a revenue of fifty thousand pounds per annum for life, was settled on her royal highness, in case she survived the prince, which was to be paid quarterly, and the first payment took place five days after his decease. On the 15th the corpse of her royal highness was interred with the usual solemnities, in Henry the VIIth's chapel in Westminster Abbey (u).

The feelings of George III. were at this time affected with very unpleasant intelligence. His sister Carolina-Matilda, who had become queen of Denmark by marriage, was falsely charged with having carried on a criminal correspondence with count John Frederic Struensee. The count originally practised physic at Altena on the Elbe, and afterwards attended the king of Denmark on his travels into England, in quality of physician. On his return, he advanced in the favour of his royal master, was invested with the order of St. Matilda, instituted in honour of the queen, created a count, and possessed unlimited ministerial power. Unawed by the precarious tenure of courtly greatness, and more peculiarly of his own, he began a general reform. The state felt him through all her members: finances, chancery, army, navy, nobles, peasants—all were sensible of his influence. He not only dictated, but penned his replies to every important question or dispatch; and a petition, or a scheme of public import and utility, rarely waited two hours for an answer. The civil judicature of Copenhagen was then vested in thirty magistrates. Struensee sent a message to this tribunal, demanding

(s) This bill was opposed with great strength of argument, by some of the most respectable peers in the nation. All the judges were sent for, and required to give their opinion, which was, that the marriages of the intermediate branches of the royal family must be approved of by the king, but how far that power extended over collateral branches they could not ascertain. At last the motion was carried, though fourteen lords entered a protest against it, as being inconsistent with the law of nature. In the house of commons, the bill met with a much stronger repulse; but the bill at length passed triumphantly, and soon after received the royal assent.

(t) Her royal highness was the youngest daughter of Frederic II. duke of Saxe-Gotha; born the 30th of November, 1719. She was married the 27th of April, 1736, to Frederic late prince of Wales; by whom she had issue as follow: Augusta, born July 31, 1737, O. S. married to the hereditary prince of Brunswick. George, born May 24, 1738, O. S. now king of Great Britain. Edward, duke of York, born March 14, 1739; died at Monaco, in Italy. Elizabeth, born December 30, 1740; died September 4, 1759. William Henry, duke of Gloucester, born November 14, 1743. Henry Frederic, duke of Cumberland, born October 27, 1745, dead. Louisa, born March 8, 1748, dead. Frederic, born May 13th, 1750: died December 29, 1765. Carolina Matilda, born July 11, (after the death of her father,) 1751; married October 2, 1766, to Christian VII. king of Denmark, dead.

(u) "She was," says Mr. Belsham, "a princess possessed of many virtues, personal and relative, and, till the accession of the present sovereign, greatly beloved and esteemed by the English nation: but in the latter years of her life, it too plainly appeared that the extensive influence she possessed over the mind of the king, her son, was exercised in a manner very pernicious to the nation. It might appear harsh to doubt the general rectitude of her intentions; but unhappily, bred up in the despotism of German courts, she attained not the just ideas of the spirit of the English constitution, or the genius of the people, with whom her name became at length the continued theme of reproach and obloquy." See Belsham's Memoirs, vol. i. 357.

manding to know the annual salary or pension annexed to each member: rather alarmed at this inquiry, they sent an answer, in which they diminished their emoluments two-thirds, and estimated them at fifteen hundred instead of four thousand rix dollars. The count then informed them that his majesty had no further occasion for their services, but, in his royal munificence and liberality, was graciously pleased to continue to them the third part of their avowed incomes, as a proof of his satisfaction with their conduct. He at the same time constituted another court, composed only of six persons of approved integrity, to whom the same power was delegated. He proceeded to purge the chancery and other bodies of the law. Then, entering on the military department, he, at one stroke, broke all the horse guards, and afterwards the regiments of Norwegian foot guards, the finest corps in the service, and who were not disbanded without a short but very dangerous sedition. Still proceeding in this salutary, but most perilous achievement, he ultimately began to attempt a diminution of the power of the nobles, and to set the farmers and peasants at perfect liberty. We must not therefore wonder that he fell a victim to the intrigues of those men whose power he had abridged, and that these powerful parties united to effect his destruction. These were his real crimes, and not that he was too acceptable to the queen, as was falsely made a pretext. Count Struensee was even pressed, a short time before his seizure, to depart from court, and pass the Betts, with the most ample security for his annual remitment of forty, fifty, or a hundred thousand rix dollars; but, not suspecting any sinister intention, he nobly refused to leave his post, being determined to do every thing in his power for the welfare of his country, and was therefore reserved for the prison and the block. The queen dowager and prince Frederic were the feeble instruments to produce the catastrophe, as being by their rank immediately about the person of the king. On the night fixed for seizing the queen and the two unfortunate counts Struensee and Brandt, there was a masked ball in the palace; and when the queen and the two counts had retired from the company about two in the morning, the queen dowager and her son prince Frederic hastened to the king's private chamber, where he was already in bed. They kneeled down by the bed side, and with tears, implored his majesty to save himself and Denmark from impending destruction, by arresting those whom they called the authors of it. The king hesitated, but by their intreaties they at last prevailed on him to affix his sign manual to the paper. Colonel Koller Banner instantly repaired to Struensee's apartment, which, as well as Brandt's, was in the palace; they were both seized nearly at the same instant, and hurried away immediately to the citadel (x). At five in the morning count Rantzau went to the door of the queen's anti-chamber, and knocked for admittance, when one of the women was ordered to awake the queen, and inform her that she was arrested. She was then conveyed to Elsineur, and shut up in the castle of Cronsberg, where she remained for some time closely confined; but, by the interposition of her royal brother, the king of Great Britain, she was set at liberty, and suffered to reside at Zell, in the electorate of Hanover, with a scanty pension, where she languished for some time, and afterwards died with grief. After being confined in dungeons for two months, and not allowed any thing to subsist on but bread and water, and threatened with being put to the torture, unless they made an open confession, sentence of death was passed upon counts Struensee and Brandt, that they should have their right hands cut off, and then their heads; and that, after their quarters had been exposed on the wheel, they should be placed on the most conspicuous parts in the city. Accordingly this sentence was executed, in all its rigour, on the 28th of April, on a scaffold near the city, in the midst of a vast concourse of people. They both behaved with great decency and resignation (y).

On the 26th of November, 1772, the parliament again met, and the session was opened by his majesty with a speech from the throne; in which he informed the members, that his reason for calling them so soon was to take into their consideration some matters of the utmost importance. He declared, that he had been informed that the East India company was in a most distressed condition; and that, as many of his good subjects had their fortunes depending on the credit of that company, its security was now become a national concern. He desired them to take it into their immediate consideration, and, if possible, contrive some rational plan, by which the interest and honour of the company might be restored, and every thing settled on the most permanent foundation. He concluded, by recommending the most prudent methods, in order to reduce the price of provisions, as the distresses of the poor were not imaginary, but real; and that nothing could afford him greater pleasure, than to hear that those distresses were alleviated.

The present state of the navy came immediately under the consideration of the house of commons, and occasioned very animated debates. The objections made by those in opposition were to the following import: They asserted, that the number of seamen was too considerable in time of profound peace; and that we were at peace with all our neighbours, was acknowledged in his majesty's speech. The ministry, on the other hand, urged the necessity of keeping our navy on the most respectable footing; and declared, that our fleet in the East Indies was now much greater than formerly. After a variety of arguments advanced on both sides, the question was put, and being carried by a great majority, the supplies were granted. A motion was now made to enquire into the nature of those causes which occasioned the extraordinary dearth of all sorts of provisions, but nothing had been effected which could be of any real service to the public. Several regulations indeed were adopted with respect to bread, and some restraints laid upon bakers; but the public were very little benefited.

A secret committee having been appointed to enquire into the state of the East India company's affairs, they reported that the situation of the company was exceedingly distressed and deranged. It was therefore suggested, that supervisors should be sent to the East Indies, to make a proper inquiry how far the officers and servants of the company had abused the trust reposed in them, and to have power to afford redress to those who supposed themselves injured. Some of the members who were holders of East India stock vehemently opposed this bill, and others as strongly supported it. At length the motion was carried; and supervisors were appointed, with plenary powers to enquire into the abuses complained of, and to endeavour to redress them (z).

Before the close of the session, his majesty made an excursion to Portsmouth, to inspect the state of the dock-yards, forts, &c. at the arsenals; and to review the fleet assembled at Spithead for that purpose. On his majesty's entering the Land Port Gate, he was saluted by a triple discharge of two hundred and thirty-two pieces of ordnance mounted on the ramparts of Portsmouth, at Block-house Fort, and at South Sea Castle. His majesty then proceeded through the town to the Dock-yard, where the artificers belonging to the yard, being all assembled at the commissioner's house, gave three hearty cheers as his majesty entered, and immediately dispersed, each returning to his respective employment. The shores both on the Portsmouth and Gosport sides, were lined by the populace, who manifested their loyalty with discharges of cannon, acclamations, and other demonstrations of joy. The king expressed the highest approbation of the good order and discipline of his fleet (a), and contributed liberally to release the insolvent prisoners confined in Portsmouth jail.

(x) When count Struensee stepped out of the coach, he said with a smile to the commandant who received him into custody, "I believe you are not a little surprized at seeing me brought here a prisoner."—"No, and please your excellency," replied the old officer bluntly, "I am not at all surprized, on the contrary, I have long expected you."

(y) The crimes of which queen Matilda and counts Struensee and Brandt were accused were these: Struensee was charged with having embezzled from the king's coffers a large sum, amounting to one hundred and twenty-five thousand pounds sterling; of having issued many orders from the cabinet without the king's knowledge; of having been guilty of criminal conversation with the queen; of having secreted from the king several letters sent to his majesty, &c.—Count Brandt was accused of having been privy to Struensee's criminal conversation, and all his other crimes, without divulging them, and of having laid violent hands on the king's majesty, &c. all of which was a contrived falsehood.

(z) Till about this period no provision was made to defray the expences of discharging exculpated felons from prison; instances were produced of some poor creatures lying a whole year in jail, because they could not procure the customary fees. To remedy an evil of so grievous a nature, a bill was brought in to oblige every county to supply the deficiences incurred to the jailers by keeping the prisoners. In consequence of which, the prisoner who is now acquitted must be discharged without demanding payment of his fees. The acquittal by the jury is therefore now considered as an ample liberation to all intents and purposes.

The parliament meeting on the 25th of January, 1774, the session was opened by his majesty, who, in his speech from the throne, recommended to them to take into their serious consideration the state of the colonies, who menaced to throw off all subjection to the British government. He informed them, that the most salutary laws had been treated with contempt; that the colonies were little better than in a state of rebellion: and that, unless some vigorous measures were adopted to enforce obedience, all laws would be trampled under foot, and the regularity which once existed among the different ranks of society, would once more return to its original state of confusion.

In the house of commons vehement debates ensued respecting the address which should be presented to his majesty. The partizans of the court recommended thanks to his majesty for his paternal care of the nation. On the other hand, it was urged, that the colonies, so far from being in a state of rebellion, were only contending for the enjoyment of those rights and privileges which belong to all men in common as members of society: that the mother country had no power to tax those emigrants, unless a consent to that measure was first had and obtained from their own representatives; that the colonies were not regularly, nor in any sense whatever, represented in the British parliament; and therefore, till that legal representation took place, no taxes could, in justice, be imposed upon them. Such were the principal arguments of both parties; but the question being proposed, it was carried by a great majority in favour of the ministry.

The grand object of the court party now appeared to be the total reduction of the colonies to a state of unconditional obedience, and to convince them of the necessity they were under of being subject to the mother-country; a bill was therefore brought in of a very coërcive nature. Three ships laden with tea, which had been sent from England, were plundered by the people of Boston, and their cargoes consisting of three hundred and forty chests, were thrown into the sea. As this was an infringement on private property, it was contended, that it called aloud for the exertion of the regal power. Accordingly, an act passed to remove the customs from the town of Boston, to quarter a military force upon the people, and to block up their harbour by several vessels of war.

During this session of parliament many important affairs were discussed; and several essential acts were passed. Among these was one for the better regulation of the gold coin; and another relative to the naturalization of foreigners.

About this time Henry Sampson Woodfall, printer of the Public Advertiser, and the Rev. John Horne, for causing a libel to be inserted in that paper against the speaker of the house of commons, were ordered before the house. Woodfall obeyed without hesitation, and, on his interrogatory, declared the reverend John Horne author of the noxious paper. A warm debate ensued, in which lord North proposed committing the printer to the Gatehouse. Mr. Fox recommended Newgate; but he was ordered to be taken into the custody of the serjeant at arms. After some demurs, relative to the summons, Mr. Horne was brought before the house. He extricated himself from the accusation with great dexterity: having attempted to remove the imputation of contumacy, he enquired whether Woodfall's declarations were to be taken as evidence, or as the charge against him: after some hesitation he was told, they constituted the charge, and he pleaded, as in any other court not guilty. The house was embarrassed: Woodfall was again called and confronted with Horne; but as he was implicated in the guilt of the publication, his testimony was deemed insufficient to warrant conviction. Three of Woodfall's journeymen afterwards attended: they failed, however, in proving the accusation, and Mr. Horne was set at liberty.

The British ministry were now particularly engaged in providing for the safety of our fellow subjects in the East Indies. It had long been matter of complaint, that the superior servants of the company, at their principal settlements, had acted in a very arbitrary and oppressive manner, nor indeed had any code of laws been formed for their security. The great distance from England rendered it difficult, and almost impossible for any person to obtain redress. It was therefore resolved in council, that four gentlemen learned in the law, and of the most approved integrity, should be sent over to Asia, where we have settlements, to act there in the capacity of judges. They were to hold pleas of the crown, determine in real, mixed, and personal actions, to give judgement in all cases of equity, and in every matter relative to the revenue; but as the settlements are distant from each other, the courts were not to be fixed upon any plan of locality, but to be moveable from one place to another, that justice might be equally distributed to all ranks of people, under the dominion of the English.

CHAP. II.

WE are now arrived at a very eventful period, namely, the commencement of a war between this country and its colonies in the extensive regions of North America. Intelligence of the destruction of the tea at Boston was communicated, in a message from the throne, to both houses of parliament, on the 7th of March; and this conduct of the mal-contents subjected them to the vengeance of parliament. The minister proposed, on the 14th, that a bill should be introduced for the removal of the officers of the customs from Boston, and the suspension of the trade of that port. The Bostonians, he said, had been the instigators of all the disturbances which had occurred in any of the colonies; and it would be a derogation from the honour and justice of Great Britain to suffer them to escape with impunity. Both houses adopted his sentiments, and agreed to the enactment of the bill; which, however, was opposed in its course. It was contended by some members, that the punishment would exceed the offence, and that the exaction of a fine would be sufficient; and, by other speakers, that, if the authors of the late outrage were known, they ought to be prosecuted at common law; but that, if they were unknown, it would be highly unjust to involve a multitude of innocent persons in misery; and that the rigours of the bill were more particularly iniquitous, as the parties were condemned without being heard.

This bill of impolitic severity was followed by two other acts of arbitrary regulation. One of these provided for the alteration of the civil government in the province of Massachusett's Bay; and it tended to the subversion of the democratic part of the constitution which had been granted by charter. It was wholly without effect, that the members of opposition, now reinforced by Charles Fox, (who had for some time been in office, but had lately been dismissed,) reprobated this violation of privilege, and inveighed against the injustice and tyranny of the court. The other statute was calculated for the judicial protection of those who might be indicted in the same province for any capital offence, committed in the aid of magistracy; and it empowered the governor to send such individuals for trial to a different part of America, or to Great Britain. This bill was represented, by colonel Barré and others, in the most odious light, and was earnestly deprecated as a measure which would encourage the habitual insolence of the soldiery, and would lead to such outrages as might exasperate the provincials into open rebellion.

Another very important bill was the produce of this session. It was alledged, that the generality of the Canadians were desirous of a form of government more analogous to that which had prevailed before the conquest of their province than to that which the English inhabitants were willing to introduce; and it was therefore proposed, that the French laws should take place in all controversies relative to civil rights, while the English laws should be appropriated to criminal cases; that the king should appoint a new council, furnished with legislative powers; and that the catholic religion should be established, without prejudice to the maintenance of protestant ecclesiastics. A bill to this effect originated in the house of lords, and after a vehement opposition, was passed into a law. The principal opposers of this bill were the earl of Chatham, Mr. Burke, and Mr. Dunning. The earl of Chatham affirmed, that the bill was extremely reprehensible in every point of view, and was destructive of that liberty which ought to be the basis of every constitution. Burke represented the Canadian noblesse as the only provincials who wished success to the bill, while the majority of their countrymen agreed with the British inhabitants of the colony in preferring the laws of England. Mr. Dunning, who had risen to great eminence in the profession of the law, declared the bill to be the most pernicious which had ever been offered to parliament. By the indulgence granted to the religion of the Canadians, the ministry, he said, intended to cheat them out of the advantages of civil liberty; and it was the aim of the court to render the arbitrary power, which would thus be acquired over a vast extent of country, subservient to the grand object of establishing slavery in the other provinces of North America.

(a) Among the artificers, workmen, and labourers of the dock-yard, victualling office, and gun wharf, his majesty ordered fifteen hundred pounds to be distributed. To the companies of the Barfleur and Augusta yacht, and the crew of his majesty's barge, three hundred and fifty pounds. To the poor of Portsmouth, Portsea, and Gosport, two hundred and fifty pounds.

These acts were followed, in the autumn, by a dissolution of the parliament. It might have been legally continued for another session; but the court wished to make an appeal to the people before the troubles of America should produce actual hostilities. The new elections terminated in favour of the ministry; and new proofs of the ignoble compliance of the senate with the requisitions of royalty, were destined to appear.

It may readily be supposed, that the three bills which affected the Massachusett provincials, highly inflamed their discontent and indignation. The Bostonians were at first apprehensive, that commercial interest would prompt the inhabitants of the neighbouring ports to promote the efficacy of the bill of obstruction; but they soon found that this fear was imaginary. Their cause was espoused by the provincials in general: the day on which their port was to be shut, was observed as a day of fasting: new associations were formed against all intercourse with the British realm; and it was determined that a general congress should take place at Philadelphia.

Lieutenant-general Gage, who had succeeded the unpopular Hutchinson as governor of Massachusett's Bay, had called an assembly of the province according to the ancient charter; but he soon dissolved it, and issued an alarming combinations of the people. His authority being disregarded, he formed a camp near Boston; and, not thinking that the soldiers were secure from an attack, he began to erect fortifications. It was immediately reported, that he was on the point of proceeding to hostilities; and, by this and other rumours, industriously propagated, the popular resentment was kindled to a dangerous height of fury.

The congress at length assembled on the 5th of September; and it was composed of fifty-one deputies from twelve colonies (b). These delegates concurred in resolutions adverse to the high claims of Great Britain; and they prepared a declaration of rights and grievances; addresses to the inhabitants of this island, to the Canadians, and the colonists in general; a remonstrance to general Gage; and a petition to the king. These papers breathed the true spirit of freedom, and were couched in perspicuous and masculine style. To the dictates of this assembly, and of provincial meetings, the people gave a ready submission; and the governors found themselves mere cyphers, in provinces which had been consigned to their plenary authority.

In this critical state of affairs, the new parliament met at Westminster on the 30th of November. The speech of the sovereign on the opening of the session intimated, that a "most daring spirit of resistance and disobedience to the law" still prevailed in the Massachusett province, and that this conduct had been countenanced and encouraged in other colonies; but that proper measures had been taken for the restoration of peace and order; and every attempt "to impair the supreme authority of this legislature over all the dominions of the crown" would be firmly withstood. To an address from the peers, an amendment was proposed, importing, that the king should be desired to communicate, without delay, the accounts which had been received of the state of the colonies, and that the house would then recommend proper steps for securing the honour of the crown, the true dignity of the mother-country, and the harmony and happiness of all the British dominions: but this proposition was over-ruled by a great majority; as was also a similar motion in the house of commons.

At length, in the beginning of 1775, the court communicated, to both houses, garbled extracts of letters from the governors of the American provinces. The earl of Chatham having animadverted on the delay of ministers in the production even of these imperfect papers, conjured the peers to exert themselves on this alarming occasion, and from that torrent of rashness and folly which threatened a civil war. He deprecated the injustice of using coërcive measures against the Americans, who, for refusing to be taxed by the parliament, deserved the praise of spirit, not the censure of contumacy. He concluded with moving for an address, soliciting an order from the king for the removal of the troops from Boston. This motion, being strongly opposed, was unsuccessful. Persisting in his endeavours, the earl presented to the house, on the first of February, 1775, a bill for promoting an accommodation. It declared the colonies to be dependent on the British crown, and, in matters which concerned the whole empire, subject to the controul of the parliament of this kingdom; but exempted those provinces from all taxation, unless it should be decreed by their respective assemblies, or by a congress of deputies from each colony. It also promised a repeal of those statutes which were odious in the eyes of the Americans, as soon as they should recognize the supreme authority of the parliament. Earl Gower and other peers condemned the bill, as tending to a dereliction of the just claims of the mother country, and as inadequate to the attainment of peace; and, on those grounds, it was rejected.

From the disregard with which the petition from the American congress was treated at court, it was not to be expected, that the parliament would pay any attention to the remonstrances of that body. When sir George Saville, at the desire of the agents of that assembly, proposed that they should be heard at the bar of the house of commons in support of the petition, the courtiers indignantly rejected the application. Nor did the petitions of the British merchants, and of persons of other descriptions, meet with due regard.

After the American papers had been examined by the commons, lord North endeavoured on the 2nd of February to convince the house of the expediency of vigorous measures for crushing that spirit of resistance which might be considered as actual rebellion; and he moved for an address, desiring his majesty to enforce obedience in North America, and promising to support him with energy against all rebellious attempts. Dunning and other members contended, that the colonists could not justly be denominated rebels, as they had only opposed, by temperate resolutions, the tyranny of the present state; and they represented the stigma of rebellion, as calculated to render the provincials desperate, and to preclude that reconciliation which might yet be effected. The ministerial orators alledged, that the proceedings of many of the Americans were acts of treason and rebellion; that concessions would only operate as encouragements; that powerful remedies were most suitable to the disease; and that the display of spirit at this crisis might intimidate and reclaim the seditious leaders. The address being sanctioned by the house, the peers declared their readiness to concur in it.

On the 10th of February, lord North, with a view of subduing the firmness of the Americans, proposed, that the inhabitants of New England should be excluded from the liberty of trading with any other than the British nation, and from the benefits of the northern fisheries; with an exception, however, of such individuals as might be thought deserving of indulgence. The bill for this purpose was pronounced both impolitic and iniquitous; but it was adopted by the two houses; and, by a subsequent act, New Jersey and other provinces were involved in similar restrictions of commerce.

That he might obviate the censure of harshness and obstinacy, the minister, on the 20th of February, proposed to the commons a resolution which bore an aspect of tenderness and complacency. It imported, that, when the assembly of any one of the American provinces should engage to contribute its due proportion to the common defence, as well as to provide for the charges of the civil government, it would be proper for the parliament to forbear the levy of any tax in that province; except commercial duties. This proposition, the premier observed, would offer to the colonial delinquents a fair opportunity of re-

(b) These were, New Hampshire, Massachusett's Bay, Rhode Island, (with the plantation called Providence), Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, the three counties bordering on the Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina. A thirteenth colony (Georgia) was soon added to the confederacy.

conciliation

conciliation with the government: it would allow them to assess themselves; and thus the chief cause of dispute would be removed. This proceedure, he added, would serve as a test of the sincerity of the provincials, who, if they should reject the offered terms, would prove themselves to be actuated by a rebellious spirit. He did not mean, however, that the parliamentary right of taxation should be abandoned, but only suspended. Messrs. Burke, Fox, and Barré, assailed this scheme in terms of the most pointed reprobation. They affirmed, that it was pregnant with mischief rather than with peace and harmony; that it was a base and insidious project, intended as a medium for dividing the Americans, and rendering the plan of coërcion more efficacious; but that it was so badly contrived, as to give reason for concluding that it would strengthen the union of the provincials. These and other censures, however, did not prevent the adoption of the proposal.

The conciliatory plan which Mr. Burke recommended to the house was marked with greater wisdom, and enforced with more ability, than that of the first lord of the treasury. On the 22nd of March he entered into an accurate detail of the state and circumstances of the colonies: he examined their means and resources of every kind; traced the increase of their population, and the improvement of their commerce; and delineated the general character of the people. He avoided a discussion of the invidious question concerning the right of taxation, and rested his plan on the principles of policy and prudence. He maintained, that the admission of the provincials to an interest in our constitution was the only mode of governing them with safety and benefit; a method which had been found highly useful with regard to Ireland and Wales. It was impracticable, he said, to extinguish the free spirit which animated the Americans; and it was impolitic, rash, and dangerous, to punish it as criminal: to comply with it was the most rational and equitable procedure. He proposed, that the assembly of each province should tax the inhabitants for the support of their civil government; that each should send delegates to a general congress, for the adjustment of the united interests, and the grant of a revenue to Great Britain; and that the offensive acts should be repealed.

This plan was strenuously opposed by the courtiers, who urged, that it contained such concessions as would only render the Americans more insolent and intractable; that no hope of adequate pecuniary contribution from them would remain; and that the supremacy of parliament was, in a manner, annihilated by the resolutions now proposed. These remarks were invalidated by the arguments of the opposite party; but the house would not even suffer the question to be put on the propositions of Burke. A less judicious scheme of accommodation was submitted to the commons by Hartley; but his suggestions were urged without effect.

The affairs of Canada were warmly agitated in each house. Lord Camden presented a petition from the British inhabitants of that province, soliciting the repeal or the emendation of the late act by which they were affected. He then observed, that the amendment of the act would not be sufficient; and he therefore contended for the total abrogation of it. It was so incompatible, he said, with the principles of the British constitution, that every true friend to civil liberty and to the protestant religion could not but approve the bill of repeal which he now offered. The earl of Dartmouth and other peers vindicated the Quebec act, as expedient for the gratification of the French Canadians, who (they said) ought not to be deprived of the objects of their wishes, at the mere suggestion of a very small proportion of the inhabitants of the colony; and, by the efforts of the courtiers, the new bill was rejected. When sir George Saville offered a similar petition to the commons, he and his friends in vain enforced it by animated strictures on the obnoxious act.

The conduct of the parliament was so agreeable to the king, that he expressed his satisfaction in strong terms; and he affected to prognosticate the most salutary effects from the measures taken during the session which he closed on the 26th of May. But the framer of his speech was not a true prophet.

The ferment which had long prevailed in the North American provinces, did not subside at the intelligence of the firm resolution of the British court to act with coërcive rigour. The zeal of liberty was highly inflamed; and the spirit of opposition broke out with additional violence. A proclamation for prohibiting the exportation of warlike stores to the colonies, increased the eagerness of the malcontents for procuring the apparatus of hostility. They applied with indefatigable ardour to the fabrication of arms: they established manufactories of gun powder; and they dispatched vessels to the European ports for various supplies. They even seized, in different places, the stores which belonged to the crown; alledging the necessity of defending themselves against that aggression which they had reason to expect.

While the provincials waited with impatience for the determination of the congress, which was appointed to meet again in the spring, hostilities broke out in the colony of Massachusett's Bay, near the town of Concord; a name ill suited to a scene of sanguinary contest. Some military stores being collected at that town for the use of the provincials, general Gage ordered a part of his army to destroy the supply. On the arrival of a body of light infantry at Lexington, in April, the militia of the neighbourhood appeared in arms. The royalists commanded the dispersion of those whom they styled rebels, and fired some of their pieces to enforce obedience. The colonists retired in confusion; and, in their retreat, some guns were fired at the detachment from the back of a stone wall, and from houses. A discharge of musquetry from the royal troops followed, and some of the provincials were killed. The light infantry, being now joined by a party of grenadiers, proceeded towards Concord. Here the latter employed themselves in the destruction of the stores; while the former engaged a fresh corps of the militia. Having executed the orders of general Gage, the troops commenced their return; during which they were severely annoyed. The Americans, posted in various places of ambuscade, fired on the flank of their fatigued adversaries, who were also harrassed in the rear; and this annoyance continued till they reached the vicinity of Boston. In the course of the day, above two hundred and seventy royalists were killed, wounded, or captured; while the provincials who suffered were about eighty in number.

The colonists loudly boasted of the courage and alacrity which the militia had displayed on this occasion; and they were so eager to profit by what they considered as a victory, that they prepared to dispossess the king's troops of the town of Boston. They assembled in multitudes, and formed a camp for the investment of that capital. They accused the royalists of having shed the first blood in the contest; and disclaimed all intention of continuing it, except for the defence of their liberties.

The proceedings of the congress confirmed the spirit of the people. That assembly decreed, that a considerable army should be levied; that, as a medium of payment, a currency of paper should be established; that no provisions should be conveyed to the persons concerned in the fisheries, or to the inhabitants of any settlement which still remained in subserviency to the British court; and that the confederacy of the provinces should be distinguished by the appellation of the United Colonies.

The colonies were now put under martial law, but not without the offer of pardon to all who should return to their duty, except Hancock and Adams, who were considered as the chief authors of the disturbances.

The provincials now invested the town of Boston, and the people of New York, hearing of the action at Lexington, and the affair of Concord, rose in a tumultuous manner, entered the town house, seized many stands of arms, appropriated to their own use the cargoes of two ships laden with military stores for general Gage, and then marched to the assistance of the Bostonians. They not only continued to block up the town of Boston, but began to raise batteries on the heights of the peninsula of Charles Town, in order to cannonade the king's troops. This occasioned an action at Bunker's Hill; for on the 17th of June, a considerable body of troops, under the command of major-general Howe, and brigadier Pigot, were sent to dislodge the provincials. This body of forces, with a proportionable quantity of artillery, facilitated their landing near Bunker's Hill, under the protection of the ships of war, armed vessels, floating batteries, &c. and being soon after reinforced by another detachment, a desperate action commenced, in which the British troops were victorious, the provincial lines being forced, and themselves compelled compelled to retreat, leaving behind several pieces of cannon and other military stores (c).

On the evening of the 23rd of August, the cannon were seized by order of the congress, though the Asia man of war, which lay in the harbour, endeavoured to prevent it by cannonading the town.

General Carleton was, in the mean time, indefatigable in his endeavours to render the province of Canada in a permanent state of defence; and the earl of Dunmore, governor of Virginia, taking refuge on board a ship of war, harrassed the coast, and made frequent descents upon Canada: laying waste the country, carrying off or spiking up a vast number of cannon, destroying great quantities of military stores belonging to the provincials, &c. &c. But on the other hand, Fort St. John surrendered to the provincial forces, on the 3rd of November, and the garrison became prisoners of war. On the 18th of the same month, a fierce engagement occurred between the king's troops and the provincials, near Savannah, in Georgia, in which the latter were defeated; and on the 31st of December, the provincial general Montgomery, who had for some time laid siege to the city of Quebec, attempted to take it by storm. In this attempt, however, he was defeated and slain, with several of his officers, and about sixty privates; about three hundred were also taken prisoners.

The parliament of England meeting on the 26th of October, the session was opened by his majesty with a speech from the throne (d). The attention of the parliament, previous to the holidays, was engaged in raising and adjusting the supplies for the ensuing year, and concerting measures for raising them. Several acts were also framed, which, having passed both houses, received the royal assent; after which the parliament was prorogued on the 25th of January, 1776; when the parliament assembled pursuant to their adjournment; and on the same day, a paper was delivered to the members of both houses, containing the following words: "To the parliament, A suffering and afflicted people most humbly and solemnly beseech and implore every member of parliament to put a speedy stop to the further effusion of the blood of our American brethren; that peace and tranquillity may be restored to the royal breast, and glory, commerce, and felicity to the whole empire (e)."

The war was now carried on with great vehemence in America. General Gage having been recalled, the chief command of the army at Boston devolved on general Howe, who soon after issued a proclamation declaring those inhabitants who attempted to quit the town without licence, subject to military execution, if detected and taken; and if they escaped, to be proceeded against as traitors. By another, such as obtained permission to quit the town were restrained, by several penalties, from taking more than a small specified sum of money with them. He also enjoined the signing and entering into an association, by which the remaining inhabitants offered their persons for the defence of the town, &c. But general Howe now thought it expedient to evacuate the town of Boston, which he effected on the 17th of March; and soon after made good his landing, and capture of New York. In June a battle occurred in Canada, between the regulars under general Carleton, and the provincials, at a place called Trois Rivieres, (Three Rivers,) when the latter were defeated, many of them being killed and wounded, and above two hundred taken prisoners. In the same month an attempt was made on Charles Town, South Carolina, by sir Peter Parker, at the head of a fleet of ships of war, and general Clinton with a body of land forces, but it failed of success; and on the 4th of July following, the congress declared the colonies independent.

On the 19th of September a declaration was published by lord Howe and general Howe, addressed to the provincials; offering terms of accommodation, and soliciting them to reflect upon their conduct; but the causes of dissention were so highly aggravated by some recent transactions both in England and America, that the provincials seemed determined to reject every conciliatory proposal, and were resolute to assert that independence which they had avowed.

On the 31st of the same month general Howe issued another proclamation, offering full pardon to all deserters, who should surrender themselves at the head quarters on or before the 31st of October, 1776. But this proclamation proved equally ineffectual.

After the publication of these proclamations many skirmishes happened between the king's troops, and the provincials; but nothing decisive took place till towards the end of October, when the latter were defeated, in an action, afterwards termed the Battle of the White Plains.

In the dispatches from general Howe, dated November 30, besides an account of a variety of skirmishes, information was given of the taking of Fort Washington, and Fort Lee, by the British forces, together with a great variety of military stores, and many prisoners. In December, Rhode Island was taken by general Clinton; about the same time lord Cornwallis took possession of East Jersey; and general Lee was taken prisoner, by a patrole of British dragoons, commanded by lieutenant-colonel (afterwards lord) Harcourt (f).

On the 31st of October, the parliament met again, when his majesty recapitulated grievances, and complained of his proferred indulgence to the Americans being rejected with circumstances of indignity and insult. The nature of his speech occasioned considerable debates in both houses, concerning the addresses which were proper to present to his majesty, upon the occasion. The most important were in the house of lords; but they were at length adjusted, as well as those in the lower house: and the addresses were accordingly presented; to each of which his majesty returned a gracious answer.

The house then proceeded to the consideration of the supplies, when a motion was made that forty-five thousand seamen, including ten thousand one hundred and twenty-nine marines, be employed for the service of the ensuing year. The motion was carried by a great majority. At the same time a resolution passed for allowing four pounds per man per month, for the maintenance and wages of every seaman.

A proclamation was issued by his majesty, on the 22nd of November, for a general fast to be observed throughout England on the 13th of December following. The same solemn act of humiliation was enjoined to be observed on the same day in Ireland; and on the 12th in Scotland.

Soon after another proclamation was issued for recalling and prohibiting seamen from entering into the service of foreign states, and for granting rewards for discovering such seamen as should conceal themselves, in a gratuity of two pounds for every able, and thirty shillings for every ordinary seaman, to be paid to any person on making such discovery; that such men might be taken into his majesty's service, by any one of his majesty's sea officers for raising men, on or before the 31st of December next (g).

The

(c) The loss of the provincials was about four hundred and fifty, in killed, wounded, or missing; of the British troops, according to the return of general Gage, two hundred and twenty-six were killed, and eight hundred and twenty-eight wounded, some of the latter dying soon after; and more than a proportionable number of officers were killed on this occasion.

(d) A few days before the opening of the session, a petition from the general congress in America, signed by the heads of the respective colonies, was presented to the king, humbly soliciting that such measures might be pursued as might tend to eradicate the present disturbances, and effect a lasting and happy reconciliation.

(e) In the course of the session the attention of the lords was engaged on the trial of the duchess of Kingston, who was accused of bigamy, in having married the duke of Kingston, while her first husband, the honourable Mr. Hervey, (afterwards earl of Bristol) was living. The trial continued five days, at the close of which the prisoner being called to the bar, was informed by the lord high-steward, that the lords had pronounced her guilty. In consequence of this she claimed her privilege of peerage, which occasioned the lords to adjourn to the chamber of parliament to debate on the matter. On their return the prisoner was again called to the bar, and the lord high steward pronounced it to be the sense of the house, "That the duchess should be allowed the privilege she claimed." As a peeress, she could endure no kind of corporal punishment, and was therefore discharged on paying her fees.

(f) The following are the particulars of the manner in which general Lee was taken prisoner. Colonel Harcourt having penetrated the country upon a reconnoitering party with about twelve light dragoons, and happening to meet a countryman on the road, entered into conversation with him, and found he was charged with a letter to general Washington, and that the wafer with which the letter was sealed was still wet; the signature being that of Mr. Lee, the colonel desired the countryman to conduct him to that gentleman, which he complied with. The countryman was accordingly mounted behind one of the dragoons, and a party galloped to the house where Mr. Lee was: the guard fired upon the dragoons, by which one private was killed, and a cornet wounded; a bullet passed through colonel Harcourt's helmet, but did not injure him. Lee was now summoned to surrender, which he complied with, delivered up his sword, and in the most earnest manner interceded for his life, desiring to come in under the proclamation. This, of course, could not be complied with, he was therefore conducted to the head-quarters, and conveyed on board one of his majesty's ships. He was afterwards exchanged for some of the king's officers, who had been taken prisoners by the provincials.

(g) This year terminated with an event, which, for a considerable time,

The parliament met on the 21st of January, 1777, pursuant to adjournment, and immediately proceeded to the business of the nation. The first thing that engaged the particular attention of the commons was, a bill brought in for granting commissions, or letters of marque and reprisal, as they were usually called, to the owners or captains of private merchant ships, authorizing them to take and make prizes of all vessels with their effects, belonging to any of the inhabitants of the thirteen specified revolted American colonies. This bill passed the commons without opposition; nor did it produce much debate among the lords, with whom it underwent the inconsiderable alteration, of inserting the words, "letters of permission," instead of "letters of marque," the latter being thought only applicable to reprisals on a foreign enemy.

The day after the above bill passed the lords, a motion was made in the house of commons, for leave to bring in a bill to enable his majesty to detain persons charged with, or suspected of, the crime of high-treason committed in America, or on the high seas, of the crime of piracy. The bill being admitted, was, after great debates, read the first time; and a motion being made for the second reading, it was carried by a great majority (h). At the very next meeting of the members, the bill, notwithstanding it had been petitioned against by the city of London, was read the third time, and, after some few alterations, passed the house.

It was, however, more strongly opposed in the upper than the lower house, till the question was put for reading it the third time, when (among others who objected to it) lord Abingdon rose, and declared himself totally against the bill, as repugnant to the laws of nations, and to the dictates of humanity. His lordship particularly dwelt upon the word "suspected," as a term of such latitude, that it was liable to be construed to the most unconstitutional meanings, and the consequences of the bill might prove fatal to the liberties of this country: he therefore could not give his consent to the passing of the bill; but it was carried, without further debate; and, on the 3rd of March, received the royal assent. Among others which received the royal signature at the same time was, the "bill for enabling the lords of the admiralty to grant letters of marque to private ships of war, or merchant ships belonging to the American colonies, that were then in actual rebellion against Great Britain."

The next circumstance that excited the attention of the commons was, the following message from his majesty, which was read by lord North:

"G. Rex.

"It gives his majesty much concern to find himself obliged to acquaint the house of commons with the difficulties he labours under, by reason of debts incurred by the expences of his household, and of the civil government, which being computed on the 5th of January last, do amount to more than six hundred thousand pounds. His majesty relies on the loyalty and affection of his faithful commons, of which he has received so many signal proofs, for enabling him to discharge this debt; and that they will at the same time make some further provision for the better support of his majesty's household, and the honour and dignity of his crown.

"G. R."

This message being read, a motion was made for referring it to a committee of supply on that day se'nnight. One member strongly opposed this motion as unusual, if not unprecedented, it having at all times been customary to take royal messages into immediate consideration. This produced a very warm debate, at the close of which, however, the motion was carried. On the day appointed for taking this matter into consideration, the house went into a committee of supply; and after some debates, came to the following resolutions: "Resolved, that it is the opinion of this committee, that the sum of six hundred and eighteen thousand two hundred and forty pounds nine shillings be granted to his majesty to discharge the arrears and debt due, and owing, on account of the civil list, on the 5th of January, 1775." "Resolved, that it is the opinion of this committee, that the sum of one hundred thousand pounds per annum be granted to his majesty over and above the sum of eight hundred thousand pounds granted by an act made in the first year of his reign." When these resolutions were reported from the committee of supply to the whole house, the first was agreed to without opposition; but the second produced debates which continued for several hours, at the close of which it was likewise agreed to by a great majority.

On the 7th of May, the bill passed both houses, and received the royal assent. This gratuity on the part of the commons to the king, was accompanied by an address from the speaker, which seemed very ingeniously adapted to reconcile so extraordinary a measure, at such a crisis, to the minds of the people, under the idea of loyalty; while it recommended a practice of which the political manœuvres of the times could not boast in any eminent degree. Indeed, it appeared to the discerning and impartial, an admirable specimen of state finesse (i).

While this bill was in agitation, a motion was made by sir James Lowther, "that an humble address be presented to his majesty, for an augmentation of the annual incomes of their royal highnesses the dukes of Gloucester and Cumberland." This motion, however, was rejected by a great majority. No other business of importance occurred during the remainder of this session, and on the 6th of June, his majesty repaired to the house of peers, and after signing such bills as were ready, prorogued the parliament.

In the beginning of this year several skirmishes happened in the Jerseys with various success. On the 23rd and 24th of March, a great quantity of provisions, stores, &c. with barracks and store-houses belonging to the provincials, were destroyed by the king's troops, at Peck's Hill, on the North River. The cruizers belonging to lord Howe and commodore Hotham's fleet continued to take many prizes. In Connecticut, on the 27th of April, the king's troops destroyed a great quantity of stores at Danbury. General Burgoyne, with the northern army, proceeded to Ticonderago and Fort Independence, which he took possession of on the 6th of July, and found great quantities of stores and provisions, beside those which he destroyed at Skenesborough. He then took possession of Fort Edward, which the provincials abandoned, and proceeded to Saratoga, where they were strongly posted. On the 11th of September, an engagement took place between the troops under general Howe and the provincials on the heights of Brandywine, in which many were killed and wounded on both sides, and four hundred provincials were taken pritime, occasioned great confusion, apprehension, and suspicion. On the 9th of December intelligence was received at the admiralty office, by express, that a fire broke out in the rope house of his majesty's yard at Portsmouth, about half an hour after four o'clock on Saturday afternoon, which continued with great violence, and consumed the whole, except the outer walls; but by the timely assistance, and vigorous efforts of the workmen of the yard, the seamen of his majesty's ships, the marines quartered at Portsmouth, and the men belonging to the ordnance with their respective officers, it was happily prevented from extending to any other of the buildings in the yard; and was at length totally extinguished. The principal loss sustained by this accident consisted chiefly of the rigging of two ships, the implements belonging to the rope makers and rigging house, a small quantity of cordage, and some toppings of hemp. The alarm occasioned by this accident was greatly increased by another of a similar nature, that happened shortly after at Bristol, which destroyed a considerable range of warehouses, besides many private dwellings, and, had it not been for the quick discovery and alacrity of the people in suppressing it, would have been productive of the most fatal consequences. How these accidents were occasioned was for some time a mystery; but it was at length discovered that they originated from the machinations of a wretched enthusiast and incendiary, afterwards well known by the appellation of John the Painter, but whose real name was James Aitken. When he was secured and examined, he refused answering any questions, and otherwise behaved in a very resolute and daring manner. But there appearing sufficient reason to suppose him the guilty person, he was committed to Winchester jail. At the next assizes he was brought to trial, and being found guilty, was soon after executed at Portsmouth.

(h) This bill occasioned great discontents among the people, and during the short time it was in agitation, a petition against it was presented to the commons from the city of London.

(i) The following is a copy of sir Fletcher Norton's address, who was at that time speaker of the house of commons:

"Most gracious sovereign,

"The bill which it is now my duty to present to your majesty, is entitled, "An act for the better support of his majesty's household, and the honour and dignity of the crown of Great Britain, to which your commons humbly beg your royal assent.

"By this bill, sir, and the respectful circumstances which preceded and accompanied it, your commons have given the fullest and clearest proof of their zeal and affection for your majesty; for in a time of public distress, full of difficulty and danger, their constituents labouring under burthens almost too heavy to be borne, your faithful commons postponed all other business, and, with as much dispatch as the nature of their proceedings would admit, have not only granted to your majesty a large present supply, but also a very great additional revenue; great beyond example; great beyond your majesty's highest expence.

"But all this, sir, they have done in a well grounded confidence, that you will apply wisely what they have granted liberally, and feeling what every good subject must feel with the greatest satisfaction, that under the direction of his majesty's wisdom, the affluence and grandeur of the sovereign will reflect dignity and honour upon his people."

soners. But though the latter were defeated, and the action at first seemed of an indecisive nature, it occasioned Philadelphia to fall into the hands of the British forces. An attack was also made by the provincials on Staten Island nearly at the same time; but they were repulsed with great slaughter. And about the same period, general Clinton stormed and took Fort Clinton and Fort Montgomery.

On the 16th of October, the provincials, under the command of general Gates, having surrounded general Burgoyne's army at Saratoga, the latter thought proper to enter into articles of capitulation: by which, after laying down their arms, he and his troops were to have a free passage to Great Britain. Towards the close of the year several forts were taken by the troops and shipping; and many skirmishes happened on the banks of the Delaware, in order to preserve the communication with the army at Philadelphia. The provincials likewise evacuated their entrenchments at Red Bank.

During this year great disturbances happened in the East Indies, where lord Pigot, governor of Madras, was deposed, imprisoned, and soon after died. His death was imputed to various causes, but as it happened in a region where the most palpable crimes have often been connived at, it is supposed to have escaped that minute investigation which it demanded.

The parliament assembling on the 20th of November, his majesty went to the house of peers, and opened the session with a speech. The house then resolved itself into a committee of supply, when a short state of the navy, both as to the number of ships and men employed, and where stationed, being given, a motion was made, "That it is the resolution of this committee, that sixty thousand seamen be employed for the service of the year 1778." This motion produced very warm debates, at the close of which it was carried without a division. The supplies being granted, and several bills read, (among which was that for suspending the habeas corpus,) on the 10th of December his majesty went to the house of peers, and after signing the respective bills, adjourned the parliament.

On the 4th of February the parliament again met, when a motion was made by the earl of Abingdon, "That this house, taking into consideration the legality of the present mode of benevolences, or of raising forces by subscription, do look upon this practice as contrary to law, and the principles of the constitution." This motion produced considerable debates, but was at length rejected by a great majority.

It was also moved in the house of commons, that an address should be presented to his majesty, requesting that he would be graciously pleased to order the proper officers to lay before the house the accounts received from the admiral on the Jamaica station, relative to the shipping under his command. The question was carried without a division. Mr. Pulteney then took the chair; having gone into a committee of the whole house to take into consideration the state of the nation, Mr. Charles Fox, on whose motion the committee was formed, opened the debate. He took a retrospective view of the American war; followed it in all its stages; pointed out the events, as well fortunate as unfortunate, of each respective year; demonstrated from his statement the incapacity of administration to conduct the war, their ignorance of men, measures, and the country of America; and enumerated the errors and blunders into which this unpardonable ignorance had plunged them. He pointed out the defenceless state of the British empire in Europe, from the absence of the troops and navy; and concluded his speech with moving, "that as it would be impossible to complete the proposed levies in due time to replace the regiments that might in the interim be sent away, the house, considering the state to which such a measure would reduce the nation, would not suffer any troops from Great Britain, Ireland, Minorca, or Gibraltar, to be sent to America (k)."

The business of the new levies came on two days after; and was opposed by some of the minority, but the house, after a long debate, granted to the king a sum of money for the pay and maintenance of the new corps.

On the 16th a full house assembled to hear Mr. Burke's promised motion; and the honourable member began with an aweful solemnity to prepare their minds, and incline them to adopt his sentiments. After an interesting exordium, he described the savage ungovernable rage of the Indians let loose upon the unarmed, the aged, the infant, and the helpless female; he represented them rioting in murder, lust, and rapine; he drew, in the most affecting terms, the sufferings of the unhappy victims whom they devoted to death; a death which his pathetic eloquence represented with an aspect horrible almost beyond conception. Raised by his own imagery to a high degree of indignation, he inveighed most vehemently on those who, by ordering a treaty with the barbarians, might be justly deemed the authors of all the calamities which attended the inhuman measure. Administration, and several principal commanders were minutely exhibited; and the share they had undertaken in the barbarities complained of were held up to execration. Towards the conclusion of his harangue, which had delighted and astonished the auditors for about three hours, he moved, that copies of the treaties entered into with the Indians should be laid before the house. The motion was warmly opposed by administration, and as vigorously defended by the minority. The arguments of the latter differed but little from those of Mr. Burke; they were all framed after his model; the differences lay only in the colouring and fancy. The opposite side vindicated the Indians from the reflections thrown on them; and instances of their humanity, and the strict discipline they were obliged to submit to, were adduced. The facts urged as proofs of the untameable and ungovernable rage of the Indians, it was said, were greatly exaggerated: they owed much of their horror to the fancy of the orator; and, such as they were, ought to be deemed the acts of a few lawless banditti of their body, who equally disclaimed obedience to our commanders and to their own; and therefore were not to be attributed to the nation, who, to the knowledge of many members of the house, had often acted with a degree of humanity which might make even a Christian blush. The emancipation of the negroes, by lord Dunmore, was justified on the ground of necessity; it was impossible to raise men otherwise to recover our just rights; every private consideration should yield to the promotion of the public good. The debate was warm, interesting, and of great length; the question being put, the motion was rejected by a majority of eighty-six.

On the 19th, lord North presented to the house, "a bill to enable his majesty to appoint commissioners to treat, consent, and agree on the means of quieting the disorders then subsisting in certain of the colonies, plantations, and provinces of America." As also, "a bill for declaring the intention of the parliament of Great Britain, concerning the exercise of the right of imposing taxes on the colonies, plantations, and provinces of America," which after several days debate, and some amendments, were carried.

On the 22nd of March an embargo was laid by the French on all shipping belonging to the subjects of his Britannic majesty at that time in their ports; and having previously fitted out a large fleet, it was thought necessary to call out the militia of England, and encamp them, in order to oppose any intended invasion; and five days afterwards, an order was issued for detaining all French ships in the ports of England.

His majesty, having suddenly formed a resolution of viewing some of the principal dock-yards, repaired to Chatham and Sheerness, and having surveyed what was thought most worthy of observation at those places, he, together with the queen, &c. visited Portsmouth on the 2nd of May, and after reviewing the fleet, returned on the 9th to London (l).

(k) This important resolution was not opposed by arguments, but by votes. The question was called for, and upon a division it was rejected. The numbers for the resolution were one hundred and sixty-five against two hundred and fifty-nine.

(l) On the 12th of this month the nation sustained a most important loss in the death of the illustrious earl of Chatham, a statesman unrivalled in the annals of history. To aggrandize his country appears throughout the whole of his political conduct to have been his sincere intention. He was not only eminent for the display of his eloquence in the senate, but the formation and execution of plans which at once astonished and terrified the common enemy, and rendered the British arms the dread and admiration of the world. The following are the particulars respecting the death of lord Chatham, extracted from a letter from lord Camden to a nobleman of the highest rank: "I saw him (says he) in the prince's chamber, before he went into the house, and conversed a little with him; but such was the feeble state of his body, and indeed the distempered agitation of his mind, that I did forbode his strength would certainly fail him before he had finished his speech. The earl spoke, but was not like himself. His speech faultered, his sentences broken, and his mind not master of itself. His words were shreds of unconnected eloquence, and flashes of the same fire, that he, Prometheus-like, had stolen from heaven, and were then returning to the place from whence they were taken. He fell back upon his seat, and was to all appearance in the pangs of death. This threw the whole house into confusion.

On the 28th of May, the royal assent was given to a bill for the relief of the Roman Catholics; and about the same time an embargo was laid on all foreign vessels in the ports of England.

Having narrated the material parliamentary transactions, and other domestic occurrences, we must now advert to our naval and military affairs. Admiral Keppel having sailed with a fleet deficient in point of force, for the purpose of attacking the French, returned to England for a reinforcement, which having obtained, he again put to sea. On the 27th of July, the two grand fleets met, and engaged off Ushant; the issue of which, in consequence of an accusation laid by sir Hugh Palliser, vice-admiral, against the chief commander, produced great dissentions. The engagement was mentioned in such censorious terms by sir Hugh Palliser, as to reflect on the reputation of admiral Keppel; who, however, vindicated his character in parliament on the 2nd of December, notwithstanding which, sir Hugh Palliser exhibited his charge against him on the 17th of the same month at the admiralty. The bill for his trial on land received the royal assent on the 24th ensuing; and his trial commenced on the first of February, when he was unanimously acquitted with the greatest honour, and the prosecution pronounced to be malicious (m).

During these transactions at home, hostilities were prosecuting with the utmost vigour in America. On the 18th of June, general Clinton evacuated Philadelphia. He was attacked on his march by the provincials, whose object appeared to be the gaining possession of the British baggage; but in this they were disappointed, and every where repulsed by the judicious manner in which general Clinton had disposed his forces.

In consequence of the bill empowering his majesty to appoint commissioners to treat of a pacification with America, the earl of Carlisle, Mr. Eden, and governor Johnstone, went officially to America, for the purpose of effecting a reconciliation with the Americans. But so far from accomplishing that desireable object, the measures pursued tended to widen the unhappy breach. The bill for declaring the intention of the British parliament of imposing the taxes on the colonies, could not possibly fail of producing such an effect, as it struck at the original primary cause of hostilities.

The islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon were taken from the French about this time, by admiral Montague's fleet; to form a kind of counterbalance to which, the island of Dominica was captured by an armament of French and Americans from Martinico.

On the 11th of December, admiral Barrington, who succeeded lord Howe in the command of the British fleet, and a body of forces under general Grant, seized on the island of St. Lucia, one of the Antilles belonging to the French. Count D'Estaing attempted to retake it, but was repulsed with considerable loss both by sea and land.

The province of Georgia surrendered to a detachment of British troops, on the 4th of January, 1779, and many inhabitants of that colony and of the Carolinas came in and joined the royalists. On the 3rd of March, general Prevost, by surprise, obtained a complete victory over the Americans under general Ashe. In the beginning of May, sir Henry Clinton concerted with sir George Collier, who then commanded the marine at New York, an expedition to the Chesapeak, and a descent upon Virginia, as measures which would embarrass and distress the enemy, much more than any other that could be undertaken. A sufficient quantity of naval and land forces for the intended purposes, were accordingly dispatched from New York, under the conduct of sir George Collier, and major-general Matthew. The fleet having successfully passed between the capes of Virginia, the Raisonable man of war, with some armed tenders, were left in Hampton Road to block up that port, and to intercept the navigation of James River, while sir George Collier, having shifted his pendant to a frigate, proceeded with the smaller ships of war and transports up Elizabeth River. The town of Portsmouth was their immediate object, but the fleet being delayed by some circumstances of wind or tide in its passage, the general and troops, impatient of delay, were landed at some distance, and marched directly towards the place. The town was open and defenceless, but the passage to it by water was covered by Fort Nelson, which had been constructed at about half a mile distance for that purpose. The garrison of the fort, knowing that no succour was at hand, and that the fort was incapable of any effectual defence, abandoned it on the approach of the army, which instantly took possession of that and the town. The town, or remains of Norfolk, on the opposite side of the river, also fell into their hands. On the approach of the fleet and army, the enemy burned several vessels in these ports, among which were two large French ships laden with a thousand hogsheads of tobacco; the celerity of the invaders having early checked the destruction, several others were preserved, and fell into the hands of the victors. In the mean time the British guards marched eighteen miles by night to the town of Suffolk, on the Nansemond River, and arrived there at day-break. They found the place had been hastily abandoned at their approach; and immediately proceeded to the destruction of a very large magazine of provisions, together with the vessels and naval stores. Within a fortnight that the fleet and army continued upon the coast, the loss sustained by the Americans in provisions and stores was immense. Above one hundred and thirty ships and vessels of all sorts were destroyed or taken. All those upon the stocks were burned, and every thing relative to the building or fitting of ships, that was not portable, was destroyed. When the above circumstances were communicated to sir Henry Clinton by sir George Collier's letter, the general sent an immediate order for their return; and the fleet and army, with their prizes, arrived safe at New York, before the expiration of the month.

The provincials had, for some time, been engaged in constructing very strong works at the two important posts of Verplanks Neck and Stoney Fort in the Highlands. All these works were nearly completed, but not yet defensible, when the general thought it a proper season to avail himself of the industry of the enemy, and to reap the fruits of their toil. The troops destined for this service under the command of major-general Vaughan, were lately embarked, when they were joined by the force returned from Chesapeak, and proceeded all together up the North River, the naval department being under sir George Collier. On the following morning, general Vaughan, with the greater part of the army, landed on the east side of the river, about eight miles below Verplanks, whilst the remainder under general Patison, and accompanied by sir Henry Clinton, advancing farther up, landed within three miles of Stoney Point. On the appearance of the ships the enemy abandoned their works, but set fire to a large block-house. On the approach of the troops to take possession of Stoney Point, they, however, made some shew of resistance, but did not think proper to dispute the matter. The Americans had finished a small work on the opposite side of the river, on which they bestowed the name of Fort la Fayette. This was defended by four pieces of artillery, and a small garrison of between seventy and eighty men. But this little redoubt, though strong in itself, was effectually commanded by Stoney Point, which lay at the distance of about a thousand yards on the opposite shore, and it being exceedingly difficult to approach from its own side, the attack was accordingly intended from the other. For this purpose, general Patison, with the most indefatigable perseverance during the night, overcame the difficulties of dragging the heavy artillery from a very wretched landing place to the top of the hill; and his exertions and arrangements were so effectual and judicious, that by five on the following morning, he had opened a battery of cannon, and another of mortars, on the summit of the different rocks of Stoney Point, which poured a storm of fire over Fort la Fayette. The attack was supported by sir George Collier, who advanced with the gallies and gun-boats within reach of the fort. The cannonade was continued during the day, at the close of which, sir George ordered two of the gallies to pass the fort and anchor above it, to prevent the escape of the garrison by water. In the mean time general Vaughan with his division, having made a long circuit through the hills, at length arrived and closely invested the fort on the land side.

confusion. Many crowded about the earl. Even those who might have felt a secret pleasure in the accident, yet put on the appearance of distress—except only the earl of Mansfield, who sat still, almost as much unmoved, as the senseless body itself." Belsham's Memoirs, ii. 335.

(m) On the acquittal of admiral Keppel, the most general demonstrations of joy took place, and the greatest illuminations were displayed in most of the cities, towns, &c. throughout the kingdom. He likewise received the united thanks of the houses of lords and commons, the lord mayor and common council of London (who presented him with the freedom of the city, in a box made of the heart of oak, and richly decorated with gold,) and of many other cities, towns, corporations, &c.

side. The garrison seeing all possibility of escape was now cut off, and that their fire was totally overpowered, surrendered their little fortress on the following morning, and themselves prisoners of war, without any other stipulation than that of demanding humane treatment (n).

The state of the armies in America, on both sides, with respect to actual force, together with the scarcity of money and military provisions on one side, necessarily limited the views of the opposite commanders, and prevented their undertaking any decisive or expensive operations. The campaign was therefore languid, and rather confined to the surprizing of posts, and to desultory excursions. While the greater part of the British army, however, were engaged in moving from one island to another, and establishing different posts, general Lincoln, the American commander, thought proper to attack lieutenant-colonel Maitland, who was strongly posted at the pass of Stoney Ferry. The colonel's force amounted only to about eight hundred, while the American force is represented as amounting to five thousand men and eight pieces of cannon. The attack was made and supported with spirit. The royalists lost some officers as well as men, and about an hundred of both were wounded. The Americans lost some officers of note, and a considerable number of privates.

Great dispatch had been used in completing or restoring the works at Stoney Point, and that port was now in a respectable state of defence, with a powerful garrison under the command of lieutenant-colonel Johnson. General Wayne, on the part of the Americans, was appointed to the arduous task of surprizing and reducing Stoney Point. The troops, having set out from Sandy Reach on the 15th of July about noon, after a most grievous march of fourteen miles, the van, about eight in the evening, arrived within a mile and a half of their object, where they halted, and the troops were formed into two columns as they arrived. While they were in this position, Wayne, with some of his principal officers, went to reconnoitre the works, and to observe the situation of the garrison. It was near midnight before the two columns approached the place; that on the right was led by general Wayne, the van, consisting of one hundred and fifty picked men, led by the most adventurous officers, and commanded by lieutenant-colonel Fleury, advanced to the attack with loaded muskets and fixed bayonets. The column on the left was led also by a chosen van with loaded muskets and fixed bayonets, under the command of major Steward. The general issued the most pointed orders to both columns not to fire a single shot on any account, but to rely entirely on their bayonets. Such was the astonishing resolution of the Americans, that neither the deep morass, nor the strong works, in front and flank, could damp the ardour of their troops, who, in the face of the most incessant and tremendous fire of musquetry, and of cannon loaded with grape-shot, forced their way at the point of the bayonets, until the van of each column met in the center of the works, where they arrived at nearly the same instant (o). The total number of prisoners amounted to five hundred and forty-three, and the slain of the garrison to sixty-three: and trophies, artillery, and stores, were as considerable as could be expected, from the nature and extent of the post.

The Americans were so elated on account of their success at Stoney Point, that they undertook an attack on Paulus Hook, which lies almost opposite to the city of New York, on the Jersey side. They failed, however, in the execution.

Sir George Collier sailed from Sandyhook on the 3rd of August, arrived in Penobscot Bay on the 14th, and surprized, routed, and destroyed the American fleet. One frigate of twenty guns and another of eighteen were taken. The Warren, of thirty-two guns, seven others of smaller force, six armed vessels, and twenty-four transports, were sunk or destroyed.

By the sudden appearance of the French fleet, on the 14th of September, off Carolina and Georgia, the Experiment man of war of fifty guns, and three royal frigates, apprehensive of no danger, and upon separate services, had the misfortune of falling in with them, and adding to their triumph and number.

General Prevost was now at the town of Savannah, but the greater part of his force was on the island of Port Royal in South Carolina, where it had lately taken post. The intercepting of an express to colonel Maitland from the general, delayed the previous measures so long, that the enemy had leisure to seize the principal communications before they could take effect. This rendered the junction of colonel Maitland's corps with the garrison a matter of doubt, difficulty, and danger. But the colonel's address, the zeal of his troops, with the distinguished services of lieutenant Goldesborough, of the navy, surmounted every obstacle.

The whole French force, amounting to forty sail, anchored off the bar of Tybee, at the mouth of the Savannah, on the 9th of September. On the 14th the French, with Polaski's American light horse, appeared so near the British lines, as to skirmish with the piquets. The day following, M. D'Estaign summoned the general to surrender, in the name of the French king. Colonel Maitland's division had not yet joined the garrison: it was therefore thought essential to gain as much time as possible, and general Prevost had the address to carry this point. Messages passed backwards and forwards, till at length a truce of twenty-four hours was agreed on, to afford leisure for deliberation. During this interval the fortunate arrival of colonel Maitland with the troops, presented a new face of affairs, and an answer was returned, that they were unanimously determined to defend themselves to the last extremity. The French force consisted of three thousand five hundred men, that of the Americans under general Lincoln, of four thousand eight hundred. The spirit, vigour, and exertion of every individual of the garrison, merited the highest encomium. Nor were the enemy inactive, for at midnight, on the 3rd of October, they commenced a heavy bombardment, and at day-light opened a vehement cannonade, which was continued for five days. On the 9th the allies attacked the British lines with great fury at day-break. The grand attack was directed to the right, where D'Estaing in person led the flower of both armies, and was accompanied by all the principal officers of each. The attack was begun with great spirit, and supported with an extraordinary degree of perseverance and obstinacy; till at length the enemy were broken, routed, and driven in the greatest disorder and confusion into a swamp. At ten they required a truce, with permission to bury their dead, and remove their wounded; the first was granted, but a restriction laid with respect to distance as to the rest. Count Polaski was mortally wounded in this action. Mons. D'Estaing was twice wounded. The loss on the side of the British was very small. The French and Americans abandoned their camp on the night of the 17th, and about the first of November, M. D'Estaign quitted the coast of America.

Early in the month of October, captain Farmer of his majesty's ship Quebec, being on a cruize off Ushant, in company with the Rambler cutter, closely engaged the Survillante, a large French frigate, mounting forty guns; while the Rambler was engaged with a French cutter, as superior in force as the French frigate was to the Quebec. The action on both sides was warm and bloody, from ten in the morning till two in the afternoon, when the French cutter set all the sail she could crowd, and bore away; but the Rambler being much disabled in her masts and rigging, could not follow her with any hopes of success. The commander, therefore, seeing both the frigates dismasted, and the Quebec take fire, endeavoured to get as near the Quebec as possible, in hopes of saving some of her men; but no other assistance could be afforded them than by hoisting out the boat, which picked up one master's mate, two midshipmen, and fourteen more of the Quebec's people, the enemy's frigate at the same time firing at the boat. The Quebec continued burning very fiercely, with her colours flying till six o'clock, when she blew up (p).

In October, the baymen or logwood-cutters on the Mosquito, and bay of Honduras shores, being in great danger from the Spaniards, the governor of Jamaica had dispatched captain Dalrymple, commandant of a new corps raised in Ireland for the service of that island, with a small force and some arms to their relief. Admiral sir Peter (n) Having these posts, the enemy in the Jerseys were under a necessity of making a detour of above ninety miles through the mountains, to communicate with the country east of Hudson's river.

(o) General Wayne received a wound in the head by a musket-ball, but was gallantly supported by two of his aid-de-camps, Fishbourn and Archer, to whom he acknowledged the utmost gratitude in his public letters. Colonel Fleury, a French officer, was the person who struck the British standard with his own hand. Lieutenants Gibbons and Knox displayed great courage, one of whom led the avant-guard on the right, as did the other on the left, and both escaped unhurt, though the first lost seventeen men out of twenty in the attack.

(p) Captain Farmer's conduct on this occasion has been highly extolled by some, as a mark of heroism and courage; but to us it appears to savour more of the act of a madman, in refusing to quit the ship, and being blown up with her.

THE MEMORIAL OF CAPTAIN FASMER.

Parker had also detached a small squadron of three frigates and a schooner, under the conduct of captain Luttrell, as commodore to the bay of Honduras, to intercept some Spanish register ships; which, however, escaped into the excellent harbour, and under the protection of the strong fortress of San Fernando de Omoa, where they were found too well secured for any attack by sea, which their then small squadron was capable of making. In the course of a few days, the commodore fell in at sea with the Porcupine sloop of war, and the detachment of the loyal Irish under her convoy. The commanders immediately resolved to unite their forces in an attack by sea and land upon Omoa, a bold attempt with their inconsiderable force; but in which success presented a prospect of throwing the galleons, which were still under its shelter, into their hands. The fortress of Omoa, could not be considered as a fort or castle for the defence of the harbour, the town itself being entirely open. Its batteries exhibited above forty pieces of artillery, but it seems to have been deficient in that respect, as well as in point of garrison. The land force of the assailants by the junction of the baymen with the marines, which were allotted by the commodore for that service, amounted to five hundred men; the defensive force, without including the useless inhabitants, was not much inferior in number. In advancing to the fort, the English were so much annoyed by the guns from the tower, that they found themselves compelled to set it on fire. The commander of the expedition conceiving that a regular siege would not answer his design, determined on a coup de main, and to attempt the place by escalade. Measures being accordingly concerted with the commodore, the Pomona frigate was towed in near the fort during the night, and the heavier ships took their proper stations, to enable them to commence the attack on their side about three in the morning, giving a signal twenty minutes before, which was to direct that from the land. In the mean time, one hundred and fifty men in four columns, in line, and carrying the scaling ladders, were moved down the hill, where they lay waiting for the signal. That being given, they suddenly advanced with trailed arms, under the fire of their own batteries, which with the heavy cannonade from the ships served to deafen as well as to distract the enemy: in consequence of which they passed undiscovered by the Spanish sentries to the very entrance of the ditch. On their being discovered, the columns seemed for a moment to hesitate, but instantly recovered, and advanced to fix their ladders to the walls. Two seamen having mounted the wall, levelled their muskets without firing, at a body of above sixty Spaniards, and such was the consternation that prevailed, that they kept them for some moments in awe, and even motionless, while their friends were ascending the ladders. The garrison, notwithstanding all the efforts of their officers, fled on all sides. In these circumstances, the governor and principal officers, asking only for their lives, presented their swords and keys to the commandant, with a surrender of the fort, garrison, and ships. The treasure had been removed from the castle on the approach of the British forces, but that which was on board the galleons, with the cargoes of their vessels in the harbour, were estimated at about three millions of piastres (q).

The 16th of February, 1780, was favourable to admiral Rodney, who, on that day, obtained a signal victory over the Spanish fleet commanded by Don Juan Langara, off Cape St. Vincent; in consequence of which, the fortress of Gibraltar, then besieged by the Spaniards, and the people in great distress, for want of provisions, were happily relieved. The admiral then proceeded on his destined voyage, and soon after his arrival, a smart engagement took place on the 27th of May, between the English fleet commanded by admiral Rodney, and that of the French under M. de Guichen, near Martinico. This engagement proved unfavourable to the French, though no capture was made on either side (r).

On the 11th of May, Charles-Town surrendered to sir Henry Clinton; on this occasion, many officers, a commodore, several continental regiments, and three battalions of artillery, with a great number of American and French seamen were taken; in all, upwards of six thousand men in arms, besides several armed ships, and four hundred pieces of cannon.

About this time, between five and six thousand men, under generals Clinton, Knyphausen, Robertson, and Tyron, passed over by night, from Staten Island to Elizabeth Town, in New Jersey, in order to attack some of Washington's advanced posts; and on the following morning they advanced a few miles to Connecticut Farms, a settlement which had been lately formed by some inhabitants of that province (s).

The army now directed their march towards Springfield, but were annoyed on the road by the militia. On their arrival, they found general Maxwell at the head of the Jersey brigade, and reinforced by all the militia which in a few hours could be collected; which induced the British army to halt: but the Americans, though inferior in strength, did not permit them by any means to hold the post they had taken without molestation. They kept up a continual fire during the day, though they avoided coming to close action. The British officers now abandoned the design of attacking Springfield, and the army returned to Elizabeth Town in the night. As soon as the day-light appeared, the Americans pursued them to that place: but being too confident of success, they experienced a check in their career. On the 23rd of the same month, the British forces left Elizabeth Town, and marched again towards Springfield, which place, after some opposition, they obtained possession of; but, from some unknown cause, it experienced the same fate with the Connecticut farms; the whole village, excepting about four houses, was reduced to ashes.

A signal victory was obtained on the 16th of August over the American army under general Gates, by the British forces under lord Cornwallis. The loss of the Americans was about nine hundred slain, among whom was brigadier general Gregory; a thousand were also taken prisoners. Soon after this action, lieutenant colonel Tarleton defeated general Sumpter's army, which was much superior to his own, taking two pieces of cannon, and about three hundred prisoners.

The most flagrant instance of treachery, during the revolutionary war, occurred this year. The American army was stationed in the strong holds of the highlands, on both sides of the North River. For the defence of this river, a fortress had been built at West Point, after the loss of Fort Montgomery; and it was so strong and impregnable, as to be called the Gibraltar of America. Of this post general Arnold solicited the command; and general Washington, far from suspecting any sinister views in an officer, who had been uniformly zealous and active in the cause of his country, complied with the solicitation. When Arnold had become invested with the command, he carried on a negociation with sir Henry Clinton, by which it was agreed, that Arnold should make such a disposition of his forces, as would enable the British general to surprize West Point. The agent employed in this negociation was major André, adjutant general of the British army. To favour the communications, the Vulture, a British sloop of war, had been previously stationed in North River, as near Arnold's posts, as could be without exciting suspicion. On the night of the 21st of September, a boat was sent to fetch (q) A singular instance of true courage and magnanimity in a British sailor, occurred on this occasion. He scrambled singly over the wall, and, for the better annoyance of the enemy on all sides, he armed himself with a cutlass in each hand. Thus equipped, he fell in with a Spanish officer, just roused from sleep, and who, in the hurry and confusion, had forgotten his sword. This circumstance restrained the fury of the tar, who disdained to attack an unarmed foe, but, unwilling to decline any opportunity of displaying his courage in single combat, he presented one of the cutlasses to him, saying at the same time, "I scorn any advantage, you are now on a footing with me." The astonishment of the officer at such an act of generosity, when he expected nothing less than that of being cut off instantly, and without pity or mercy, could only be equalled by the admiration, which his relating the story excited in his countrymen.

(r) In all the debates of the session of 1780, the most licentious invectives were indulged: it seemed to be the wish of political opponents to urge parliamentary altercation as much as possible, that it might amount to the unpardonable extremes of personal animosity. In consequence of a misrepresentation of words said to have been spoken, through the ignorance or malice of the newspaper reporter, a duel was engendered between Mr. Adam and Mr. Fox, in which the latter was slightly wounded in the body.

(s) In their march they were continually fired at by scattering parties of the neighbouring militia. This thriving settlement, together with the town and the Presbyterian church, were now destroyed. One circumstance, however, served to make this expedition appear more odious in the eyes of the Americans, than it otherwise would have done. The wife of the clergyman belonging to the Presbyterian church, was sitting in her house with her children and family, when, either by accident or design, she was shot dead through one of the windows. This served as a new ground of clamour to the Americans, and tended to increase that aversion to the British government, which had already been so deeply rooted.

major André; and Arnold met him at the beach, without the posts of both armies. Their business not being finished till it was too near morning for André to return to the Vulture, Arnold, telling him he must be concealed till the next night, conducted him within one of the American posts, where he continued with him the following day. The Vulture having in the mean time changed her position, the boatmen refused to carry back André the next night; and he could now return to New York in no other way than by land. Quitting his uniform, which he had worn under a surtout, for a common coat, he set out on horseback under the name of John Anderson, with a passport "to go to the lines of White Plains, or lower if he thought proper, he being on public business." When advanced a great part of the way, he was stopped by three of the New York militia, belonging to a scouting party; and several papers, containing exact returns of the state of the forces, ordnance, and defences at West Point, were found in his boots, the captors, disdaining a proferred bribe of a purse of gold and permanent provision and promotion, on condition of their conveying and accompanying him to New York, delivered him a prisoner to lieutenant colonel Jameson, who commanded the scouting parties. André, with the incautious permission of Jameson, informed Arnold of his detention in a letter, on the receipt of which Arnold abandoned every thing, and went on board the Vulture sloop of war. General Washington referred the case of André to the examination and decision of a board, consisting of fourteen officers, who, without examining a single witness, founded their report on his own confession. After stating the facts, they reported it as their opinion, "that major André ought to be considered as a spy, and that, agreeably to the laws and usages of nations, he should suffer death." He was accordingly hung as a spy, on the 2nd of October (t).

About this period, intestine tumults prevailed in London. A bill which passed in the last session of parliament for a relaxation of the penal laws against the Roman Catholics, had excited the jealousy and indignation of the more zealous, but less moderate of the Protestants. These malcontents found a leader in lord George Gordon, who pledged himself to bring in a bill for the repeal of that noxious act (u). As his lordship did not succeed in his endeavours, the multitude proceeded to acts of riot, rapine, and depredation, pulling down, and consuming the Romish chapels, a great number of houses belonging to persons of that persuasion, and several prisons, among which were Newgate (v), the King's Bench, and the Fleet. All business for a time, subsided, and nothing but inebriation and anarchy prevailed among the outrageous multitude. At last, through the exertion of the military, many of these deluded people were unfortunately marked as victims, and killed on the spot, others were taken, brought to trial, and, being found guilty in consequence of the evidence produced, received sentence of death. Nineteen were executed in London and Middlesex; and six in Southwark.

On Friday, during these disturbances, lord George Gordon, who was considered as the instigator of them, was taken into custody, and after a long examination before the privy council, committed to the Tower. On the 5th of February, 1781, he was tried at the court of King's Bench, Westminster, for high-treason, and levying war, insurrection, and rebellion against the king, by assembling a great number of armed persons on the 2nd of June in the preceding year, and disturbing the peace, &c. The trial lasted from half past eight on Monday morning till five o'clock the next morning, when the jury, after considerable deliberation, pronounced his lordship Not Guilty.

About this time, in a committee of the house, Mr. Dunning made a motion, that, in order to secure the independence of parliament, and obviate all suspicions of its purity, the proper officer should, in future, within seven days after the meeting, lay before the house an account of all monies paid out of the civil list, for the use of any member of parliament. However unfounded such a suspicion might be, he said the public firmly believed that large sums were conveyed into the pockets of their representatives. If any members did unduly possess themselves of the public money, this proposition would distinguish them: if not, it would be acceded to without difficulty. Slight objections were made to the motion, as proposing a test which might be unpleasant to the house, and beget differences, but it was carried without a division.

The close of the year 1780 may be considered as memorable for the declaration of hostilities by Great Britain against Holland. Circumstances of irritation, and jealousy, were continually accumulating on both sides, till the capture of Henry Laurens (w) brought things to their ultimate point of decision. Sir Joseph Yorke immediately pressed the business

(t) Major André's name is perpetuated by a monument erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey. Every exertion was made by the royal commanders to save him, but without effect. His execution, however repugnant to the dictates of humanity, "cannot be condemned without condemning the maxims of self-preservation, which have uniformly guided the practice of hostile nations." The three soldiers who apprehended major André were rewarded with a pension of two hundred dollars in specie during life. A silver medal was likewise presented to each of them by general Washington in person, with the thanks of the congress for the faithful discharge of their duty.

(u) On the 2nd of June, the day appointed for the meeting of the petitioners in St. George's Fields, from sixty thousand to one hundred thousand attended. They were marshalled in separate bands, and after an harangue from lord George, the main body made an unnecessary circuit over London Bridge, and through the city, to the seat of parliament. They marched six a-breast, preceded by a man carrying on his head the petition, signed with the names, or marks, of one hundred and twenty thousand persons.

(v) The assault of Newgate, without arms or ammunition, was certainly the most desperate attempt that could be conceived. It seems so strong as to defy any attempts without artillery.

(w) Early in the month of October, Mr. Henry Laurens, president of the American council, was taken by one of the king's frigates in his passage for Holland, where he was commissioned to negociate a treaty of peace with the Dutch. Being conducted to London, and an accusation laid against him for treasonable practices, he was, with John Trumbull, Esq. another of the American partizans, committed to the Tower, where he remained for a considerable time, and was then discharged. During Mr. Lauren's confinement in the Tower, he petitioned the house of commons for relief and enlargement: such petition being presented to the house in the form in which it came out of Mr. Lauren's own hand, it being written by him with a leaden pencil.

On the 10th of October, a dreadful hurricane happened in the West Indies, which did considerable damage to most of the islands in that part of the world, particularly Barbadoes, Jamaica, St. Christopher's, Martinico, St. Vincent's, and Grenada. The hurricane began at Barbadoes on the morning of the 10th, and continued, with very little intermission, about forty-eight hours. In the afternoon of the first day, the ships were driven from their anchors, and obliged to encounter all the horrors of the most outrageous sea that the oldest seamen had ever beheld. In the course of the night, Bridge Town, the capital of the island, was nearly levelled with the ground. No means were neglected, early in the evening, to barricade the doors and windows in such a manner as to render them proof to all outward violence. But before ten o'clock, the irresistible force of the tempest burst its way through different parts of the governor's house; and having carried off the roof, and the ruins falling on all sides, his family were obliged to fly for refuge to the souterrains; but they were soon driven from that asylum by the bursting in of the water, which, through the continued torrents of rain that fell, threatened nothing less than a deluge. They gained, however, some temporary shelter amongst the ruins of the platform, on which the flagstaff had been erected. But these, however massy, became so obedient to the increased violence and astonishing force of the wind, as to threaten instant destruction to the distressed fugitives, who were again compelled to encounter all the open horrors of the tempest. The governor, and such others as had strength and recollection enough to keep together, after being frequently blown down, and rolled about in the mire and wet, at length gained a battery, and took shelter under the gun carriages; where they sat in continual apprehension of being crushed to pieces, so terribly were the cannon moved by the storm.

The other houses of the town being much earlier destroyed, the surviving inhabitants were exposed to the miseries of a longer night of continued danger and horror. Numbers were buried in the houses; and the dreadful uproar of the tempest, was intermixed with the groans of the dying; the cries of those who were incapable of dragging their mangled and wounded bodies from the ruins, and the screams of women and children, whose fate seemed only to be deferred for greater horror, whilst they were lamenting or calling for help to their lost friends. When day-light appeared such a scene of desolation was presented to view, as has seldom been equalled. That beautiful island, so lately glowing in the richest bloom and verdure of continual spring, now presented the image of those dreary polar regions, whose wastes are buried in eternal winter. To increase the calamity, most of the living stock of the island, particularly of the horned kind, perished. The reputable and opulent families were, in common with the most indigent, exposed to the still unexhausted fury of the tempest, without food, raiment, or cover. The loss of human lives was great, even among the whites; but including the blacks, amounted to some thousands. The numbers indeed were so great, that they could not be accurately estimated. During the hurricane, the ships of war were driven from their moorings, and were either destroyed or greatly damaged.

The hurricane in the island of Jamaica differed in many respects from that which raged on the other islands. It was earlier by a week, than that at Barbadoes; and was more complex, being accompanied by an earthquake, and a most extraordinary swell of the sea, which rendered it more terrible as well as more fatal. But its effects were happily more confined. The two large districts of Westmoreland and Hanover, which include the whole breadth of Jamaica in its western extreme, were the principal victims of its rage. Whilst the unhappy inhabitants of Savannah la Mar, then a considerable trading town on the south side of the island, in Westmoreland parish, were gazing on the 3rd of the month with astonishment, at such an immense swell of the sea, and the agitation of its waves, as had never been witnessed before; on a sudden, bursting through all bounds, and surmounting all obstacles, it overwhelmed ness in strong memorials to the states-general, and after stating the clandestine correspondence which, it now appeared from Mr. Laurens's papers, the states of Amsterdam had long carried on with the Americans, and the instructions and powers which they had given, for entering into a treaty with them, though they were the natural subjects of a sovereign to whom the republic was joined by the strictest ties of friendship, he then demanded, in the name of the king his master, not only a formal disavowal of so irregular a conduct, but also insisted on a speedy satisfaction adequate to the offence; and the punishment of the pensionary Van Berkel and his accomplices, as disturbers of the public peace, and violators of the rights of nations. An immediate answer being evaded, the British ambassador continued to press the matter closely in several conferences, and, at length, in a second memorial. The states-general then informed sir Joseph York, by a message, that his memorial had been taken ad referendum by the deputies of the respective provinces, according to the received order and constitution of government: and that they would endeavour to frame an answer to it, as soon as the nature of their government would admit. This not being deemed satisfactory to the court of London, sir Joseph Yorke was ordered to withdraw from the Hague; and hostilities against Holland were declared on the 20th of December (x).

On the day that hostilities were denounced against Holland, general letters of marque and reprisal were granted against the Dutch, and an embargo was laid on their ships in the different ports of England. The appearances of vigour and spirit generally gratify the multitude, who seldom look forward to consequences, and are pleased at any increase in the clattering of those arms from which they think themselves secure. Many, however, regretted the war, not only as it added a new enemy to the tremendous combination already formed against us, but from a persuasion of the natural connection and mutual interests of both nations. Hostilities were soon commenced. The Princess Carolina, a Dutch man of war of fifty-four guns and three hundred men, on her way through the Channel from Amsterdam to Lisbon, was taken after a short resistance, by the Bellona man of war. Soon after captain Elphinstone, in the Warwick, of fifty guns, with a crew young in the service, fell in with the Rotterdam of equal metal, and three hundred men, which he most gallantly attacked and took; and a large Dutch East-Indiaman, outward-bound, with a number of other merchant ships, were captured in the course of a few days.

Early in the month of January, 1781, the French made a descent on the island of Jersey, but in attempting to land four of their transport vessels were wrecked upon the rocks, and upwards of two hundred men perished. Those who did land, proceeded to the most interior part of the island, where they were strongly repulsed from the garrison, great numbers of them being killed, many taken prisoners, and the rest seeking their safety in a precipitate retreat.

At the beginning of February, admiral sir George Bridges Rodney, commander of the British fleet in the West Indies, in conjunction with general Vaughan, commander of the land forces, appeared before the island of St. Eustatius, belonging to the Dutch. They sent a peremptory summons to the governor, to surrender the island and its dependencies within an hour; accompanied with a menace that they must otherwise experience the consequences. M. de Graaf, the governor, not having received any intelligence of the rupture between England and Holland, supposed the officer who delivered the summons could not be in earnest. He, however, returned for answer, that being incapable of making any defence against the force which invested the island, he must of necessity surrender it; only recommending the town and its inhabitants to the known clemency of British commanders. The wealth found in the place was so immense, as to excite the astonishment even of the conquerors, notwithstanding their intimate previous knowledge of its nature and circumstances. The whole island seemed to be only one vast magazine. All the storehouses were filled with various commodities, and even the beach was covered with hogsheads of sugar and tobacco. The value of the merchandize was estimated at above three millions sterling. The capture of shipping was immense. Upwards of two hundred and fifty vessels of various denominations were taken in the bay; exclusive of six Dutch frigates. The neighbouring small islands of St. Martin's and Suba, were reduced in the same manner, and admiral Rodney having received information, that a fleet of about thirty large ships, richly laden with West India commodities, had, just before his arrival, sailed from St. Eustatius for Holland, under convoy of a flag ship of sixty guns, he immediately dispatched the Monarch and Panther, with the Sybil frigate, in pursuit of them. These soon overtook the convoy; and the Dutch admiral refusing to strike his colours, a short engagement took place between him in the Mars, and captain Reynolds in the Monarch; in which the Dutch admiral was slain. The Mars then struck her colours; and the Panther and Sybil, having in the mean time taken care to restrain the flight and separation of the merchantmen, the whole of the convoy was captured.

So soon as the rupture with Holland was known, a number of privateers, chiefly belonging to Bristol, entered the rivers Demerary and Issequibo, which were deemed highly dangerous, and hardly navigable to strangers, and brought out, from under the guns of the Dutch forts and batteries, almost all the valuable vessels in either river (y). The governors and principal inhabitants of the settlements of Demerary and Issequibo, sensible of their defenceless situation, had already made a tender of their submission to the governor of Barbadoes; requiring no other terms than a participation of those which had been granted to St. Eustatius and its dependencies. As both parties were equally ignorant of these terms, the newly proposed subjects were naturally referred to the commanders in chief, who alone could tell the nature of the conditions which had not yet been specified. A deputation was accordingly sent by the Dutch colonists to St. Eustatius for that purpose. There whelmed the town; and swept every thing away so completely upon its return, as not to leave the smallest vestige of man, beast, or habitation behind. About three hundred persons perished in this dreadful irruption. The sea flowed up half a mile beyond its usual limits; and so sudden and unavoidable was the destruction, though it took place at noon-day, that of the inhabitants of one gentleman's house, consisting of ten whites and about forty negroes, not a human creature escaped. This was only the prelude to a more extensive calamity. Where the sea could not reach, the destruction was almost as effectual, by the succeeding earthquake and hurricane. The provisions were entirely destroyed; and the live stock nearly shared the same fate. The calamity, however, was not confined to the fruits of the earth, nor to its immediate inhabitants. The rich cultivated soil, was in many places covered with heaps of sterile matter which could not be removed without infinite labour, and which it was not in the power of culture to reclaim.

The damage sustained in the parish of Westmoreland only, was estimated at nine hundred and fifty thousand pounds, Jamaica currency, amounting to near seven hundred thousand pounds sterling. In that of Hanover, one-fourth of the absolute property was said to be lost for ever. The damage in the other two parishes was very considerable. The merchants of Kingston, the metropolis of the island, generously subscribed ten thousand pounds for the immediate relief of the unfortunate sufferers; the value of which was speedly transmitted to them in those articles of cloathing and provision which were most necessary. But the bounty of the crown and parliament of Great Britain, will afford a lasting testimonial of the beneficence and liberality of this country. Notwithstanding the expensive war in which it was engaged, the house of commons instantly granted eighty thousand pounds for the relief of the sufferers in Barbadoes, and forty thousand pounds for those in Jamaica. The generous benefactions of individuals likewise kept equal pace with the public munificence. We have thrown our account of this dreadful calamity into a note, that we might not break the thread of our detail of the important transactions of the war.

(x) In the declaration the states-general are accused with departing, through the prevalence of faction devoted to France, from those prudent principles which used to govern the republic; and following the dictates of that court, which having adopted a policy destructive of the friendship which had so long subsisted between the two nations, and which was so essential to the interests of both. The circumstances of complaint and resentment are then enumerated. The inattention to the friendly negociations proposed by the British ambassador. Their not fulfilling the mutual and perpetual defensive engagements solemnly established between both nations. The total contempt of those treaties shewn, in their ready promise to our enemies of observing a neutrality. Their giving every secret assistance to the enemy, whilst they withheld from us the succours which they were bound to furnish. The protection afforded to the American commander, Paul Jones, and the privateers of our enemies in general; and the endeavours of their subjects, in concert with the French, to raise up enemies to England in the East Indies. But the principal force and acumen of the manifesto, seemed to be directed against the city and magistracy of Amsterdam, and against their pensionary Van Berkel, on account of the lately discovered treaty with the American States.

(y) These settlements of Demerary, and Issequibo, as well as the neighbouring one of Berbices, appertained to the Dutch colony, known by the general name of Surinam, and which formed a moderate part of that vast country on the continent of South America, anciently called Guinea: the principal settlements, properly called Surinam, and which takes its name like the rest, from the great river on which it is situated, was first cultivated by the English; and being taken by the Dutch in the wars with Charles II. was ceded to them by a peace, as some sort of compensation for the valuable colony of New-York.

they discovered that they had made a very improvident demand, as, in effect, the terms which they required were, that they might be deprived of all their goods, and be banished from their habitations; for such was the general treatment of the greater part of the inhabitants of St. Eustatius. But the odium which this rigorous proceeding began to excite, the embarrassments which it created, and the impossibility of applying it, though nominally required, to a people who had voluntarily put themselves under the British dominion, obtained a different kind of treatment for the inhabitants of these colonies. They were fully secured in their property; were allowed to be governed by their own laws and magistrates; and had every other indulgence granted, which could have been reasonably expected. At the same time that their unfortunate fellows in St. Eustatius, were obliged to suffer the opprobrium of having the crime of perfidy and perjury publicly charged and recorded against them in the gazettes. The British merchants in the West-Indies, as well as at home, having suffered greatly by the indiscriminate confiscation of all private property which took place at St. Eustatius; and the former, who from their vicinity were more fully acquainted with the transactions at the place, being also greatly irritated at the supposed oppression, and the certain ruin, which individuals of their own country, as well as their friends and correspondents of others, had suffered; all these matters at first drew out strong representations against the commanders in chief, and were at length productive of innumerable law suits. The merchants of the island of St. Christopher's, who had suffered greatly by the confiscation of property at St. Eustatius, and even the legislature of that island, presented several strong remonstrances to the commander in chief, in which they stated, that their connections with that island, and the property they had lodged in it, were all, in pursuance and under the sanction of, repeated acts of the British parliament. These remonstrances produced little effect, or satisfaction. At length, a note was given in writing, to the following effect, viz. that the island was Dutch, every thing in it was Dutch, under the protection of the Dutch flag, and as Dutch, it should be treated. It is an unpleasant task to treat of a business which drew upon the English the odium of all Europe. Suffice it to say, that all the horrors of so universal a havock of property were fully realized. The beginning of this storm fell principally upon the Jews (z) in the island, who were numerous and wealthy. Several of these, with many indignities, were torn from their habitations, and banished, without knowing the place of their destination; and were, in that state of nakedness and wretchedness, transported as outlaws, and conveyed to the island of St. Christopher's. The assembly of that island, to their great honour, passed an immediate act for their present relief, and future provision, till they should have time to recover from their present calamitous situation (a). The Jews were soon followed by the Americans, some of whom had been obliged to fly their native country, through the part they had taken in support of the British cause and government. These unhappy people were sent to St. Christopher's in nearly the same plight and condition with the former; and were received and entertained with the same humanity and liberality by the inhabitants of that island. The French merchants and traders were next banished; and, at length, the native Dutch, or at least the Amsterdammers, met with the same fate. In the mean time, public sales were advertised, invitation given, and protection afforded, to purchasers of all nations and denominations; and the island of St. Eustatius became one of the greatest auctions that ever was opened in the universe, to satisfy the rapacity of the British naval commanders.

Though the British forces seemed to obtain a superiority in America, there was no probability of terminating that destructive war. The colonists were rather animated than deterred by the slaughter which overspread their country, and no effort was exerted against them without considerable loss. In March, general Greene's army at Guildford was defeated, after a very severe engagement, in which several English officers of rank, and great numbers of privates, were killed and wounded.

The English affairs in the East Indies had no very favourable aspect at this time. Dispatches arrived from Madras, with intelligence that Hyder Ally had obtained a complete victory over a detachment of British troops commanded by colonel Baillie, which, not being sufficiently supported by the main army under general sir Hector Monro, was obliged to retreat, leaving behind him his heavy cannon, camp equipage, and baggage. The conqueror pushed his successes afterwards to Arcot, and several other places; and, it was then supposed, he would have made himself master of Madras; but by the judicious management of general Coote, and the intrepidity of the English forces under his command, he was not only disappointed in his aim, but also defeated in several engagements, and most of the places he had taken were recovered by the valour of the British forces.

Commodore Johnson's fleet, with several India ships under convoy, was attacked on the 16th of April by the French fleet under M. de Suffrein, off the island of St. Jago, when great damage was sustained on both sides. Several of the India ships were taken by the French, but as they were not able to retain the whole, some escaped, and rejoining the English fleet, arrived at their respective ports in Britain.

The British troops being in possession of Camden, lord Rawdon, with colonel Weston's detachment, being near it, and closely pursued by the American general Greene, after the battle of Guildford, set fire to that beautiful town, and reduced it to ashes, after which he retired for safety to within a small distance of Charles Town.

About this period an engagement took place between admiral Arbuthnot, commander of an English fleet in America, and a small squadron of the French. The battle was very severe for a time, and considerable damage was sustained on both sides, but at length an uncommon mist arising, the two fleets lost sight of each other, and consequently separated.

A smart action took place, on the 28th of April, in the West Indies, between the British fleet, under the command of sir Samuel Hood, and a squadron of French ships under the command of M. de Grassé. The action was continued for some time with great obstinacy, till at length night separated the fleets, and the French bore away. On the 30th they again met and renewed the engagement, which at length terminated without any material advantage on either side.

On the 2nd of June the island of Tobago was taken from the English by a body of land forces, commanded (z) The expulsion and plunder of the Jews was afterwards (Feb. 4, 1782,) referred to a committee on the petition of Mr. Mohen, and motion of Mr. Burke, and a report presented (on the 14th of May,) reflecting great discredit on the character of the general and admiral. Actions at law instituted against Rodney, were subsequently decided to his disadvantage, and he was obliged to refund large sums for property illegally seized. Vid. Adolphus's History, iii. 435.

General Vaughan protested upon his honour, that he was not directly or indirectly one shilling enriched by the capture of St. Eustatia.

(a) Our limits will not allow us to insert every paper which the calamities of the war gave rise to; but we must not, on this occasion, wholly pass by the elegant and pathetic petition of the Jews of St. Eustatius to admiral Rodney and general Vaughan.

"To their Excellencies the Commanding Officers in Chief of his Britannic Majesty's Army and Navy in the West Indies.

"May it please your Excellencies,

"To permit us in the name and on the behalf of ourselves, and others of the people of the Hebrew nation, residents in the island of St. Eustatius, humbly to approach your excellencies, and with heartfelt anguish, to lay our grievances before you, and say: that it was with the utmost concern and astonishment we have already, not only received your excellencies' afflicting order and sentence, to give up the keys of our stores with an inventory thereof, and of our household plate and furniture, and to hold ourselves in readiness to depart this island, ignorant of our destination, and leaving our beloved wives, and helpless children behind us, and our property and effects liable to seizure and confiscation: but also find, that these orders are for the major part carried into execution, a number of our brethren having, on Tuesday the thirteenth instant, been sent on board a ship, and have not since been heard of. Such unexpected orders as these from British commanders, whose principal characteristic is, "mercy and humanity," have not only been productive of the most horrid and melancholy scenes of distress and confusion, that ever British eyes beheld under the fatal consequences of a rigid war, but numbers of families are now helpless, disconsolate, and in an absolute state of indigence and despair."

We cannot insert the whole of this long and energetic petition, without incurring the disapprobation of our readers, but we hope we shall be pardoned for admitting the conclusion of it, which is as follows:

"May the God of all mercies incline your hearts to listen to the prayers and supplications of your petitioners, and in this confidence we humbly submit ourselves to your excellencies' determination, hoping that you will pardon us for the intrusion of this address; and that through your excellencies' lenity and humanity, your excellencies will be pleased to grant us such favourable terms, as you in your judgement and wisdom shall think most advantageous to his majesty's interest, and the honour and glory of his successful arms.

"And your petitioners, as in duty bound, shall ever pray, &c."

by the French governor of St. Vincent's under cover of M. de Grasse's squadron (b).

Early in the month of June admiral Hyde Parker sailed from Portsmouth with four ships of the line, and one of fifty guns, for the North Sea, to annoy the Dutch Baltic trade, and protect the British commerce. In the mean time Holland equipped a force that might be able to convoy their outward bound trade to the Baltic; but it was not till after the middle of July, that admiral Zoutman, and commodore Kingsbergen, sailed from the Texel, with a great convoy under their protection. Admiral Parker was on his return with a great convoy from Elsineur. He had been joined by several frigates since he left Portsmouth, and by the Dolphin of forty-four guns; and, in this critical conjuncture, was reinforced by the junction of commodore Keith Stuart, in the Berwick, of seventy-four guns, who had been some time on the coast of Scotland. The squadron now consisted of six ships of the line, of which the princess Amelia carried eighty guns, the Fortitude, the admiral's own ship, and the Berwick, seventy-four each, the Beinfaisant sixty-four, the old Buffalo sixty, and the Preston fifty guns. The hostile fleets faced each other on the Dogger Bank, (there not being much disparity in their strength,) early in the morning of the 5th of August. The parties were equally resolved to do their utmost; a gloomy silence prevailed; and not a single gun was fired till the hostile fleets were within little more than pistol-shot distance. Admiral Parker in the Fortitude, then ranging a-breast of Mr. Zoutman's ship, the Admiral Ruyter, the action was commenced with fury on both sides. The cannonade continued without intermission for three hours and forty minutes; when the ships were so shattered on both sides, that they were incapable of answering so much command, as would keep them within the distance necessary for mutual annoyance; while the combatants were reluctantly separated by the mere motion of the water. The English ships were principally wounded in their masts and rigging, but those of the enemy were greatly injured in their hulls, insomuch, that it was with the utmost difficulty they were kept above water, till they reached separately, and in the utmost distress, some of their own nearest ports (c).

Advices were received in August, that Pensacola, the capital of West Florida, had been besieged by the Spaniards, and that the garrison had surrendered at discretion; in consequence of which the whole province became a conquest to the Spanish monarch.

A brisk engagement took place near Sandy-Hook in North America on the 31st of August, between the English fleet under sir Samuel Hood, and the French fleet commanded by M. de Barras. The engagement continued from four o'clock in the morning till sun-set, during which time the ships belonging to both nations received great damage, but neither fleet obtained much advantage. The Terrible received so much injury, that it was thought necessary to destroy her, which was accordingly done, after taking out the water, provisions, and other essential articles. Sir Samuel Hood was desirous of renewing the engagement the following morning, but was prevented by the French sheltering themselves in Chesapeak Bay.

On the entrance of general Morgan into the district of Ninety-Six, lord Cornwallis, who was far advanced in his preparations for the invasion of North Carolina, found it necessary to drive him from this station, that he might not leave an enemy in his rear. Lieutenant-colonel Tarleton was therefore ordered to proceed with about eleven hundred men, and "push him to the utmost." Tarleton had two field pieces, and a superiority of infantry, in the proportion of five to four, and of cavalry the proportion of three to one. With these advantages, he engaged Morgan at the Cowpens, near Pacolet River, on the 17th of January. The British, led to the attack by Tarleton himself, advanced with a shout, and poured in an incessant fire of musketry. The American militia, though they received the charge with firmness, were soon compelled to fall back into the rear of the second line; and this line also, after an obstinate conflict, was obliged to fall back on the cavalry. The English looked upon the day as now their own: but the Americans, notwithstanding the inferiority of their numbers, rallied, and charged the British forces with fixed bayonets. The English were, in their turn, thrown into confusion, and driven from the ground with great slaughter. Lieutenants-colonel Howard and Washington pressed the advantage they had now gained, until the British artillery and a great part of their infantry had surrendered. So sudden was the defeat, that two hundred and fifty horse, which had not been brought into action, fled with precipitation. The first battalion of the seventy-first, and two British light infantry companies, laid down their arms to the American militia. Upwards of three hundred of the British troops were killed or wounded, and above five hundred taken prisoners. Eight hundred muskets, two field pieces, two standards, thirty-five baggage waggons, and one hundred dragoon horses, fell into the hands of the victors. Of the Americans, twelve men only were killed, and sixty wounded (d).

General Arnold, who had returned from Virginia, was appointed to conduct an expedition against New London. The troops employed on this service, were landed on each side of the harbour in two detachments; the one commanded by lieutenant-colonel Eyre, and the other by general Arnold (e). For the defence of the place, there had been constructed below the town, and on the western side of the harbour; a fort, called Fort Trumbull, with a redoubt; and opposite to it, on Groton Hill, another fort, called Fort Griswold, a strong square fortification, insufficiently garrisoned. Fort Trumbull, the redoubt, and the town of New London, being totally untenable, were evacuated on the approach of Arnold, who took possession of them with inconsiderable loss, on the 6th of September. Fort Guiswold was defended by colonel Ledyard with a garrison of about one hundred and sixty men, some of whom had just evacuted the works on the opposite side of the river. On the rejection of a summons to surrender, the British marched up to the assault on three sides; and, though the assent was steep, and a continued fire was directed against them, they at length made a lodgement on the ditch and friezed work, and entered the embrazures with fixed bayonets. An officer of the conquering troops, on entering the fort, asked who commanded. "I did," answered colonel Ledyard, "but you do now;" and presented him his sword, which was instantly plunged into his own bosom. Although resistance had now ceased, yet, to the indelible infamy of the conquerors, they commenced a merciless slaughter, which "was kept up until the greater part of the garrison was killed or wounded." The town of New London, and the stores contained in it, were reduced to ashes; and general Arnold, having completed the object of his expedition, returned in eight days to New York (f).

The British fleet on its return to New York, was joined by the Prudent man of war, with several frigates for the (b) In July the attention of the public was engaged in the fate of M. de la Motte, a Frenchman, who had been arrested as a spy, committed to the Tower for high-treason, and being tried and found guilty, was, on the 27th of the same month, executed at Tyburn, pursuant to his sentence.

About this time a general demolition of "E. O." tables took place in the metropolis. E. O. was a game supposed to be out of the reach of the law, because not distinctly specified in any of the statutes; and tables were erected in almost every street and alley in the metropolis. To these, persons of all denominations resorted. Some were established in common brothels, and exhibited disgraceful scenes of riot, drunkenness, and debauchery, while robbery, assassination, and suicide abounded. Towards the close of the ensuing session, the attention of the legislature was directed to the destroying of these nuisances; and it was also stated in the house of commons, in June 1782, that in two parishes of Westminster alone, two hundred and ninety-six E. O. tables were maintained. Another member corroborated the assertion, with this addition, that five hundred more were on the stocks, and that they were common in every county town.

Also at this time, a bill was introduced for disfranchising the borough of Cricklade. A committee granted on the petition of an unsuccessful candidate, reported, that great abuses had been committed; and sir Harbord Harbord declared, that out of two hundred and forty-three votes, eighty-three had already been convicted of bribery, and actions were pending against forty-three others. In the house of commons the disfranchisement was opposed, but without effect. It was justified on the same principles as that of the electors of New Shoreham! "When that bill was shewn to the late earl of Chatham," said Mr. Montague, "he expressed his joy at finding the borough removed from Bengal, to its ancient situation in the county of Sussex."

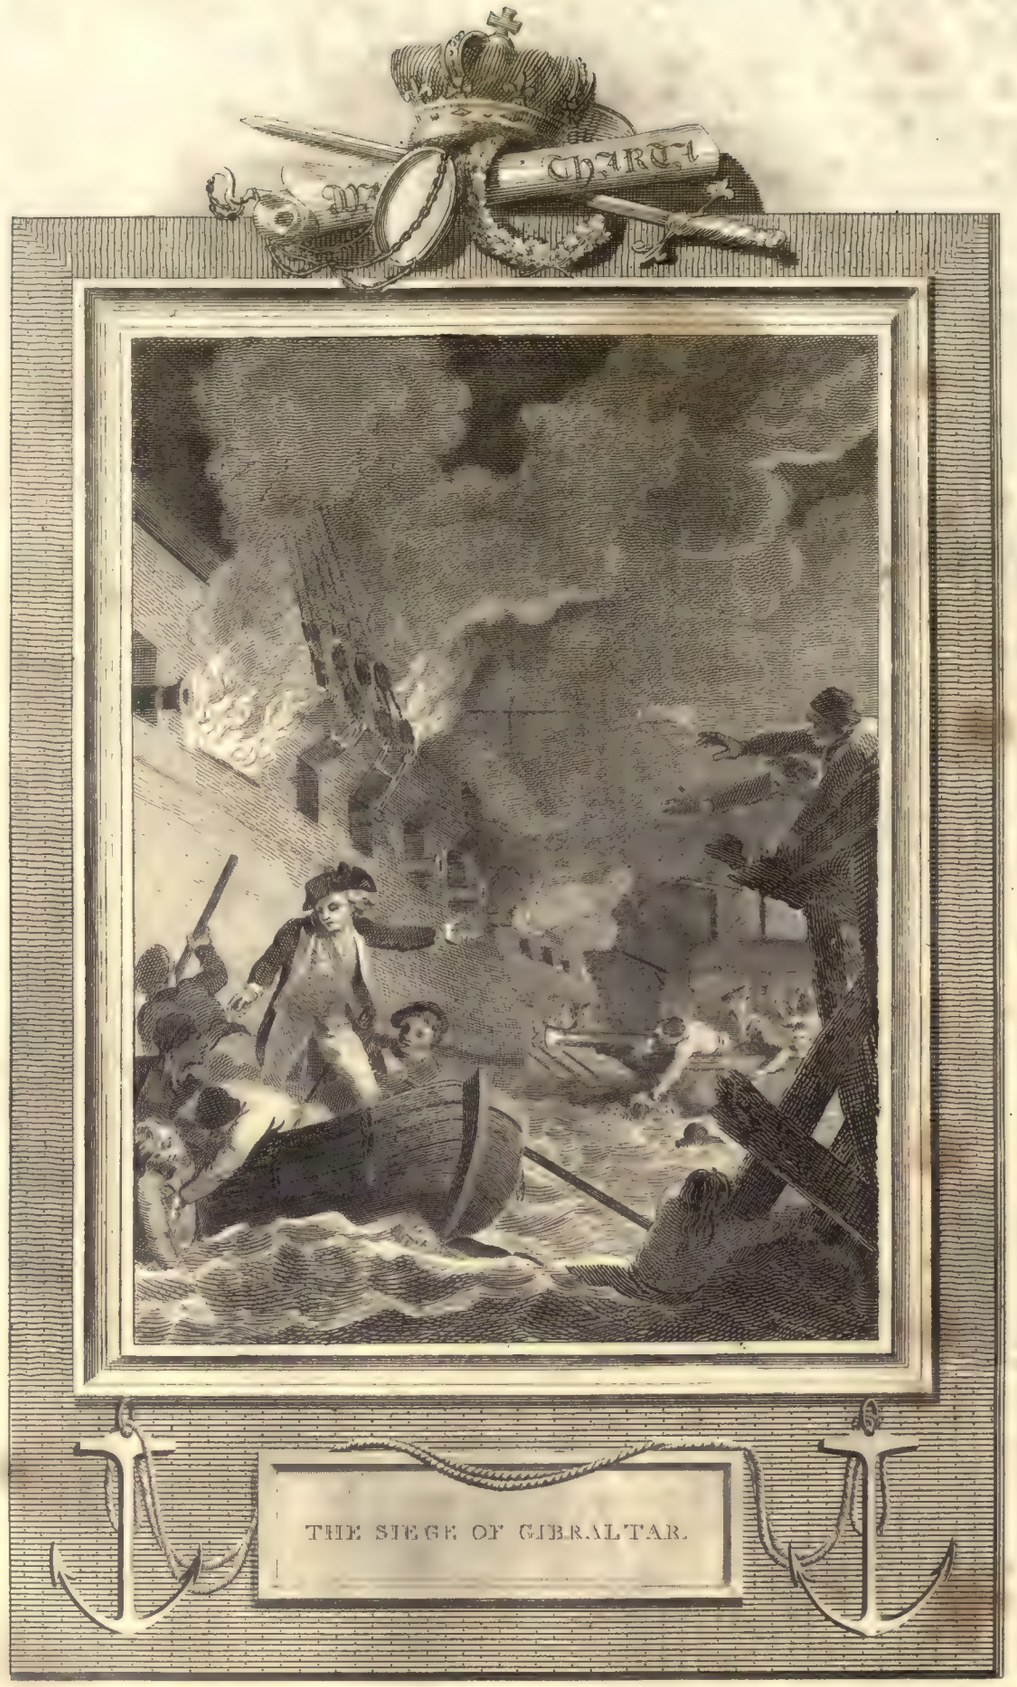
West Indies: and soon after its arrival, was farther reinforced by rear-admiral Digby, with three ships of the line from England; but the junction of the Rhode-Island squadron, had given so decided a superiority to M. de Grasse, that nothing less than the most desperate circumstances, could have justified any attempt towards another encounter. The desire of supporting lord Cornwallis and his army, however, prevailed over all considerations of danger, and the British naval commanders were expeditious in refitting and equipping the fleet at New York. This, however, though extremely necessary, required more time than could have been well afforded at this critical juncture. The delay seemed indeed to be in some degree compensated, by the arrival of the Prince William and Torbay men of war from Jamaica. In the mean time a council of war, consisting of all the flag and general officers, being held, it was determined that every possible exertion should be made both by the fleet and army, to form a junction with the squadron and army in Virginia. It was, however, the 19th of October, before the fleet could be got clear over the bar; sir Henry Clinton, with about seven thousand of his best forces, having embarked on board the ships of war.

The British fleet now amounted to twenty-five ships of the line, two fifties, and eight frigates; and notwithstanding the superiority of force which the enemy still retained, the spirit which operated both upon the common men and officers was so high, that they entertained not a doubt, but that the expected naval action would stand foremost, among the most obstinate and the most bloody, that had yet been known. During these transactions on the side of New York, the united armies employed in the siege of York Town, sensible of the efforts that would be made for its relief, and unwilling to stake all their hopes on the issue of a naval engagement, exerted themselves in the prosecution of their works; and shewed no less resolution in their attacks, than vivacity in the fire of their batteries. On the night of the 11th of October, they began their second parallel within three hundred yards of the works of the place, and carried it on with unremitting industry. Two redoubts, which were advanced about three hundred yards on the British left, had greatly incommoded the enemy, and still continued to impede their progress. It was resolved to attack these at the same time, at dark, on the evening of the 14th. To balance the honour as well as the duty, between both nations, the attack on one was committed to the Americans, and on the other to the French. Colonel Hamilton, Washington's aid-du-camp, commanded the American detachment, which marched to the assault with unloaded arms; passed to the abbatis and palisades without waiting to remove them; and attacking the works on all sides at once, carried the redoubt with astonishing rapidity. The French were equally successful, but their loss was greater; amounting to about an hundred in killed and wounded. The taking of these two redoubts may be said to be decisive of the fate of the army. Lord Cornwallis, in a letter to sir Henry Clinton, considered their situation as being so desperate, that he could not recommend to the fleet and army to run any great risk in endeavouring to save them. The British commander, however, omitted nothing which could prevent that fatal issue, which was equally dreaded and expected. Being sensible that his works could not stand many hours after the opening of the batteries of the second parallel, he did his utmost to interrupt that work, opening new embrazures for guns, and keeping up a constant fire with all his howitzers and small mortars. At length the works were so ruined, and the batteries so overpowered, that there was no part of the whole front attacked, in which the besieged could shew a single gun; and their shells, which were the last source of defence, were nearly exhausted. In these circumstances, lord Cornwallis had no other choice left than to prepare for a surrender on the following day, or to endeavour to escape with the greatest part of the troops. He determined upon attempting the latter, under the consideration, that though it should prove unsuccessful in its immediate object, it might at least delay the enemy in the prosecution of farther enterprizes. The adverse current of fortune gave a contrary effect, to a design well calculated to delay the fate of lord Cornwallis's army. Boats were prepared, under various pretexts, to be ready for receiving the troops at ten at night, in order to pass them over to Gloucester Point. The arrangements were made with the utmost secrecy; and the intention was to abandon the baggage, and to leave a detachment behind, in order to capitulate for the inhabitants of the town, and for the sick and wounded; lord Cornwallis having prepared a letter upon the subject, which was to be delivered to general Washington upon his departure. The first embarkation consisting of the light infantry, the guards, and a part of the twenty-third regiment, had arrived at Gloucester Point, and the greater part of the troops were already landed, when, at that critical moment, the weather, which was then moderate and calm, instantly changed to a most violent storm of wind and rain. The boats, with the remaining troops, were all driven down the river, and the intention of passing was not only entirely frustrated, but the absence of the boats rendered it impossible to bring back the troops from Gloucester. Thus weakened and divided, the army was involved in the most imminent danger. The enemies batteries were again opened at day-break; and the passage at Gloucester Point was now much exposed to their fire. But the boats happily returned; and the troops were brought back in the course of the afternoon. Lord Cornwallis perceiving the dreadful situation of his army, wrote a letter to general Washington on the 17th, proposing a cessation of arms for twenty-four hours, and that commissioners might be appointed on both sides for adjusting the terms of capitulation.



The American general in his answer, declared his "ardent desire to spare the farther effusion of blood, and his readiness to listen to such terms as were admissible;" and granted a suspension of hostilities for two hours. The general propositions stated by lord Cornwallis for the basis of the proposed negociation, being such as to lead to an opinion, that the terms of capitulation might without much difficulty be adjusted, the suspension of hostilities was prolonged through the night. Commissioners were appointed the next day to digest into form such articles as general Washington had drawn up and proposed to lord Cornwallis; and early the next morning the American general sent them to his lordship with a letter, expressing his expectation, that they would be signed by eleven, and that the garrison would march out by two in the afternoon. Lord Cornwallis, submitting to a necessity absolutely inevitable, surrendered the posts of York Town and Gloucester Point, with the garrison, and the shipping in the harbour, with the seamen, to the land and naval officers of America and France (g). By the articles of capitulation, the officers were to retain their side arms and private property. The garrison marched out of the town with colours cased; and general Lincoln, by appointment, received the submission of the royal army precisely in the same manner in which the submission of his own army had been previously made, at the surrender of Charlestown (h). The capture of lord Cornwallis may be considered as the closing scene of the revolutionary war.

The affairs of the English in the East Indies presented a very favourable aspect, towards the termination of this year. In December, the gallant sir Eyre Coote engaged the army of Hyder Ally between Borto Novo and Monteapollam with great success. The battle continued eight hours, (g) The army, with the artillery, arms, accoutrements, military chest, and all public stores, were surrendered to general Washington; the ships and seamen, to the count de Grasse. The prisoners, exclusively of seamen, amounted to seven thousand and seventy-three; of which number five thousand nine hundred and fifty were rank and file.

(h) Colonel Isaac Hayne, of South Carolina, was executed at Charlestown on the 4th of August, this year, by order of Lord Rawdon and colonel Balfour. After the reduction of Charlestown, colonel Hayne had, with some restrictions, subscribed a declaration to the king of Great Britain; but afterwards, from an "open breach of contract" on the part of the British, and their inability to afford him the promised protection for his allegiance, he was led to consider himself as released from his engagements, and, on solicitation, took the command of a regiment of militia in Carolina. Falling into the hands of the British while in arms, he was thrown into a loathsome prison; and, though he was at first promised a trial, and had counsel prepared to justify his conduct by the laws of nations, and the usages of war; yet this privilege was finally refused, and he was ordered for execution. The royal lieutenant governor Bull, and a great number of the inhabitants of Charlestown, both loyalists and Americans, interceded for his life. The ladies of that town generally signed a petition in his behalf. His children, accompanied by some near relations, begged, on their bended knees, for the life of their father. These intercessions "drew tears from many a hard eye;" but the British commanders were inflexible. Colonel Hayne submitted to his destiny with decent firmness, composure, and dignity. "Thus fell," says Dr. Ramsey, "in the bloom of life, a brave officer, a worthy citizen, a just and upright man; furnishing an example of heroism in death, that extorted a confession from his enemies, that, though he did not die in a good cause, he must at least have acted from a persuasion of its being so." See American Annals, vol. ii. p. 377.

hours, and was maintained with great obstinacy on both sides, till at length the forces under Sir Eyre Coote, though greatly inferior in number, became victors, and the enemy precipitately retreating, left them masters of the field; the loss of the Indian army was about four thousand killed, among whom were many of their principal officers.

The Spaniards made a very forcible attack on Gibraltar, but from the intrepidity of the troops under the command of general Elliot, governor of that fortress, the enemy were repulsed. The battle began at three o'clock in the morning. The pioneers and artillerists made wonderful exertions, and spread their fire with such amazing rapidity, that in half an hour two batteries of ten inch mortars, and three batteries of six guns each, with all the lines of approach, communication, traverses, &c. were in flames, and reduced to ashes. The mortars and cannon were spiked, and their beds, carriages, and platform destroyed. Their magazines blew up successively as the fire approached them. Finding all opposition to be ineffectual, the enemy offered no farther annoyance, than an ill-directed fire of round and grape shot from the forts of St. Barbara and St. Philip, and the batteries on the lines, and remained in the camp spectators of the conflagration. Great numbers of the enemy were destroyed, but the loss on the part of the English was very inconsiderable.

About this time St. Eustatius, with the island of St. Martin, was captured by the French, under the marquis de Bouille. They were taken by surprize on the 26th of November, and by a small party of the enemy, the number not exeeeding three hundred, who landed from three frigates and some small craft, at Jenkins's Bay, on the back of the island. They obtained possession of the place without the least opposition from the garrisons, though they were both numerous. Lieutenant-colonel Cockburne, of the thirty-fifth regiment, who commanded at St. Eustatius when it was taken by the French, declared, that exclusive of the money deposited in that place by admiral Rodney and general Vaughan, there was a sum of two hundred and sixty-four thousand livres, which was his property, and which he therefore demanded. The marquis de Bouille having assembled the superior officers of his corps, to inform them of lieutenant-colonel Cockburne's demand, they were all of opinion, that the English governor's money should be restored to him, which was accordingly done. The marquis de Bouille found in the governor's house the sum of one million, which he restored to the Dutch, after receiving authentic proof that it was their property. He also found about one million six hundred thousand livres in colony money belonging to admiral Rodney, general Vaughan, and other officers, arising from the sale of their captures, which he divided between his land and sea-forces.

About this time public meetings, clubs, committees, petitions, and projects of reform, were very frequent. In December, a common hall of the city of London voted an address, remonstrance, and petition to the king, complaining of his speech from the throne, and reprobating the conduct of ministers, recapitulating the disasters of the war, and their direful effects; declaring their abhorrence of it, as an unnatural and unfortunate contest. An address of a similar nature was voted by the electors of Westminster, whom Mr. Fox convened in Westminster Hall, and whom he addressed in a long and interesting harangue. The freeholders of Middlesex and Surrey, the West India planters, and many other bodies and fraternities, adopted a similar mode.

The war in America had been attended with so little success, and with such an immense expence of blood and treasure, that it excited the indignation of great numbers of the inhabitants of Great Britain. Many respectable members of both houses pointed out the atrocious cruelty of maintaining so injurious a contest, and thence inferred the expediency of finally terminating such an offensive war. Among these the right honourable Henry Seymour Conway, particularly distinguished himself. On the 27th of February, 1782, he made a motion in the house of commons to the following effect: "That the farther prosecution of an offensive war on the continent of America, for the purpose of reducing the revolted colonies to obedience by force, will be the means of weakening the efforts of this country against her European enemies; that it greatly tends to increase the mutual enmity so fatal to the interests both of Great Britain and America, and by preventing a happy reconciliation with that country, to frustrate the earnest desire graciously expressed by his majesty, to restore the blessings of public tranquillity." This motion, after a short debate, was carried; upon which general Conway moved, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty thereupon." This was carried without a division, and an address was accordingly presented, to which his majesty was pleased to give a most gracious answer.

The united forces of France and Spain laid siege to the island of Minorca in February, 1782. The earnestness of the court of Spain to gain possession of this island was so great, that, through the medium of an immense bribe, it endeavoured to corrupt the fidelity of the governor. The duke de Crillon became the instrument in this business. General Murray treated the insult with a mixture of disdain and resentment. The fortress had been closely invested, and its communications with the country entirely cut off, from the landing of the enemy, about the middle of August, 1781. By this means the garrison were deprived of all supplies of vegetables; and that want alone has not often produced more unfortunate effects. In all other respects they were admirably provided. The scurvy raged with such violence among the troops, as could hardly be exceeded in the most foggy and humid northern climates, and even under the worst circumstances of water and provisions; while this inveterate enemy was aided in its course, as usual, by its destructive concomitants, a putrid pestilential fever, and a mortal dysentery. It is, however, to be observed, that other causes concurred to the ill effects produced by the immediate want of vegetables. The greater part of the British troops had been eleven years on the island; and the soldiers had lived during that time on salt provisions. Its progress was likewise encouraged by the close confinement of the troops within the narrow limits of the fortress. The combined forces, which amounted to sixteen thousand regular troops, brought a prodigious artillery, consisting of one hundred and nine pieces of the heaviest cannon, and thirty-six great mortars, to act upon the place. The garrison consisted only of two thousand six hundred and ninety-two men. A marine corps, which had been formed on the present occasion, having preserved their health much better than the regular troops, were of excellent service in the siege, and composed a greater part of the remainder. A few Greeks and Corsicans also displayed great bravery. The fortress was, in many respects, exceedingly strong; but the upper works by no means corresponded in strength with the under. The knowledge of this weakness perhaps induced the duke de Crillon to lie more unguardedly in his head quarters at Cape Mola, than he might perhaps otherwise have done: while the observation of this negligence encouraged a vigorous and successful sally from the garrison, who, surprizing and routing the enemy, chased the duke from his post, and secured themselves, for the present, so effectually in it, that though he brought up his whole army to dislodge them, he, after much hesitation, desisted from the attack. The successful party returned safe to the garrison on the following night, taking with them about a hundred prisoners, among whom were a a lieutenant-colonel, three captains, and four or five subaltern officers. About this time the enemy having opened their bomb batteries, a shell from the castle fell upon a powder magazine, which by its explosion entirely destroyed one of them; a number of men were blown up, and a large quantity of loaded shells either spent their fury in the air, or burst more destructively among the troops. The artillery of the fortress was likewise so well served, as soon after to sink a ship in the harbour, which was just arrived, loaded with ammunition and stores for the supply of the enemy's batteries. But these could in no degree counterbalance the increasing ravages of those diseases which prevailed in the garrison. Nor could the differences that took place, between the governor and lieutenant-governor, tend in any degree to the removal of difficulties. Although the enemy kept a most cautious distance in the construction and progress of their works, their artillery were so weighty and incessant in their battery, that in a short time they produced an extraordinary effect in ruining the upper defences of the fortress; and dismounted or rendered useless a great number of pieces of ordnance. Nothing ever exceeded the zeal, valour, and constancy displayed by the garrison. The behaviour of the emaciated private men, through the course of the siege, was indeed beyond example. Numbers of soldiers expired on guard, whose emulative eagerness ness to defend the place, occasioned them to conceal their extreme illness to the last, to prevent their being sent to the hospitals from a service which held so firm a possession of their hearts. The soldiers of the garrison were at length so much reduced by sickness, that only six hundred and sixty men remained, who were in any degree fit for service at the beginning of February; and of these, all but one hundred were so much afflicted by the scurvy, that the physicians and surgeons declared, they could exist but a very few days, before they must of necessity be sent to the hospital. They also declared, that a few days longer obstinacy in defence, must prove the inevitable destruction of the remains of that brave garrison. The necessary guards, on the last night of defence, required four hundred and fifteen men upon duty; only two hundred and forty-five were therefore left, which was one hundred and seventy less than the necessary number, for the next relief, and no picket could at all be formed. Under all these circumstances, the governor saw himself reduced to the necessity of a capitulation, on the fifth of the month; by which he obtained all the honours of war, and what else he required, excepting that article only, of freeing the garrison from the condition of prisoners of war, which the duke de Crillon assured him, his master, the Spanish king, had commanded him not to grant: the troops were, however, to be sent to England, subject to the customary conditions, till they were either exchanged, or discharged by a peace (i). Such was the fate of the island of Minorca, nearly fourteen years after its reduction by the English; and after being long considered as one of the splendid jewels of the British monarchy.

The islands of St. Christopher and Nevis were about the same time captured by the French, under the command of the marquis de Bouille. Major-general Shirley, the governor, defended it with great resolution, for a considerable time: but, at length, finding the enemy too powerful, he was obliged to submit to their superiority of strength, and, after a siege of about five weeks, compelled to surrender to the French.

The squadron under vice-admiral Barrington fell in with a number of transports belonging to the French, under the protection of three men of war, and two frigates. Captain Jarvis of the Foudroyant came up with, and engaged, the French commodore's ship La Pegase, of seventy-four guns, and after an hour's engagement, obliged her to surrender. The rest of the fleet were diligent in pursuing the transports, which were hastening to secure themselves in Brest water; but in this, however, they were disappointed, and thirteen out of eighteen were captured. Some of them were full of troops, and the rest laden with stores, ordnance, &c. destined for the relief of the French settlements in the East Indies (k).

While these things were occurring abroad, some considerable alterations took place at home. Great disputes arose in the British senate relative to the suppression of the war in America. A considerable majority were for its suppression; but they were strongly opposed by the ministry, and great debates arose on the occasion. At last, after several resolutions passed, sir John Rous made a motion, which comprized the whole, adding these significant words: "Therefore this house can no longer repose confidence in those who have the management of public affairs." In consequence of this lord North, on his next appearance in the house, declared he was no longer minister. The other members of the ministry quickly followed his example, and his majesty was pleased to appoint a new administration, which was composed of such gentlemen as appeared to be satisfactory to all parties.

The British fleet in the West-Indies now amounted to thirty-six ships of the line; and the French fleet under M. de Grassé was nearly of the same force. The French fleet seems to have been rather over-manned, and besides a full complement of seamen, had nearly six thousand land forces on board. The Ville de Paris, of one hundred and ten guns, De Grasse's own ship, had about thirteen hundred men, including soldiers, on board; and the French seventy-fours carried nine hundred men each. The van of the English was commanded by sir Samuel Hood, the centre by sir George Rodney, and the rear by admiral Drake. The three divisions of the French fleet were commanded by the count de Grasse, M. de Vaudreuil, and M. de Bougainville. The French fleet began to sail out of the harbour of Port Royal, by the break of day on the 8th of April, with a large convoy under their protection, all bound to leeward, and intended to fall down to the French and Spanish ports in Hispaniola. M. de Grasse had every reason to wish to avoid an engagement on the present occasion; but the movements of the French ships were so speedily communicated, by signals from the frigates upon the watch, and the English fleet were so well prepared, that the whole were clear off Gross-Islet Bay by noon, and pursued them with the utmost expedition. This diligence, and the general ardour, brought them within sight of the enemy under Dominique, the same night; and they afterwards regulated the pursuit by their signals. Notwithstanding the alacrity of the English, M. de Grasse accommodated himself to the emergency, and though fighting was by no means his object, he formed the line of battle to windward early in the morning, to afford an opportunity to his convoy to proceed on their course, whilst he remained to abide the consequences. On the other side, sir George Rodney had thrown out signals soon after five in the morning to prepare for battle, to form the line at two cables length distance asunder, and for the ships to fill and stand on. But the English fleet lay becalmed for a considerable time under the highlands of Dominique, while the enemy, who were farther advanced towards Guadaloupe, had wind enough to enable them to make the movements we have stated. The breeze at length reaching the van of the English fleet, they began to close with the French centre, whilst their own centre and rear were still becalmed. This action, however, commenced about nine o'clock on the 9th of April. The attack was led by the Royal Oak, captain Burnet, and seconded by the Alfred and the Montague, with the most impetuous bravery. The whole division were in a few minutes closely engaged, and for upwards of an hour were exceedingly pressed by the great superiority of the enemy. The Barfleur, sir Samuel Hood's own ship, had at one time seven, and generally three ships firing upon her, and none of the division escaped the encounter of a very disproportionate force. At length, the leading ships of the centre were gradually enabled to come up to the assistance of the van. These were soon followed by sir George Rodney in the Formidable, with his two seconds, the Namur and Duke, all of ninety guns; who supported

(i) So tragical a spectacle as the poor remains of the garrison, has seldom been exhibited, as in their march through the Spanish and French armies, which were drawn up in opposite lines for the passage. Six hundred old, emaciated, and decrepid soldiers, were followed by one hundred and twenty of the royal artillery, and two hundred seamen: about twenty Corsicans, and a few Greeks, Moors, and Turks, closed the procession. The scene became still more melancholy and interesting, when the battalions arrived at the place appointed for laying down their arms; the soldiers exclaiming with tears in their eyes, that "they surrendered them to God alone;" and at the same time seeming to derive consolation from the idea, that the victors could not boast of their conquest in taking an hospital.

(k) Towards the close of the year 1781, lord George Germaine was, for his eminent services, raised by his majesty to the dignity of the peerage. But before the great seal was affixed to the patent, the marquis of Carmarthen moved, in the house of peers, "that it was highly derogatory to the honour of that house, that any person labouring under the sentence of a court-martial, styled in the public orders issued by his late majesty, a sentence much worse than death, and adjudged unfit to serve his majesty in any military capacity, should be recommended to the crown, as a proper person to sit in that house." This motion was evaded by the question of adjournment: but lord George Germaine having actually taken his seat in that house, under the title of lord viscount Sackville, the marquis of Carmarthen renewed his attack, and urged, "that the house of peers being a court of honour, it was their duty to preserve that honour uncontaminated, and to mark, in the most forcible manner, their disapprobation of the introduction of a person into that assembly, who was stigmatized in the orderly books of every regiment in the service." Lord Abingdon, who seconded the motion, styled the admission of lord George Germaine to the peerage, "an insufferable indignity to that house, and an outrageous insult to the public." Lord Sackville, in his own vindication, denied the justice of the sentence passed upon him, and affirmed, "that he considered his restoration to the council-board, at a very early period of the present reign, as amounting to a virtual repeal of that iniquitous verdict." The duke of Richmond strongly defended the motion, declaring, "that he himself was present at the battle of Minden, and was summoned on the trial of lord George Germaine; and had his deposition been called for, he could have proved, that the time lost when the noble viscount delayed to advance, under pretence of receiving contradictory orders, was not less than one hour and a half; that the cavalry were a mile and a quarter only from the scene of action; and it was certainly in his lordship's power to have rendered the victory, important as it was, far more brilliant and decisive; and he had little reason to complain of the sentence passed upon him." The motion was also powerfully supported by lord Southampton, the earl of Shelburne, the marquis of Rockingham, and other distinguished peers: but on a division, it was rejected by a majority of ninety-three to twenty-eight voices. A protest, however, was entered on the journals of the house, which could not have been a pleasing circumstance to his lordship.

ported a dreadful fire. The gallantry of a French captain of a seventy-four in the rear, who, opposite to Prince Rupert's Bay, having backed his main-top sail, steadily received and bravely returned the fire of these three great ships in succession, without in the least attempting to leave his station, excited the highest applause and admiration of his enemies. The coming up of the admiral, with part of the centre division, rendered the fight less unequal; and M. de Grasse, perceiving that his purpose had failed while the van was engaged singly; determined, by changing the nature of the action, to prevent its now becoming decisive. The command of the wind, and the connected state of his fleet, enabled him to execute this design, and to keep such a cautious distance during the remainder of the engagement, as was evidently intended to disable our ships as much as could be done, without any considerable hazard on his own side. This sort of firing, which was extremely well supported on both sides, was continued for an hour and three quarters longer; during which time, the rest of the fleet was held back by the calms and baffling winds under Dominique. About twelve o'clock the remaining ships of the centre came up, and the rear was closing the line; in consequence of which M. de Grasse withdrew his fleet from the action, and evaded all the efforts of the English commanders for its renewal. Captain Bayne of the Alfred gallantly fell in this action. The fleet lay to, on the night of the 9th, to repair their damages; and the following day was principally spent in refitting. Both fleets kept turning up to the windward, in the channel which separates the islands of Dominique and Guadaloupe. On the 11th, the enemy had got so far to the windward as to weather Guadaloupe, and had gained such a distance, that the body of their fleet could only be descried from the mast head of our centre. Two of the French ships which had suffered great injury in the late action, were perceived about noon, to fall off considerably from the rest of the fleet to leeward. This circumstance produced signals for a general chace from the British admiral, and again renewed throughout the fleet, the hope of coming up with the enemy. It was now impossible for them to avoid fighting; but the evening being too far advanced, that final decision was postponed to the morning. The pursuing ships fell back into their stations, a close line was immediately formed, and a most masterly disposition of the British fleet exhibited; while such manœuvres were practised in the night, as were necessary, at least, to preserve things in their present state, and might possibly produce casual advantage. The hostile fleets met upon opposite tacks. The battle commenced about seven o'clock in the morning of the 12th, and was continued with unremitting fury till about the same hour in the evening. Admiral Drake, whose division led to action, gained the highest honour, by the gallantry with which he received, and the effect with which he returned, the fire of the whole French line. His leading ship the Marlborough, captain Penny, was peculiarly distinguished. She received and returned, at the nearest distances, the first fire of twenty-three French ships of war; and had the fortune only to have three men killed and sixteen wounded. The signal for close fighting had from the first been thrown out, and was, without a single exception, punctually observed. The line was formed at only a cable length's distance. Our ships as they came up, ranged along the enemy's line, and close under their lee, where they gave and received a most tremendous fire (l). About noon sir George Rodney, in the Formidable, with his seconds the Namur and Duke, and immediately supported by the Canada, bore directly athwart the enemy's line, and successfully broke through it, about three ships short of the centre, where M. de Grasse commanded in the Ville de Paris. Being followed and supported by the ships a-stern of his division, he wore round upon his heel, and completing the separation of their line, threw them into inextricable confusion. This masterly push decided the fortune of the day. The French, however, continued to fight with great bravery, and the battle continued till sun-set; which, in those latitudes, is almost immediately succeeded by total darkness.

The French fleet, being now in a very broken condition, naturally exposed, in some instances, a few ships to the attack of a greater number; and the extent of the action, with the darkness and uncertainty occasioned by the smoke, afforded opportunities, which might have been less expected, for single combat. The Canada, a seventy-four gun ship, commanded by captain Cornwallis, took the French Hector, of the same force, singly. Captain Inglefield, in the Centaur of seventy-four guns, also came up from the rear, to the attack of the César, of seventy-four. Both ships were yet fresh, and had received no injury: and a very obstinate action took place; but though the French captain had evidently the disadvantage, he still disdained to yield. Three other ships came up successively. His courage was inflexible; he is said to have nailed his colours to the masts, and his death only could terminate the contest. When she struck, her mast went overboard, and she had not a foot of canvas without a shot hole. The Glorieux also fought nobly; and did not strike, till her masts, bowsprit, and ensign, were shot away. The English Ardent, of sixty-four guns, which had been taken by the enemy in the beginning of the war, was now retaken, by the Bellequeux or the Bedford. The Diadem, a French seventy-four, went down by a single broadside, in an exertion to save her admiral. M. de Grasse was nobly supported even after the line was broken, and till the disorder and confusion became unavoidable. His two seconds, the Languedoc and Couronne, were particularly distinguished, and the former narrowly escaped being taken, in her last efforts to extricate the admiral. The Ville de Paris, after being much battered, was closely laid along side by the Canada; and in a desperate action of nearly two hours, was reduced almost to a wreck. Captain Cornwallis was so eager in his design upon the French admiral, that without taking possession of the Hector, he left her to be picked up by a frigate, while he proceeded to the Ville de Paris. It seemed as if M. de Grasse was determined to sink rather than strike to any thing under a flag; but he perhaps also considered the fatal effects which the striking of his flag might produce on the fleet. At length, sir Samuel Hood came up in the Barfleur, almost at sun-set, and poured in a most tremendous fire, which is said to have killed sixty men; but M. de Grasse, wishing to signalize, as much as possible, the loss of so fine and so favourite a ship, endured the repetitions of this fire for about a quarter of an hour longer. He then condescended to strike his flag to the Barfleur, and surrendered himself to sir Samuel Hood. It may justly be said, that prodigies of valour were performed on both sides (m). Sir George Rodney, for his gallant behaviour, received the thanks of the British senate, was created a peer of the realm, and gratified with a liberal pension.

A considerable battle was fought about this time in the East Indies, between the British forces under sir Eyre Coote, and those under Hyder Ally, in which the former proved victorious. Hyder lost his second son, with many of his principal officers, and the whole number of killed and wounded were said to amount to eighteen thousand. After this sanguinary engagement Hyder Ally retreated with precipitation to Trincomale, in order to recruit his army (n).

Dispatches from sir Edward Hughes, about the same time

(l) The Formidable, sir George Rodney's ship, fired near fourscore broadsides: and we may well believe that she was not singular. The French stood and returned this dreadful fire with the utmost gallantry: and both sides fought, as if the fate and honour of their respective countries were staked upon the fate of that single day.

(m) The César, one of the best ships in the French fleet, was unfortunately set on fire, and blew up in the night of the action. This happened through the inordinate behaviour of the French prisoners, who throwing off all obedience to their officers from the time she struck, and finding the English on board too few in number effectually to restrain their ill conduct, were guilty of the greatest enormities. A lieutenant, and fifty English seamen, perished, with about four hundred prisoners. The loss of men in the British fleet was wonderfully small, considering the length and violence of the battle, the prodigiousness of the fire, the nearness of the combatants, and the obstinate bravery of the enemy. The whole number killed, and wounded, in two actions of the 9th and 12th, (for no separate lists have been given,) amounted only to one thousand and fifty, of which two hundred and fifty-three were killed on the spot. It is observable, that the slain in the Ville de Paris only, was said to amount, at least to four hundred. The brave captain Blair of the Anson, who in the preceding year, had most gallantly fought the Dolphin against the Dutch, in the North-sea action under admiral Hyde Parker, fell gloriously on this day. The loss of lord Robert Manners, son of the late marquis of Granby, and brother to the duke of Rutland, was universally lamented by the nation as well as the navy. That gallant young nobleman, in the command of the Resolution, of seventy-four guns, had been highly distinguished during the war, by a series of the most brilliant actions; and being most grievously wounded in this battle, though with fair hopes of recovery from the excellence of his constitution, was, to the great loss of his country and the service, carried off by a locked jaw, a few days after, on his passage to England. Thirty-six chests of money, destined to the pay and subsistence of the troops in the intended invasion of Jamaica, were found in the Ville de Paris. The Ville de Paris, however, suffered so much in the action, that it was impossible to keep her above water, and she never reached England.

(n) On the commitment of the mutiny bill for 1782, Mr. Burke ex-time informed us, that on the 21st of October, in the preceding year, the company's troops under the command of sir Hector Monro, marched to Nogore on the sea-coast, to co-operate with his majesty's fleet in the reduction of Negapatam. The marines, and the greater part of the seamen, with the heavy cannon, &c. being landed on the 29th, the strong lines which the enemy had thrown up to defend the approach to the town, were stormed and carried. On the 7th of November a battery of ten eighteen pounders being ready to open, the admiral and general dispatched a summons to the governor to surrender, who being indisposed, his second in command declared for him, that the place should be defended. During the siege the enemy made two desperate sallies, but were repulsed with considerable loss. On the 10th, more batteries being ready, the enemy demanded a capitulation, which was granted, and being signed on the 12th, the town and citadel were then delivered up. The garrison consisted of eight thousand men, two thousand three hundred of which were troops belonging to Hyder; and among these were one thousand cavalry. In consequence of the fall of Negapatam, Hyder's troops evacuated all the forts and strong posts they held in the Tanjore country; and the petty princes in various other provinces, who, at the instigation of Hyder, had rebelled against the nabob of the Carnatic, laid down their arms, and returned to their obedience.

To return to domestic affairs; the marquis of Rockingham, having been appointed first lord of the treasury, lord Shelburne, and the right honourable Charles James Fox, secretaries of state, lord Camden, president of the council, &c. it was hoped the new administration was founded upon a permanent basis, and as a memorable instance of the supposed triumph of freedom over venality, the resolution declaring the expulsion of Mr. Wilkes, and his incapacity of serving as a member of parliament, was expunged from the journals of the house of commons, by a very considerable majority. But the general joy arising from an arrangement of ministry so grateful to the people, was soon allayed by the universally lamented death of the marquis of Rockingham, a nobleman, whose whole conduct throughout life had evinced the most genuine patriotism and philanthrophy. This melancholy event was followed by the resignation of Mr. Fox and other members of the new cabinet, in consequence of the earl of Shelburne being appointed to the office of first lord of the treasury. Various conjectures were formed from these sudden resignations, but the house of commons having been unexpectedly adjourned to the 9th of July, no authentic information could be obtained till that day, when, under the idea that Mr. Fox would then mention his reason for his resignation, there appeared a most astonishing concourse of people at every avenue of the house. A debate took place from a report of a pension having been granted to colonel Barré, then treasurer of the navy, amounting to three thousand two hundred pounds per annum. In the course of the debate, those of his majesty's late administration gave their reasons for having resigned, whilst such as remained pledged themselves for the continuance of those principles, for which they were first received into his majesty's councils. The next day this interesting subject was discussed in the house of lords. The duke of Richmond spake with candour and liberality, declaring his wish that the world should know on what principles he came into office. He affirmed that the new government was formed on this triple foundation: the great basis was in a peace with those against whom we waged war abroad; in retrenching expences at home; and in lessening the increasing influence of the crown. After speaking respectfully of the character of the late marquis of Rockingham, he lamented the resignation of the secretary of state, and chancellor of the exchequer, but declared that the present ministers should have his support so long as they remained firm to those principles they professed when they came into office.

His majesty repaired to the house of peers on the 11th, and having in a speech to the parliament commended their unwearied zeal and industry with the plainest regard to its true interest, whether peace or a continuance of war should be the event, thanked the commons for their liberal supplies, and declared his reliance on the spirit, affection, and unanimity of his people in support of the honour of his crown, and the interest of his kingdoms; the lord chancellor then, by command of his majesty, prorogued the session to the 3rd of September.

It appeared, by accounts from the East India house, that there had been a desperate engagement between the English fleet under sir Edward Hughes, and that of France under M. Suffrein. The French, at length, after a warm contest of upwards of two hours, ceased firing and hauled off after the transports they had in convoy; much loss was sustained on both sides; that of the enemy could not be determined, but on the side of the English fell two captains, several inferior officers, and thirty-two private men, besides about one hundred who were wounded. Sir Edward Hughes, after the action, proceeded to Tricomale to repair his damages, and having refitted, sailed for Madras.

The deplorable circumstances which the American war brought on this country, may be gathered from the following resolution in the house of delegates, transmitted in the South Carolina gazette: "Resolved unanimously, "That the house will exert the power of the state, to enable congress to prosecute the war, until Great Britain renounce all claim of sovereignty over the United States, or any part thereof, and until their independence be formally or tacitly assured by the treaty with Great Britain, France, and the United States, which shall terminate the war."

The loss of the Royal George; of one hundred guns, which happened at Spithead on the 29th of August, 1782, was thought one of the greatest misfortunes this country had experienced for many years past. This ship having, on her last cruize, made more water than usual, a resolution was formed, to heave her down at Spithead; in consequence of which, the weather being moderate, the business was commenced at six o'clock in the morning, and the ship by ten was got to a proper situation for discovering the leak, but in order to take off some farther sheets of copper, to caulk the seems properly, she was ordered to be lowered another streak; in the mean time, great part of the crew were at dinner, when the ship by a sudden gust of wind fell on one side, and the lower deck port being open, she filled in about eight minutes, and sunk to the bottom. It is generally supposed that upwards of nine hundred people lost their lives upon this melancholy occasion, including about two hundred and fifty women and several children. The loss of the brave admiral Kempenfeldt was truly lamented; his abilities were well known to all the maritime powers, and he was justly esteemed as a brave and experienced naval commander (o).

Soon after the loss of the Royal George, an express was received at the admiralty from vice-admiral lord Shuldham, with an account from the captain of a merchantman from Jamaica, of the loss of his majesty's ship the Ramillies. It appeared that admiral Greaves, who had the charge of the homeward bound Jamaica convoy, kept a very northward course to avoid the enemy's cruizers, whom he supposed might be detached to intercept the heavy sailing ships of the convoy. His flag was flying on board the Ramillies from his departure from Jamaica, till the moment it was necessary to quit her for the preservation of the lives of the crew. She lost her masts on the 10th of September in a violent gale of wind, and continued ungovernable till the 19th, when she was abandoned and left in a sinking condition.

Advices from Bengal, received about this time, announced the most pleasing expectations of an immediate and general peace, though our government in that quarter abounded in every species of resource for prosecuting the war. The Mahrattas, weary of an unsuccessful system of warfare, had declared for pacific measures, and the late misunderstanding with the Nizam, and some other of the country powers, were now so far removed, that if Hyder Ally alone had proved refractory, they had all engaged to unite with the company's servants in bringing him to compliance.

Accounts received about the same time mention, that the squadron commanded by Paul Jones, which surprized pressed strong disapprobation of employing general Arnold as an officer in the British army; as he was a rebel to rebels. His services might be properly rewarded by a pecuniary gift or pension, but he ought never to be entrusted with the power of committing fresh treasons.

(o) In the beginning of 1783, a very elegant monument was erected in the church-yard at Portsea, to the memory of the brave, though unfortunate, admiral Kempenfeldt, and his fellow sufferers, who perished in the Royal George. The monument is lofty, in a pyramidal form, ornamented with marine trophies, arms, sculptured urns, &c. and in an oval compartment upon the upper part of the pyramid, in black marble and gold letters, is an appropriate inscription.

and took the forts and settlements in Hudson's Bay, consisted of three frigates and three or four privateers. They obtained a considerable booty at Fort Charles, and Fort Rupert factories, destroyed all the forts and vessels in the bay, and took away two valuable loaded vessels belonging to the Hudson's Bay company, which were sent for Boston prior to Paul Jones's bearing away for the North Seas. His booty, exclusive of the injury he had done to the forts and factories, was estimated at one hundred thousand pounds. This adventurer some time before fell in with his majesty's ship the Serapis, commanded by captain Pearson, and the Countess of Salisbury, commanded by captain Piercy, having under his convoy a large number of transports. A desperate engagement ensued, in which Paul Jones's squadron proved victorious, and the Serapis and Countess of Salisbury were both captured; but the transports, fortunately made their escape (p).

About this time the English were most agreeably relieved from the disagreeable apprehensions they had entertained respecting the fate of Gibraltar, by the important intelligence which arrived from general Elliot, the gallant defender of that fortress. From the general's representation it appeared, that the enemy had collected their whole force by sea and land; the former consisted of forty-four sail of the line, besides three inferior two deckers, ten battering ships, five bomb ketches, several frigates, and zebecques, a great number of gun and mortar boats, a large floating battery, many armed vessels, and three hundred boats for carrying troops (q). Their land batteries were mounted with above one hundred pieces of cannon, and an equal number of mortars and howitzers, and the combined army consisted of nearly forty thousand men. On the 13th of September, at eight in the morning, all the battering ships commanded by Don Buenaventura Moreno, rear-admiral, were put in motion, and came forward to their several appointed stations, the admiral being placed upon the capital of the king's bastion, the other ships extending three to the southward of the flag as far as the church battery, five to the northward, about the height of the Old Mole, and one a little to the westward of the admiral. By a quarter before ten they were anchored in line, at the distance of a thousand to twelve hundred yards, and immediately a heavy cannonade began from all the ships, which was strongly supported by the cannon and mortars on shore. At the same instant our batteries began with hot and cold shot from the guns, and shells from the howitzers and mortars. This fire continued without intermission on both sides till noon, when that of the enemy from their ships seemed to slacken a little. About two o'clock the admiral's ship was observed to smoke as if on fire, and a few men were observed to be active in searching out the cause. Our batteries never discontinued; but the fire from the ships of the enemy gradually decreased. About seven in the evening they fired only from a few guns at intervals. At midnight the admiral's ship was discovered to have taken fire, and in an hour after it was completely in flames; eight more of their ships took fire in succession. Signals of distress being now made, the launches, feluccas, and boats, had yet made no considerable progress, and the fire from the enemy's batteries on shore did not in the least diminish. Captain Curtis of the ship Brilliant, who was appointed to the command of the marine brigade, and with his squadron of gun-boats lay ready to take advantage of any favourable circumstances, left the New Mole at two o'clock, and about three formed a line upon the enemy's flank, advancing and firing with great order and expedition, which so astonished and disconcerted them, that they fled precipitately with all their boats, and abandoned the ships, in which some officers and numbers of their men, including many wounded, were left to perish (r). In the course of the day the remaining eight ships severally blew up with a violent explosion; one only escaped the effect of our red hot shot, which it was thought proper to burn, there being no possibility of preserving her. The admiral's flag remained flying on board his ship till she was totally consumed. The royal artillery, additional gunners, and marine brigade, only could be employed in this service, which they executed with deliberate coolness and undaunted intrepidity. The fire was incessant, and the batteries abundantly supplied with ammunition; every soldier in the garrison, not on duty, eagerly pressing to share in the honourable labours of the day. The enemy's daring attempt by sea was effectually defeated by the well supported fire from our batteries; but the well-timed, judicious, and spirited attack made by brigadier Curtis, rendered this success a complete victory. The loss in the brigade of seamen, considering the nature of the attack, was very inconsiderable, only one man being killed and five wounded; while that of the enemy in killed, burned, drowned, and wounded, was great beyond example (s). The sincere gratitude all the prisoners of war expressed for their deliverance from the various horrors that surrounded them, afforded the highest satisfaction to humanity (t).

On the 22nd of November, Mr. Secretary Townshend sent a letter to the directors of the bank of England, of which the following is a copy:

"Gentlemen, Whitehall, Nov. 22, 1782.

"His majesty's ministers, anxious to prevent, as much as possible, the mischiefs too commonly resulting from speculations in the funds, during the uncertain state of the negociation for peace, between the powers at war, (and which it is to the general honour and interest of all great powers to avoid,) have thought it their duty to ask his majesty's permission to communicate to you, for the information of the public, that the negociations now carrying on at Paris, are brought so far to a point, as to promise a decisive conclusion, either for peace or war, before the meeting of parliament, which will on that account be prorogued from Tuesday the 26th instant, to Thursday, the 5th of December next.

"I have his majesty's commands to assure you, that you will receive immediate notice of the issue.

"I am, Gentlemen,

"your most obedient

Governor and Company of the Bank of England.

"humble servant,

"T. TOWNSHEND."

A few days afterwards the lord mayor of London received the following letter from the secretary of state:

"My Lord,

"In consequence of my letter to your lordship of the 22nd of last month, I take the earliest opportunity of informing

(p) Towards the conclusion of this action, one of the crew on board Paul Jones's ship, thinking they must be inevitably conquered, or totally destroyed, attempted to strike the colours, which so irritated his commander, that he instantly shot him through the head.

(q) The preparations for this enterprize were great beyond all example. It was asserted, that not less than twelve hundred pieces of heavy ordnance of various kinds had been accumulated before the place, for the purposes of attack by sea and land. The quantity of powder, shot, shells, and of every kind of military stores and provisions, were so immense as to exceed credibility. The quantity of gunpowder only was said to exceed eighty-three thousand barrels. Forty gun-boats, with heavy artillery, as many bomb-ketches, with twelve inch mortars, besides a large floating battery, and five bomb-ketches on the usual construction, were all destined to second the powerful efforts of the great battering ships. Nearly all the frigates, and smaller armed vessels of the kingdom were assembled, to afford such aid as they might be found capable of; and three hundred large boats were collected from every part of Spain, which, with the very great number already in the vicinity, were to minister to the fighting vessels during action, and to land troops in the place as soon as they had dismantled the fortress. The combined fleets of France and Spain, amounting to about fifty ships of the line, were to cover and support the attack. The preparations by land kept pace with those at sea. Twelve thousand French troops were brought to join the Spanish army, and to exert themselves in the reduction of the place. The duke de Crillon, who was the commander by land, was assisted by a number of the best officers of both France and Spain, and particularly of the best engineers and artillerists of his own.

(r) Captain Curtis's vigorous fire from some gun-boats, increased the consternation of the enemy; many of whom were killed in the attack; many perished in the flames; many were drowned; and not a few were rescued from impending destruction by the efforts of the English, who endangered their own lives in this noble exercise of humanity. Thus did general Elliott, and his resolute garrison triumph over the boasted preparations of France and Spain!

(s) The fate of the Spaniards must have been wretched, had they not been dragged from amidst the flames through the personal intrepidity of brigadier Curtis and his people, at the compleat hazard of their own lives. The general expressed the utmost anguish at seeing the brigadier's pinnace close to one of the largest ships at the instant she blew up, and spread her wrecks to a vast extent all around, till the black cloud of smoke being dispersed, he was again revived by the sight of the pinnace, little apprehending that the brigadier was in the utmost danger of sinking; some pieces of timber having fallen into, and pierced the boat, killing the cockswain, and wounding others of the men, so that scarcely any hopes remained of reaching the shore: he was, however, providentially saved by stopping the hole with the seamen's jackets until boats could arrive to their relief. One of our gun-boats was sunk at the same moment.

(t) The duke de Crillon, a general of great reputation, having the chief command of the allied forces, princes of the royal blood of France, dignified characters of Europe, the first nobility of Spain, and great military officers, being present with the besieging army, an amazing concourse of spectators that filled the camp and covered the adjacent hills on this occasion, plainly proved that the combined powers had formed the most sanguine expectations from their battering ships, which had been completed by prodigious labour and unlimited profusion of expence.

forming your lordship, that a messenger is just arrived from Paris with an account of provisional articles being signed on the 13th of November, between his majesty's commissioners and the commissioners of the United States of America, to be inserted in, and constitute a treaty of peace; hence peace shall be concluded between Great Britain and France. Your lordship will make this as public as possible.

"I am, &c.

December 3, 1782. "T. TOWNSHEND."

A copy of the above was also sent to the directors of the bank.

On the 5th of December his majesty went to the house of peers, and opened the session of parliament with a speech from the throne, importing that in consequence of the sense of his parliament, he pointed all his views and measures to an entire and cordial reconciliation with the colonies; and expressive of his perfect reliance on their wisdom in the further prosecution of the war, should its continuance appear to be indispensible. In his particular address to the commons, he displayed a very œconomical disposition, a generous feeling for the sufferers in America, made the greater concession, on his part, and recommended such measures as should be deemed most salutary and patriotic. After some debates as to certain particular parts of the speech, an address was unanimously agreed to in the house of lords; the same form passed in the house of commons, and the addresses being respectively presented, met with most gracious answers from the king (u).

On the 12th of December captain Luttrell, commander of the Mediator, of forty-four guns, displayed an instance of singular prowess in the attack of five sail of French and American frigates laden with military stores off Ferrol, and the capture of the Alexander of twenty-four guns, together with the Managere of thirty guns, armée en flute. On the 14th captain Stephen Gregory, of the Alexander, contrived a plan to occasion the prisoners to rise, and hoped to have taken the command of the Mediator from captain Luttrell; but through the indefatigable attention of lieutenant Rankin of the marines, the parties were discovered, and ordered to be put in irons, and kept on bread and water. The Managere was conducted into Plymouth Sound, and the Alexander followed a short time after.

On the 23rd of the same month his majesty went to the house of peers, and gave the royal assent to several bills that were ready; after which the lords unanimously voted their thanks to sir Edward Hughes and sir Eyre Coote, as did also the house of commons on the same day (x).

Public expectation was now greatly raised by the apparent prospect of the happy restoration of general tranquillity, as the preliminary articles of peace between England and France were signed at Versailles, on the 20th of January, 1783, by Mr. Alleyne Fitz-herbert, on the part of the one, and by the count de Vergennes, on that of the other. The preliminary articles between England and Spain were signed on the same day by the first of those gentlemen, and by the count D'Aranda, on the part of the catholic king.

As usual on such occasions, great debates arose in both houses of parliament on the subject of the preliminary articles of peace. In the upper house the leaders of the opposition considered the preliminaries as injurious to the interest and honour of Great Britain: accused the ministry of impolicy and improvidence in marking the boundaries between the territorial rights of this country and the United States of America; censured them for employing an incompetent commissioner to negociate with them, as appeared from the shameful ignorance, and absurdity of the provisional articles; condemned the several concessions both in America and the East Indies, and concluded, from the general tenor of the preliminaries, that the ministry had acceded implicitly to whatever terms might have been proposed to them. In answer to these charges, the friends of administration observed, that the peace was as good as we had reason to expect, considering the number of foes that assailed us in Europe, in America, in the West Indies, and in the East. They remarked, that the ministry who transacted the important matter alluded to had come into power at the most critical moment this nation had ever experienced; that they were sensible of the distressed situation of their country, and the arduous task they were about to undertake; but that, actuated by their duty, their attachment to the constitution, and their public spirit, they rather chose to hazard every thing than suffer such destructive measures any longer to be pursued; that they had come into administration when the cry of the whole nation was, "Give us peace on any terms;" and that they had procured a peace on much better terms than could have been expected. As to the boundaries in America, so much objected to, they urged that they were proposed agreeably to the system of moderation that now began to prevail in the most enlightened parts of Europe; and, in a word, presumed that, all circumstances considered, every dispassionate and impartial man would be convinced that the ministry had done their duty, and made as good a peace as this kingdom had a right to expect. At length a motion for an address to his majesty, congratulating him on the return of peace, was carried by a majority of thirteen.

In the lower house, Messrs. Fox and Sheridan condemned the treaties as pregnant with disadvantage and ignominy: lord North, to the astonishment of all present, joined in the public clamour; in consequence of which, the address proposed by the ministerial party, was deprived of those clauses which involved an approbation of the articles, by a majority of sixteen voices. The attack and defence of the treaties were renewed in a subsequent debate; and the concessions which had been made to the adversaries of Great Britain, were voted to have been greater than they had a right to expect, or we to concede.

At this time a most unexpected and extraordinary coalition took place between lord North (y) and Mr. Fox, and their partizans, and the consequent censures passed in the lower house on the negociators of the peace. Many members thought these inconveniences of such serious consequence, that, however it might seem to encroach on the royal prerogative, in which alone was the appointment of ministers, it was highly necessary, in a moment so extremely critical, to address his majesty on this occasion. Accordingly the following motion was made on the 24th of March, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to take into consideration the present calamitous condition of this country, occasioned by a long and ruinous war, and that he would appoint such an administration, as would deserve the confidence of the people, and relieve them from the distractions under which they groaned." It could not be expected that this motion would pass without opposition, nor the coalition escape without being animadverted upon by the opposite parties. Mr. Martin, a member whose parliamentary conduct had ever been graced by indepen-

(u) Intelligence was about this time received of the fate of his majesty's ship Centaur, of seventy-four guns, commanded by captain Inglefield, which foundered near the Azores in the Atlantic Ocean. At the time of her sinking, the crew were chiefly on board, there not being a single ship in sight to afford them any assistance. A short time previous to her going down, a part of the crew took to her remaining boats, which were three in number, her other boats being stove in the hurricane; but of these, two were sunk from being too much laden, and all who were in them perished. The other, which was very small, containing only twelve men besides the captain and a boy, fortunately reached Fyal, one of the Azores, after being exposed to the greatest distress for sixteen days. When these wretched survivors quitted the ship, they took with them only water sufficient for three days, but which, by prudent management, sparingly furnished them for nine days; after which time they were reduced to the shocking extremity of drinking their own urine.

(x) Towards the termination of this year, the pleasing intelligence arrived of the release of captain Asgill, son of sir Charles Asgill, alderman of London, by virtue of an order of the United States of America in congress assembled on the 7th of November. This brave and amiable young officer, had been doomed by lot to suffer death, to retaliate for the murder of captain Huddy, an American officer, who had been executed as a traitor by the loyal refugees of New York. Immediately on hearing of the fate of her unfortunate son, lady Asgill, his afflicted mother, applied in the most pathetic terms, to the count de Vergennes, prime minister of France. The count with great humanity and politeness, wrote to general Washington on the interesting subject, and that officer, warmly interfering in behalf of the unhappy captain, his life was spared.

Lady Asgill's letter to count Vergennes on this occasion, was so truly pathetic and interesting, as was that of the prime minister of France to general Washington, and that general's to captain Asgill containing his pardon, that we were almost inclined to insert them, were it not on account of their length.

(y) Till this strange coalition, no politicians were more hostile in their public declarations than the honourable Charles James Fox and the right honourable Frederic lord North, during many years of acrimonious contest. The most opprobrious epithets had been applied to each other upon almost all manner of occasions. But ambition and faction too frequently prevail over honour and principle.

"Tempora mutanda, et nos mutamur ab illis."

dence and integrity, peremptorily declared, that from fixed principles he abhorred the coalition; that he had for many years heard the wisest and best men in the house exclaim against the incompetence of the noble lord (North) to sustain the cares of this mighty empire, that his somnolency, his blunders, his obstinacy, &c. had been the continual theme of those very men who were now elaborate in their encomiums on his character; and that therefore he should feel himself a betrayer of the interests of his country, if he gave his voice for an address to countenance such a coalition; but, having an entire confidence in the wisdom and firmness of his sovereign, he should vote for it, not doubting that his majesty's choice would meet the most sanguine wishes of his people. At length the address was proposed, carried, and graciously received by his majesty, who declared, that it was his earnest desire to do every thing in his power to comply with the wishes expressed by his faithful commons.

The country being without an administration, the chancellor of the exchequer announced his resignation to the house, on the 31st of the same month. The suspension of public business, unavoidably consequent on this state of affairs, created just ground for public murmur and parliamentary interference. Different forms of addresses were moved and submitted to the consideration of the house, but nothing was carried into resolution; till at length an administration was formed, and on the second of April many of the consequent new writs were moved for in the house. His majesty, however, delayed the expected change, till after repeated application. He then appointed the duke of Portland to preside in the treasury, Mr. Fox and lord North to be secretaries of state, restored the chancellorship of the Exchequer to lord John Cavendish, appointed Edmund Burke pay-master of the forces; and complied with such other alterations as were dictated by the victorious party.

Among the taxes proposed by the new ministry at the opening of the budget by lord John Cavendish, that on receipts and promissory notes was considered as particularly unpopular, since it produced a general murmur among the commercial part of the community, followed by petitions from the city of London, and other parts, though without producing the effect they intended.

The king having, about this time, engaged to allow the prince of Wales sixty thousand pounds per annum out of his civil list, the commons voted a temporary aid of sixty thousand pounds for the settlement of the prince's household, on his attainment of the age of twenty-one years. Nothing of importance occured in either house till the 16th of July, when the king closed the session, as usual, with a speech from the throne.

The king had now leisure to attend to the gratification of many of his loyal and meritorious subjects, by heaping honours on them. On the 5th of February, he was pleased to order letters patent to be passed under the great seal of the kingdom of Ireland, for creating a society, or brotherhood, to be called Knights of the Illustrious Order of St. Patrick, to consist of the sovereign and fifteen knights companions, of which his majesty, his heirs and successors, should be perpetual sovereigns; and his majesty's lieutenant-general, and governor-general of Ireland, or the lord-deputy or deputies, or lords justices, or other chief governors, should officiate as grand masters: fifteen knights companions of the said order were accordingly constituted by appointment of his majesty, and afterwards vested with the insignia in due form (z).

The court martial which had been summoned on the trial of general Murray, for the loss of Minorca, met at the close of the preceding month, at the Horse Guards, to receive the decision of the court, after its revision by his majesty. Both general Murray, and sir William Draper, who had exhibited the charges against him, being present, the judge advocate proceeded to read the decision, which was, "That twenty-seven of the charges were frivolous and groundless." Of the remaining two, the court had found the prisoner guilty, and sentenced him to receive such reprehension as his majesty might think proper, which his majesty had been graciously pleased to remit. The judge advocate then informed sir William Draper, that it was the pleasure of the court, that he should be required to make an apology to general Murray for having instituted the present trial against him. Sir William acquiesced, and apologized accordingly. When a similar requisition was made of general Murray to sir William, for having wounded his feelings as a soldier, by his conduct to him during his command at Minorca, general Murray vehemently refused acquiescence, declaring that he was the protector of his own honour, and would leave that of every other man to his own vindication. He was, therefore, put under arrest; but the affair was accommodated, by changing a word in the proposed apology, and the matter terminated in such a manner as to leave no possible ground for apprehension that any future ill consequence would take place between the two generals.

About this time intelligence arrived from the East Indies, informing us, that the establishment of peace with the Mahrattas was almost accomplished, as articles of a treaty of peace and perpetual amity and alliance, between the English and the Mahrattas, had been agreed upon and executed. Some time after advices were received of the death of Hyder Ally, who had been our most formidable opponent in that quarter of the globe, and that his son and successor Tippoo Saib was more pacifically inclined to the English than his father.

On the 22nd of May, articles were agreed on between Mr. Oswald, his Britannic majesty's commissioner, and the commissioners of the United States of America. These articles declare the acknowledgement of the freedom, sovereignty, and independence of those states on the part of Great Britain, pointed out their boundaries in express terms, and settled several points relative to navigation, to trade, and to commerce.

Sir Roger Curtis, who had eminently distinguished himself by his valour during the late siege of Gibraltar, renewed on the 16th of June, as deputed from our court, the treaty of peace which had subsisted between Great Britain and the emperor of Morocco (a).

On the 2nd of September, preliminary articles of peace, between the king of Great Britain and their high mightinesses the States General of the United Provinces of Holland, were signed at Paris by the plenipotentiaries of the respective powers; as was, on the 3rd, the definitive treaty with France, Spain, and America; and on the 6th of the following month, by virtue of his majesty's warrant, peace was proclaimed between Great Britain, France, and Spain, at the usual places, and with the accustomed ceremonies.

On the 11th of February, the session of parliament was opened by a speech from the throne, informing the lords and commons, that definitive treaties of peace had been concluded with the courts of France and Spain, and with the United States of America; and that preliminary articles had been also ratified with the States General of the United Provinces. When his majesty had retired, his royal highness the prince of Wales, who had been previously introduced with the usual ceremonies, and taken his chair on the right hand of the throne, took the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and made and subscribed the declaration, and also took and subscribed the oaths of abjuration. In both houses, a motion for an address was carried.

Mr. secretary Fox now brought forward a motion respecting the future regulation of the English settlements in the East Indies, and after a number of ingenious observations, concluded his speech with the following motions: 1. That leave be given to bring in a bill for vesting the affairs of the East India company in the hands of certain commissioners, for the benefit of the proprietors and the public: 2. That leave be given to bring in a bill for the better government of the territorial acquisitions and dependencies in India. These motions, after a short debate, were severally put and agreed to by the house. When the first bill was brought in, it was read the first time, and ordered to be printed; and after some desultory debates, a day was fixed for the second reading. Accordingly, at the stated time, the point was agitated with great vehemence by the respective parties. Mr. secretary Fox vindicated the bill with his usual force and energy. He argued upon principles of humanity, and painted, in the liveliest colours, the shocking acts of barbarity committed by the Europeans on the natives of India. He represented the impropriety of supporting the servants of the company, who, in defiance of every thing sacred, could be guilty of the most atrocious acts of cruelty and wantonness: urged the grand plea necessity; and having declared, that in bringing it into parliament, he had done his duty as a minister of this country, a friend to humanity, and an enemy to oppression, he therefore moved, that the bill might be committed. Lord North, in a very able manner, defended the principles of the bill, reprobated the servants of the company for engaging in the most wanton hostilities, which had nearly ruined the interests of the India company in that part of the world, and concluded with averring, that the tendency of the bill was only to diminish their political, but not by any means their real consequence.

The opponents reasoned against the bill upon general principles, as dishonest, impolitic, and arbitrary. Mr. William Pitt said he was shocked at the propositions in the bill. Its tendency, he declared, was equally hostile to private property and public freedom. In addition to the general atrocity of the measure, the influence which it would create was dreadfully dangerous. It would render the king, he said, subservient to an aspiring faction, and destroy the true balance of our excellent constitution. Others pointed out particularly the injustice of infringing the purchased rights of the chartered company, and the dangerous tendency of establishing an influence which might end only with the existence of the constitution. After a variety of arguments produced on both sides, the house divided on a motion for adjournment, which was carried in the negative by a majority of one hundred and nine voices. The question, that the bill be committed, was then carried without a division, and it was ordered to be committed for the 1st of December. On that day the principal opponents again displayed their eloquence, and the bill was again committed by a majority of one hundred and fourteen. But this measure of administration met with a very different fate in the house of lords, where, after some debates, the motion for the commitment of the bill, was lost by a majority of nineteen.

The offensive behaviour of the two leaders of the coalition, roused the king's displeasure, and a letter was sent soon after midnight, on the 19th of December, to Mr. Fox and lord North, demanding the seals of their offices, without permitting them the indulgence of an interview. Mr. Fox had before rallied Mr. Pitt on his eagerness to re-enter into office, declaring it was perfectly agreeable to him to retire. On the following day, the right honourable William Pitt was appointed first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer; earl Gower, president of the council, in the room of lord Stormont; and earl Temple, secretary of state: the latter immediately wrote letters of dismission to the remaining members of the cabinet; the consequence of which was, a general and almost unexampled resignation of their adherents. Earl Temple did not long continue in office; for on Monday the 22nd, Mr. Grenville rose and announced the resignation of his noble relation, who, he said, had taken this step, that he might not be supposed to shelter himself under the cover of authority against any charge that might be brought against him, but that he might meet it fairly and openly in his private capacity. A dissolution of parliament being now expected, a motion was made to address his majesty, with a view to prevent its taking place. At length, the question being put, that the house agree to the motion for the address, it was carried with so high a hand, that the friends of the new administration did not think proper to try the question by a decision. When the address was presented to his majesty, he returned an answer, in which he assured the house, that he should not interrupt their meeting by any exercise of his prerogative, either of prorogation or dissolution. It was then finally agreed to by the house, to adjourn to the 12th of January, 1784 (b).

During these revolutions, dispatches arrived from his excellency major-general James Stuart, commander in chief of his majesty's and the East India company's forces on the coast of Coromandel, containing a particular account of a very signal victory obtained over the French and Tippoo Saib's auxiliaries under his command. The same dispatches brought intelligence from vice-admiral sir Edward Hughes, stating that he had had another action with the French squadron under monsieur Suffrein. It began on the 20th of June, when the enemy, having the advantage of the wind hauled off. Several of his majesty's ships received injury in their hulls, masts, and rigging, and sickness prevailed throughout the whole fleet. The admiral, on his return to Madras roads, received intelligence of the ratification of the preliminary articles of peace, as well as the cessation of hostilities agreed to between Great Britain and the States General of the United Provinces; and on the 27th dispatched his majesty's ship Medea on a flag of truce, with letters to monsieur Suffrein and the marquis de Bussy. On the 4th of July, the Medea returned to Madras road, with answers from the French commanders in chief, concurring in a cessation of hostilities, as well as an immediate release of prisoners on both sides; and thus terminated the war in that quarter of the world.

CHAP. III.

A RECONCILIATION was no sooner effected with foreigh enemies, than domestic faction reared its baneful head, and involved our political system in a state of anarchy. When the house of commons met pursuant to adjournment, on the 12th of January, debates were maintained by the contending parties with much zeal and acrimony. A retrospect was had to the rumoured dissolution of parliament, and the talents of the late ministers were contrasted with those of the present. The sovereign's prerogative to appoint ministers, and dissolve parliament, was admitted; but the propriety of such measures, at a certain crisis, was questioned by the advocates for the late administration. After a division of the house on the order of the day, upon which there appeared a majority of thirty-nine against the minister, the house went into a committee on the state of the nation, and Mr. Fox moved several resolutions to the following effect: That it is the opinion of this committee, that for any person or persons in his majesty's treasury, exchequer, or navy offices, or the bank of England, to issue any money for services already voted by the house of commons, unless the usual bill for appropriating the sums voted for services, should pass into a law previous to any dissolution or prorogation of parliament, would be a high misdemeanor, derogatory to the dignity of the house, and subversive of the constitution. That there be produced before the house, an account of all sums issued for public services, from the 19th of December, 1783, to the 12th of January, 1784. That no more money be issued on the credit of a vote of the house, till the above account shall have been laid before the house, nor for three days after. That the chairman be instructed to move the house that the mutiny bill be read a second time on the 23rd of February next.

Objections having been made to the third of these resolutions, the mover said, that in order to take away every possible ground for accusing him of any intention to withhold the supplies, he would not press that resolution. The other three were then carried without a division. Several other resolutions were moved respecting general and alarming reports, new appointments, &c. which were so directly levelled against the new ministry, that their friends opposed them as a matter of course; notwithstanding which they were carried by a considerable majority.

On the 23rd, Mr. chancellor Pitt moved, that the India bill laid by him before the house, be read a second time and committed, after having recommended it to the house, as one which would be equally efficacious with that of (b) Notwithstanding there appeared so much difficulty in forming a cabinet, an arrangement of ministers was completed in a few days. The duke of Rutland was appointed lord privy-seal; the marquis of Caermarthen and Mr. Townshend, who had been created lord Sidney, principal secretaries of state; and lord Thurlow, lord high chancellor.

Mr.

Mr. Fox, in correcting abuses and disorders, without creating improper influence, violating charters, or invading property. Mr. Fox immediately rose, and adverted to the tendency of the bill, as totally insufficient to eradicate the evils complained of, or emancipate the company from that slavish dependence on its servants abroad, which deprived it of its energy, and rendered it the prostituted object of foreign cabal. After a considerable debate, the house divided on the second reading, when there appeared against the bill, a majority of eight. The bill being thus rejected, Mr. Fox moved for leave to revive his plan, and bring in a bill for the better regulation and government of our affairs in the East Indies; the two principal objects of which were, the rendering the system for the government of India, permanent by the authority of parliament; and the fixing the government at home. The other system as secondary, might be modelled to meet the inclinations and opinions of the country. He then called upon the minister to declare explicitly, whether the house was to rely on the promise made in answer to their late address. The minister, however, made no answer. He was called upon again and again: but remained silent. At length, as if urged by the pointed severity of some remarks, he declared that he would not condescend to answer interrogatories, which he did not think gentlemen entitled to propose to him, and concluded with assigning his reasons in language extremely haughty and unbecoming.

On the day following, the members were engaged as before, on the subject of the dissolution, and as undecisively, till at length the question for adjournment was proposed and carried. A right honourable member, after some exordium, moved, that the house do come to this resolution, "That the house of commons expressed the firmest reliance on his majesty's most gracious assurance, that he would not interrupt their proceedings in settling the affairs of the East India company, the state of public credit, and of the revenue; objects which appeared of the greatest magnitude to his majesty, to this house, and to the public." The minister appeared, from the tenor of his observations on this motion, to be at first much agitated by it; at length, however, he said, he was not averse to declare, that he never had any intention of dissolving the parliament, that the circumstances of the public rendered it a measure which no friend to his country would advise; that he for one would not advise any such measure, nor even act with a ministry by whom it was advised. This declaration having, in some degree, conciliated the minds of the opposite party; a motion was made, and passed unanimously, for adjournment to the 29th.

In this distracted state of our councils, a meeting was held by many independent members of the house of commons, at the Saint Alban's Tavern, for the purpose of recommending an union of parties. Their number amounted to between fifty and sixty, and, in point of property and consideration in the country, they were truly respectable. The following requisition, signed by several members of parliament, was presented to Mr. Grosvenor, in consequence of his proposal in the house of commons for an union among the leaders of the contending parties: "We whose names are hereunto signed, members of the house of commons, being fully persuaded that the united efforts of those whose integrity, abilities, and constitutional principles we have reason to confide in, can alone rescue the country from its present distracted state, do join in most earnestly entreating them to communicate with each other on the arduous situation of public affairs; trusting, that by a liberal and unreserved intercourse between them, every impediment may be removed, to a cordial co-operation of great and respectable characters, acting on the same public principles, and entitled to the support of independent and disinterested men. And we depute—to present this representation and requisition to his grace the duke of Portland, the right honourable lord John Cavendish, the right honourable William Pitt, and the right honourable Charles James Fox, in our names." The efforts, however, of this respectable body were frustrated; the one part making the resignation of the minister the very basis of the proposed intercourse, and the minister stating, that his personal feelings would not suffer him to resign his post for the purpose of negociating: so that after several meetings, and many letters had passed between the parties, the assembly carried a motion declaratory of their sentiments, and agreed to adjourn sine die.

On the 16th of January, the lord mayor, attended by several of the aldermen, went in procession from Guildhall to St. James's, and presented an address to his majesty, expressing the satisfaction they felt at the dismission of his majesty's late ministers, and their earnest assurances of maintaining their zeal and loyalty inviolate. A similar address was also presented by the merchants of London.

The house of commons met pursuant to adjournment, on the 29th; but nothing important occurred till the 2nd of February, when Mr. Grosvenor, the chairman of the meeting of the country gentlemen assembled for the purpose of effecting an union of parties, after informing the house, that the conciliatory efforts of that meeting were not likely to prove effectual, moved, "That in the present circumstances of this country, so arduous and pressing, it was necessary for that house to take such measures as were most conducive to procure a strong, permanent, extensive, and united administration, as should carry the full confidence of the commons and the public." The particular friends of administration opposed the motion, and reprobated the idea of an union between the parties mentioned, as too much in imitation of a recent coalition. Mr. Fox vindicated his measures and those of his adherents; asserted the dignity and privileges of the house of commons, and maintained, that to set the sense of that house at defiance, was to overturn its consequence, and with it the constitution itself, and the liberties of the subject. At length, after a few observations from some other members, the question was carried without a division. Another motion was then made similar to the former, both with respect to substance and effect, and carried by a majority against the minister.

The present administration, however, appear to have had the concurrence of the upper house, in which a noble lord, on the 4th of February, made two resolutions respecting some late transactions, and then moved for an address to the throne, founded on those resolutions, expressive of their entire satisfaction with his majesty's appointment of ministers, and assuring his majesty, that they would, upon all occasions, support him in the just exercise of a constitutional prerogative. The same subject of altercation which had engrossed the attention of the lower house for some time, continued to be debated from day to day, and every motion was carried against the minister, till, on the 20th, Mr. Fox moved for an address to the king, which being also carried, was prepared and reported.

This address was presented on the 25th to his majesty; when a reply being read in the house, Mr. Fox rose and said, he would not then enter into the consideration of it, but would barely remark, that it appeared to him to be final on the part of his majesty, and therefore the house could not well proceed more than one step farther; and as this measure on the part of the house ought to be final also, there ought to be proper time for gentlemen to deliberate on what that measure should be. He then moved that his majesty's answer should be taken into consideration on Monday, the 8th of March, which was agreed to. Accordingly, on that day Mr. Fox, after an excellent exordium, moved a variety of resolutions, tending on the whole to testify the surprize and affliction of the house on receiving the answer which his majesty's ministers had advised, to assure his majesty, that the house neither had disputed, nor meant in any instance to dispute, much less, to deny his majesty's prerogative of appointing to the executive offices of state, such persons as to his wisdom might seem meet: at the same time again submitting to his majesty's royal wisdom, that no administration can serve his majesty and the public with effect, which does not enjoy the confidence of that house, to express a most unfeigned gratitude for his majesty's royal assurances, that he does not call in question the right of the house to offer their advice to his majesty on every proper occasion, respecting the exercise of any branch of royal prerogative; to declare, that they had done their duty to his majesty, and their constituents, in pointing out the evil, and in humbly imploring redress; and that therefore the responsibility must now be wholly upon those who had disregarded the opinions, and neglected the admonitions of the representatives of the people, and attempted thereby to set up a new system of executive administration, which, wanting the confidence of the house, must prove inadequate, by its inefficacy to the necessary objects of government, and dangerous by its example to the liberties of the people. The opponents of administration, however, in this instance, lost considerable ground, having, on a division on Mr. Fox's motion, the majority only of one.

On the 10th, lord Hinchinbroke informed the house, that their representation had been laid before his majesty, and graciously received. On the 25th, his majesty repaired to the house of peers, and having given the royal assent to several bills then ready, delivered a speech from the throne, in which, among other particulars, he said,

"My lords and gentlemen,

"On a full consideration of the present situation of affairs, and of the extraordinary circumstances which have produced it, I am induced to put an end to this session of parliament; I feel it a duty, which I owe to the constitution and to the country in such a situation, to recur as speedily as possible to the sense of my people, by calling a new parliament (c)."

The new parliament assembled on the 18th of May, and the house of commons proceeded to the choice of a speaker, when Mr. Cornwall was again placed in the chair. The day following, his majesty in a speech from the throne, declared the causes of his calling the parliament. He assured them of the satisfaction he enjoyed in meeting them, after recurring in so important a motion, to the sense of his people; and of his reliance, that they were animated by the sentiments of loyalty and attachment to the constitution. He then directed their attention to the maintenance of the public credit, to the support of the established revenues, and to the affairs of the East India company: and, after warning them against adopting any measures for the regulation of the latter, which might affect the constitution and our dearest interests at home, concluded with expressing his inclinations to support and maintain in their just balance, the rights and privileges of every branch of the legislature (d). Addresses to his majesty on his speech were proposed and carried, as usual.

On the 14th of June, the attention of the house was claimed by Mr. Burke, in a speech of considerable length, in which he examined with great freedom the dangerous principles upon which a late act of power was both executed and defended by government; reprobating the dissolution of parliament as a breach of faith, as well as an impolitic measure.

On the 21st following, the chancellor of the exchequer moved several resolutions, as the foundation of the act, afterwards well known by the denomination of the "Commutation Act." He stated to the house, that the illicit trade of the country had of late increased to so alarming a height, as to endanger almost the very existence of several branches of the revenue, and more particularly that of tea. It had appeared, before the committee on smuggling, that only five millions five hundred thousand pounds weight of tea was sold annually by the East India company, when the annual consumption of the kingdom was supposed, from good authority, to exceed twelve millions. After stating the particulars, he said, this tax would not be felt as an additional burthen, but ought to be considered as a commutation, by substituting an additional duty on windows, in which no smuggling could occur, and would in fact prove favourable to the subject. The act, however, was warmly opposed in both houses of parliament. It was denied to have any claim to the principle of commutation. Tea, though an article of general use, was still an article of luxury.

The next public measures related to an object that required all the address and management of the minister. The first was a bill to enable the East India company to divide eight per cent. interest on their principal. This bill, after a warm debate, passed the house of commons without a division; and after a strong debate in the house of lords, passed, on a division of twenty-eight to nine. The second act was to allow the company a further respite of duties due to the exchequer; to enable them to accept of bills beyond the amount prescribed by former acts of parliament; and to establish their future dividends. These propositions occasioned frequent debates; and, after several divisions, the bill passed both houses, and was followed by an act, "for the better government of the affairs of the East India company," &c.

On the 23rd, Mr. Pitt displayed the national accounts for the year, or what is generally denominated the Budget. After having recapitulated the supplies granted by parliament, and the ways and means for raising them, he stated, that the ways and means fell just within six million pounds of the sum voted for the supplies; and this last sum he proposed to raise by a loan. With respect to the unfunded debt, which exceeded twelve millions in navy bills, and one million in ordnance debentures, though he intended to fund only seven millions of this debt, still, as most of the navy bills bore interest, and as the interest on that part which he did not intend to fund this year, would amount to two hundred and eighty thousand pounds, he proposed to impose taxes this year for the interest of the whole, though only half of it would be funded.

The session was closed after a motion made by Mr. Dundas, for the restoration of the estates forfeited in Scotland, in the rebellion of 1745. As this measure had for its object the relief of individuals, whose attachments and loyalty to his present majesty and his family, could not be supposed to be tainted or affected with the crimes of their ancestors, it met with the perfect approbation of the commons. In the house of lords, however, it was opposed by the lord chancellor, both on the grounds of its impolicy and its partiality. It was impolitic, he said, as far as it rendered nugatory the settled maxim of the British constitution, that treason was a crime of so deep a dye, that nothing was adequate to its punishment but the total eradication of the person, the name, or the family, out of the society which he had attempted to injure. This was the wisdom, he said, of former times. The bill, however, passed the house of lords, and received the royal assent.

On the 20th of August the king terminated the session, by a speech from the throne; in which after expressing his approbation of their proceedings, and his concern for the additional burthens which they had been compelled to impose upon the public, he adverted to the important objects, with respect to trade and commerce, yet to be provided for; and he trusted that such regulations would be framed, upon a full investigation, as would tend to promote the wealth and prosperity of every part of the British empire.

In the progress of the general election, it appeared, from incontrovertible evidence, that the partizans of the coalition were not the favourites of the people. The most tumultuous contest, and that which excited the greatest attention, occured at Westminster, as well with regard to the election as to the scrutiny. At the general election, lord Hood, Mr. Fox, and sir Cecil Wray, offered themselves as candidates to represent that city in parliament. The first of these gentlemen was elected by a very great majority; the struggle between the two last was long and obstinate; after continuing the contest for upwards of six weeks, it was finally concluded on the 17th of May, leaving a majority of two hundred and thirty-five voters in favour of Mr. Fox. The high bailiff, at the requisition of sir Cecil Wray, the unsuccessful candidate, granted a scrutiny into the poll which he had taken, on the day on which it closed, and which was the day previous to the return of his writ. This mode of proceeding was on the spot formally protested against by Mr. Fox, and also by several of the electors. Immediately on the meeting of the new parliament, the conduct of the high bailiff in granting the scrutiny, under the existing circumstances, was warmly taken up by opposition, and as warmly defended by the minister and his friends. After much debate, as well by counsel at the bar of the house, as by the members themselves, in every shape, and as often as it

(c) The following day, a curious occurrence threw the metropolis into a very great ferment, by an incident which, from the crisis in which it happened, was deemed the more extraordinary. Some robbers having entered the lord chancellor's house in Great Ormond Street, carried off the great seal of England. As soon as his lordship knew of the robbery, information was sent to the respective offices of police, and persons were dispatched in pursuit of the perpetrators of so daring a villainy, but without effect. A very important event was announced to the public on the same day. It was nothing less than a proclamation for dissolving the then parliament, and declaring the calling of another.

(d) Prior to the motion for an address, Mr. Lee stated to the house the conduct of the high bailiff of Westminster, who had neglected making a return to the writ of election, on pretence of not having finished the scrutiny into the legality of the votes, and concluded with moving a resolution, declaring it to be "his duty to return two citizens to serve for the said city." This motion, after a considerable debate, was negatived by a majority of two hundred and eighty-three to one hundred and thirty-six.

In this session the commons expelled a delinquent member, Mr. Christopher Atkinson, who in the capacity of corn contractor, had been guilty of gross perjury, for which he was exhibited ignominiously on the pillory.

From some cause, however, proceedings against sir Thomas Rumbold were discontinued about the same time, though many of the members entertained doubts of the purity of that gentleman's conduct.

could

could be brought before them, both by petitions from Mr. Fox, and the electors, the proceeding of the high bailiff was justified; and it was resolved, by a very considerable majority, on a motion of lord Mulgrave's, "That the high bailiff of Westminster do proceed in the scrutiny for the said city, with all practicable dispatch." Agreeable to this resolution of the house, the high bailiff proceeded with the scrutiny during the remainder of the session, and during the recess (e).

The Westminster scrutiny was again brought before the house, by a petition of several of the electors, on the 8th of February, when the high bailiff and his counsel, Mr. Hargrave and Mr. Murphy, underwent a long examination at the bar of the house, respecting the practicability of carrying on the scrutiny, and the difficulties and delays attending the same. The high bailiff declared, that, calculating from what had been already done, it would take certainly not less than two years to finish the scrutiny. The day following, Mr. Welbore Ellis moved, "That Thomas Corbett, Esq. high bailiff of the city of Westminster, having finally closed the poll for members to represent the said city, do forthwith obey the said writ, and make a return of the precept directed to him for that purpose." This motion brought the merits of the whole question again before the house, and was long and ably debated, during several days, by the respective advocates of each party (f). Towards the close of the debate, the high bailiff was called to the bar, and informed by the speaker of a resolution made by the house, whereby it appeared that the prosecution of the scrutiny was not defended by any thing like so numerous a majority as during the preceding session. Colonel Fitzpatrick moved, "That it appearing to this house, that Thomas Corbett, Esq. high bailiff, having received a precept from the sheriff of Middlesex, for electing two citizens to serve in parliament for the city of Westminster, and having taken and finally closed the poll on the 17th of May last, being the day next before the day of return of the said writ, he be now directed forthwith to make a return of his precept of members chosen in pursuance thereof." This motion was rejected by a majority of nine only. The same motion was again brought forward on the 3rd of March, by alderman Sawbridge, and the question of adjournment was moved on it by the chancellor of the exchequer, which passed in the negative. The main question was then put, and carried without a division. Thus, after a struggle in parliament for two sessions, terminated the Westminster scrutiny, and the high bailiff the day following made a return of lord Hood and Mr. Fox.

The business of the session being gone through, the house was adjourned, on the 2nd of August, till the 27th of October; but in the mean time a proclamation was issued, by which it was prorogued to the first of December.

On the 25th of February the committee, appointed to wait on Mr. Pitt with the freedom of the city of London, went in procession from Guildhall to Mr. Pitt's house in Downing-street, Westminster, where they presented the freedom in form.

Soon after the commencement of the session, the parliament was agitated by a measure which originated with the duke of Richmond, master-general of the ordnance. It was an extravagant scheme for fortifying the dock-yards at Portsmouth and Plymouth. The house of commons had in the preceding session, expressed their unwillingness to apply any part of the public money for this purpose, before they were made acquainted with the opinions of those who were best able to decide concerning the utility and propriety of such a measure. A board of military and naval officers was therefore appointed by the king, with the master-general of the ordnance as their president; and the proposed plan of fortifications, was referred to them for their opinions and advice. After investigating the subject, and making their report thereon, the plans recommended were laid before a board of engineers to form an estimate of the expences necessary to carry them into execution (g). Mr. Pitt intended, that it should be debated and decided upon, together with the ordnance estimates, as a mere collateral question. Lieutenant-general Burgoyne, one of the board of officers that made the report, expressed his desire, that before the business was further proceeded on, so much both of the report itself, and of the instructions upon which it was founded, as could be made public with safety to the state, should be laid upon the table of the house of commons: alledging, that the house might otherwise unwarily be led to imagine that the report perfectly approved of the plan of fortifications proposed. In support of this mode of proceeding, Mr. Sheridan, on the 16th of February, moved "for a copy of the appointment of the board of naval and military officers, and of such parts of their instructions and of their report, as his majesty's discretion might deem proper to be made public, with perfect consistency to the safety of the state;" but as the board in question had been constituted by circular letters from the king, without any official commission, Mr. Pitt substituted another motion, the same in effect as the foregoing, but more conformable to the fact, which passed unanimously. These papers being laid before the house, Mr. Pitt, on the 27th of the same month, introduced the measure in the form of a general resolution, to the following effect: "That it appears to this house, that to provide effectually for securing his majesty's dock-yard, at Portsmouth and Plymouth, by a permanent system of fortification, founded on the most œconomical principles, and requiring the smallest number of troops possible to answer the purpose of such security, is an essential object for the safety of the state, intimately connected with the general defence of the kingdom, and necessary for enabling the fleet to act with full vigour and effect for the protection of commerce; the support of our distant possession, and the prosecution of offensive operations in any war in which the nation may hereafter be engaged." This mode he said he had devised, as best calculated to afford an opportunity of discussing every principle which could possibly be involved in the proceeding, whether in opposition to, or in favour of it. It was also, he thought, more consistent with the importance of the subject to bring it immediately before the house separately, and in the form of a specific resolution, than to send it to the committee involved with the rest of the ordnance estimates. In support of the resolution, Mr. Pitt undertook to prove: first, that the fortifying the dockyards at Portsmouth and Plymouth, was a measure of absolute necessity; secondly, that the plan of fortifications proposed by the duke of Richmond was the best possible plan for that purpose; thirdly, that these fortifications would be the means of giving greater effect to the operations of our fleets; and, lastly, that they would diminish the standing army.

Mr. Bastard satirically compared the schemes of the duke of Richmond with the romantic absurdities of Don Quixote, and totally disapproved the adoption of a system which would evidently discourage the naval service. He could not bear, he observed, the idea of tearing the ensign of British glory from the mast-head, and fixing it on the ramparts of a garrison. He therefore moved for an amendment.

Captain Macbride, who was actually a member of the council of officers appointed upon this occasion, conceived the report to be the result of the duke's artifice and influence, and by no means the unbiassed opinion of the board. Colonel Barré supposed that the officers had been deluded by the misrepresentations of the master-general, and that Mr. Pitt could not have approved of this extravagant project, if his conscience had not been taken by surprise. Lord Mahon supported, on this particular consideration, that the works might be defended by a very in(e) Not quite two parishes out of the seven, into which Westminster is divided, were finished when the parliament met the second time, and yet the scrutiny had then continued for eight months. It was calculated that the business already gone through was not more than an eighth of the whole. Of the votes in favour of Mr. Fox, seventy-one had been objected to in the first parish, and the objections made good only against twenty-five: in the same parish out of thirty-two of the voters for sir Cecil Wray, which were objected to, twenty-seven were declared illegal. In the second parish, out of two hundred objected to, Mr. Fox lost eighty; sir Cecil Wray out of seventy-five, at that time objected to, had sixty struck off.

(f) In debating on this subject, Mr. Fox said "He saw plainly, that it was a pecuniary struggle, and that his friends were to be tired out by the expence of the contest. The scrutiny on both sides could not cost less than thirty thousand pounds a year. This was enough to shake the best fortunes. His own last shilling might be easily got at, as he was poor; but still, little as he had, he would spend to the last shilling. If, in the end he should lose his election, it would not be, he well knew, for want of a legal majority, but for want of money! and thus would he be deprived of his right, and the electors of Westminster of the man of their choice, because he was not able to carry on a pecuniary contest with the treasury."

considerable number of men. Lord Hood, and some other naval officers, approved of the scheme as expedient and judicious; but Mr. Fox and Mr. Windham reprobated the idea, as derogatory from the honour and consequence of the navy. As the division produced an equality of votes, the speaker, therefore, judiciously voted for the amendment.

In the early part of this session Mr. Pitt took notice of that part of his majesty's speech, which related to the necessity of providing for the reduction of the national debt; he had intimated to the house, that such was the present flourishing condition of the revenue, that the annual national income would more than equal the annual national disbursements, besides leaving a surplus of considerable magnitude; this surplus, he said, he meant to form into a permanent fund, to be constantly applied to the liquidation of the public debt. In pursuance of this information to the house, and to ascertain the amount of the surplus in question, Mr. Pitt, previous to his entering into the state of the finances, or ways and means for the present year, moved, "That the several accounts and other papers presented that session, relating to the public income and expenditure, be referred to the consideration of a select committee, and that the committee should be directed to examine and report to the house, what might be the supposed annual amount of the income and expenditure in future." This motion was unanimously agreed to, and the select committee having framed their report, exhibited it before the house on the 21st of March: Mr. Pitt, on the 29th brought the consideration of the national debt, and his proposition for the diminution of it, formally before the house. In the course of the debate, he observed, that the accumulated compound interest on a million yearly, together with the annuities that would fall into that fund, which in twenty-eight years, amount to a sum which would leave a surplus of four millions annually, to be applied, if necessary, to the exigencies of the state. Some additional clauses being added, it was read a third time on the 15th of May, and carried up to the lords, where it also passed without meeting with any material opposition, and afterwards received the royal assent.

About the 20th of May, Mr. Pitt presented a bill for transferring certain duties on wines from the customs to the excise, which was one of the plans he had in view for increasing the revenue, and which he had before given the house notice of, when he proposed the sinking fund of a million annually. The bill, however, was objected to upon two grounds; first on the difficulty of applying the excise laws to wine; and, secondly, on the impolicy of ever extending those laws. Though these objections were started by several members, the bill was read the third time on the 29th of June, and carried without any material alterations.

On the 17th of February, 1786, Mr. Burke charged in the house of commons, Warren Hastings, esq. with high crimes and misdemeanors committed by that gentleman during his administration in the East Indies, in the capacity of governor-general of Bengal. In consequence of the charges made against Mr. Hastings, a prosecution was commenced; but as it could give little or no entertainment to our readers to enter into a detail of the particulars of such an immense mass of evidence, as would of itself furnish matter to constitute several volumes, and which continued for several successive years; we shall content ourselves with just observing that many complicated scenes of villany were exhibited to the public in the course of this trial, but at length Mr. Hastings was acquitted (h).

A treaty of commerce and navigation, between the king of Great Britain and Louis XVI. king of France, was signed at Versailles, on the 26th of September. We shall forbear making any other remark upon this new and important event, than that it appears to have caused much alarm and apprehension amongst the manufacturing part of the French nation: its expediency and policy, with respect to this country, was amply discussed in the proceedings of the British parliament.

During the recess in parliament, the right honourable Charles Jenkinson was advanced to the dignity of a peer of Great Britain, appointed chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, and president of the board of trade; and though not formally admitted to a seat in his majesty's cabinet councils was supposed to be confidentially consulted upon all affairs of importance; the earl of Gower was created marquis of Stafford, and lord Camden, advanced to the degree of an earl; and the duke of Athol, earl of Abercorn, duke of Montague, (with remainder to the second son of the duke of Buccleugh;) the duke of Queensberry, the earl of Tyrone, the earl of Shannon, lord Delaval, sir Harboard Harboard, and sir Guy Carleton, were created peers of Great Britain.

His majesty opened the session on the 23rd of January, 1787, with a speech from the throne, in which, after mentioning the friendly disposition of foreign powers towards this country, he informed the two houses, that he had concluded a treaty of commerce with the French king, and had ordered a copy of it to be laid before them. He recommended, as the first object of their deliberations, the necessary measures for carrying it into effect: and expressed his satisfaction, that they would find the provisions contained in it were calculated for the encouragement of industry, and the extension of lawful commerce in both countries; and, by promoting a beneficial intercourse between their respective inhabitants, to have a tendency to give additional permanency to the blessings of peace.

Addresses were moved and seconded in both houses; and as they contained nothing but matters of mere compliment to the king, they passed without opposition; but in the house of commons Mr. Fox thought himself obliged to take notice of some general principles, which had been advanced by the proposers of the address, apparently as the ground upon which it was intended to defend the treaty, that had lately been concluded with the court of Versailles.

On the 5th of February Mr. Pitt moved, "That the house should resolve itself into a committee on the Monday following, to take into consideration that part of his majesty's speech on opening the session, which related to the treaty of commerce and navigation formed with his Most Christian majesty." This was strenuously objected to by the opposition, as affording too short a time for deliberation: lord George Cavendish moved, that "Monday se'nnight" should be substituted in the room of "Monday next," and that in the mean time a call of the house should be ordered. After some altercation the house divided, when there appeared for the amendment eighty-nine, against it two hundred and thirteen.

On the 12th, before the house resolved itself into a committee upon the treaty of commerce and navigation with France, a petition was presented by Mr. alderman Newnham from certain manufacturers assembled in their chamber of commerce, praying that the house would not that day come to any decisive resolution upon the commercial treaty with France, as the petitioners had not leisure to understand the treaty, and consequently were not perfectly aware to what degree their interests, and the interests of other manufacturers might probably be affected by it. Upon the petition, Mr. Pitt remarked, that its contents, and the moment of presenting it were somewhat singular. The French treaty had been published between four and five months, during which time the petitioners it seems had not chosen to find leisure to examine and understand it, and now, on the day on which the house had agreed to take it into consideration, without pointing out one specific objection to it, they modestly requested parliament would delay, for an indefinite time, all further proceedings upon it. This, he conceived, the house ought by no means to consent to. The order of the day was therefore loudly

(h) The administration of Mr. Hastings had been said, by Mr. Sheridan, "to exhibit a medley of meanness and outrage, of duplicity and depredation, of prodigality and oppression, of the most callous cruelty contrasted with the hollow affectation of liberality and good faith. The sordid system of commercial policy, to which all the arrangements and regulations of the company are ultimately to be traced, was under his government carried to its utmost extent. Thus have nations been extirpated for a sum of money, whole tracts of country laid waste to furnish an investment, princes expelled from the balance of an account, and a bloody sceptre wielded in one hand, in order to replenish the empty purse of mercantile mendicancy, displayed in the other." Vide Sheridan's speech on the Begum Charge, in the fourteenth article of Impeachment.

Yet, as Mr. Hastings declares, in his famous minutes of defence, "that he had the conscious satisfaction to see all his measures terminate in their designed objects; that his political conduct was invariably regulated by truth, justice, and good faith: and that he resigned his charge in a state of established peace and security, with all the sources of its abundance unimpaired and even improved."

To reconcile these apparent incongruities, we are required therefore, by a species of faith which can work miracles, to believe that there existed in India crimes without a criminal, oppressions without an oppressor, and tyranny without a tyrant. Belsham's Memoirs, iii. 222.

called

called for; and the house being resolved into a committee, Mr. Pitt, in a long speech entered into an explanation and defence of the treaty. Mr. Fox answered him at great length, in which he objected to several of that gentleman's principles, as too narrow for the great subject they were discussing, and to the conclusions he had drawn from them in favour of the treaty, in its three great points of view, policy, commerce, and finance, as fallacious and unwarranted.

On the 15th, at a late hour, Mr. Pitt proposed, that the committee should again be formed for the consideration of the commercial treaty. This was strongly opposed, as taking the house by surprize; but upon a division, Mr. Pitt's motion was carried by a majority of one hundred and forty-five to fifty-nine. The house being accordingly resolved into a committee, Mr. Pitt read, without any preface to his second resolution: "That the wines of France be imported into this country upon as low duties as the present duties paid on the importation of Portugal wines." Some debates now ensued, and before the question was demanded, Mr. Fox moved, by way of amendment, that the following words be added to it: "That the duties on the importation of Portugal wines should at the same time be lowered one-third." This, Mr. Fox observed, would effectually preserve the Methuen treaty in full force, so far as related to our part of the obligation, and would enable government more advantageously to negociate the pending treaty with Portugal. This motion was negatived without farther discussion, by ninety-one to seventy-six, and the original resolution put and carried.

On the 19th the report of the committee upon the commercial treaty, was brought up, and on the usual motion being made, that the house do agree to the same, notice was taken of the omission of the mention of Ireland both in the treaty and the tariff; and it was asked, whether she was understood to be included in it? To this question Mr. Pitt replied, that Ireland was certainly entitled to all the benefits of the French treaty; but it was at her own option, whether she should choose to avail herself of those advantages; for it was only to be done by her passing such laws as should put the tariff on the same footing in that country, as it was stipulated should be done in this. Had the adoption of the treaty by Ireland been a stipulation necessary to be performed before it could be finally concluded on by this country, then this country would have been deprived of all the benefits resulting from it in the event of Ireland's refusal. The report was finally agreed to, upon a division, by a great majority.

On the 21st came on another debate, which the commercial treaty gave rise to, in the house of commons. It arose from an address, moved by Mr. Blackburne, member for Lancashire, "to thank his majesty for the solicitude he had been graciously pleased to evince, in forming a treaty of commerce between Great Britain and France; assuring him that the house conceived that the most happy effects would result from it to his faithful subjects, and that they would take every necessary step to render the negociation effectual." In support of this address, he said that he had received letters from his constituents, informing him, that a numerous meeting of cotton manufacturers had been held at Manchester, in consequence of a kind of remonstrance which they had seen in the public prints against the commercial treaty, from the chamber of manufactures; and that, after a serious deliberation, and a full discussion of the subject, they considered the treaty as highly beneficial to this country in general, and to the cotton manufacture in particular. They desired him also to inform the house, that they neither approved of the chamber of commerce, nor had delegated any person to represent them in that body, when the petition, praying for time to consider the subject, was carried.

The honourable captain Berkeley, (member for Gloucestershire,) seconded the motion; and said, that the treaty had met the approbation of many bodies of woollen manufacturers among his constituents. It was in France only that it was condemned, as being too advantageous to England, and to have a tendency to ruin the French manufactures. The people of Abbeville in particular had declared, that if the treaty should be carried into effect, they should be undone. These arguments were opposed. The debate, however, continued till near three in the morning, when the previous question, which was moved by Mr. Ellis, being put, was carried in the affirmative, by two hundred and thirty-six to one hundred and sixty, and an address was afterwards agreed to without a division.

On the 23rd the address was communicated, at a conference, to the lords, and their concurrence requested; and the 1st of March was appointed by them for taking the subject into consideration. Whilst the commons were engaged in debating on the commercial treaty, the attention of the house of lords was called, by viscount Stormont, to a question in which the constitution of that branch of the legislature, together with the rights of the Scottish peerage, were essentially concerned. It arose out of a circumstance which happened during the late prorogation of parliament, the creation of two of the sixteen peers of Scotland to be peers of Great Britain; and it was simply this, whether, after such creation, they could continue to sit as representatives of the peerage of Scotland? The act of union made no mention of the subject; the only precedent that existed, was that of the duke of Athol, upon whom, in 1736, being then one of the sixteen peers, the English barony of Strange devolved by inheritance, was for the affirmative; and it was well known that the lord chancellor's opinion was in favour of the same side of the question. On the other hand, the negative appeared to lord Stormont so strongly supported by every principle of equity, as to induce him to bring the question, notwithstanding those difficulties, to a public decision. Accordingly, on the 13th of February, the lords, having been previously summoned, the house resolved itself into a committee of privileges, for the purpose of their taking it into consideration (i). In support of the motion he observed that the question appeared to him to lie in a narrow compass, and was to be decided upon a few plain obvious principles, which he stated to the committee. After some debate, the motion was carried by a majority of fifty-eight to thirty-eight, and was followed by another of the same kind respecting the duke of Queensberry, created baron Douglas.

On the 28th, Mr. Beaufoy, member for Great Yarmouth, at the request of the deputies of the dissenting congregations in and about London, made a motion for taking into consideration the repeal of the corporation and test acts. But Mr. Beaufoy's endeavours to procure a repeal of those parts of the test and corporation acts which excluded protestant dissenters from office, were of no avail. Lord North apprehended danger to the church and state from such an appeal; and Mr. Pitt supposed that the barriers of our establishment might be weakened by it. Mr. Fox, however, thought the constitution sufficiently secure without those illiberal restrictions; and said that, on the present occasion, he should not be suspected of being biassed by any improper partiality towards the dissenters. The motion was also supported by sir Harry Houghton, Mr. Smith, and sir James Johnstone: but opposed by sir William Dolben; who read a passage from a book written by a distinguished dissenting minister, in which he observes, "That their silent propagation of the truth would in the end prove efficacious. They were wisely placing, as it were grain by grain, a train of gunpowder, to which a match would one day be laid to blow up the fabric of error, which could never be again raised upon the same foundation." The question being put, it passed in the negative; ayes one hundred, noes one hundred and seventy-eight.

About this time a subject was brought forward in the house of commons by Mr. alderman Newnham, which had for some time engaged the attention and feelings of the public, namely, the embarrassed state of the finances of the prince of Wales. The establishment of his royal highness's household took place upon his coming of age, in the year, 1783, during the administration of the duke of Portland. Upon a full consideration of what was thought becoming the credit of the nation, and the exalted rank of the heir apparent to the throne, the ministers of that day are said to have proposed, that an annual income should be settled upon him by parliament of one hundred dred thousand pounds. This proposal is said to have been rejected by the king with expressions of such marked resentment, as to make the immediate resignation of those ministers more than probable. In this emergency the prince of Wales interposed, and signified his desire, that the whole business should be left to the king; and declared his readiness to accept of whatever provision his majesty might think proper to grant. In consequence of this interference the affair appears to have been accommodated, and an allowance of fifty thousand pounds a-year, payable out of the civil list revenue, was settled upon his royal highness. In a few years afterwards, it appeared that this provision was inadequate to the purpose for which it was designed; for, in the year 1786, the prince was found to have contracted a debt to the amount of about one hundred thousand pounds, exclusive of fifty thousand pounds and upwards expended on Carlton House. His royal highness, on thus becoming acquainted with the state of his affairs, thought it expedient to take some effectual measures for the relief of his creditors. He first applied to the king, his father, upon whose affection alone he wished to rely, and to whose judgement he declared his readiness to submit his past, and conform his future conduct. By his majesty's directions, a full account of the prince's affairs were laid before him; but from some cause, hitherto unknown, a direct refusal to afford him any relief was conveyed to his royal highness through one of his principal officers of state. The prince of Wales appears then to have conceived himself bound in honour and justice to have recourse to the only expedient in his power. The day after he received the message from the king, he dismissed the officers of his court, and reduced the establishment of his household to that of a private gentleman; he ordered his horses to be sold, the works at Carlton House to be discontinued, and such parts, as were not necessary for his personal use, to be shut up. From these savings an annual sum of forty thousand pounds was set apart, and vested in the hands of trustees for the payment of his debts. But even this laudable conduct did not escape censure, as it appeared by an event, which happened soon after; we mean the danger to which his majesty's life was exposed in August, 1786, when Margaret Nicholson, a lunatic, under pretence of presenting a petition to his majesty, made an effort to deprive him of life, by endeavouring to stab him in the body. Upon that occasion no notice whatever of the accident was conveyed to the prince of Wales by the court. He was informed of it at Brighthelmstone from the information of a private correspondent; and he immediately repaired to Windsor, where he was received by the queen, but the king did not see him. In this deplorable state of the prince's affairs, the expedient was suggested to his royal highness, by several respectable members of the house of commons, of appealing to the justice and generosity of the nation in parliament. To this measure the prince appears to have assented, as well from a natural wish to free himself from his pecuniary embarrassments, as from a desire of removing any ill impression, that the misfortune of having incurred the royal displeasure, and the consequent refusal of affording him any relief, might have left upon the minds of the public. Accordingly on the day already mentioned, Mr. alderman Newnham demanded of the chancellor of the exchequer, whether it was the intention of ministers to bring forward any proposition for rescuing the prince of Wales from his present embarrassed situation? For though his conduct, under the difficulties with which he laboured, reflected the highest honour on his character, he thought it would bring indelible disgrace upon the nation, if he were suffered to remain any longer in his present reduced circumstances. Mr. Pitt replied, that it was not his duty to bring forward a subject of the nature that had been mentioned, except by the command of his majesty. Mr. Newnham, therefore gave notice of his intention to bring the subject regularly before the house on the 4th of May. In the mean time the friends of the prince were indefatigable in their endeavours, to procure the support of the independent members of parliament to the proposed motion. On the 24th of the same month, Mr. Pitt, after requesting that Mr. Newnham would inform the house more particularly of the motion he intended to make, adverted to the extreme delicacy of the subject; and declared, that the knowledge he possessed of many circumstances relating to it, made him anxious to persuade the house to prevent the discussion of it. Should, however, the honourable member persist in his determination to bring it forward, it would be absolutely necessary to lay those circumstances before the public; and however distressing it might prove to him as an individual, from the profound respect he entertained for every part of the royal family, he should discharge his duty to the public and enter fully into the subject. On the 27th, Mr. Newnham, in compliance with the request that had been made, signified to the house, that the motion he intended to make would be to the following effect: "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, praying him to take into his royal consideration the present state of the affairs of the prince of Wales, and to grant him such relief as his royal wisdom should think fit, and that the house would make good the same." Some debates ensued on the motion, and on the 30th, Mr. Newnham made a few observations upon what had passed during those debates. A violent altercation ensued; and on the day following, overtures were made to his royal highness to bring the business to a private accommodation. On the 3rd, Mr. Pitt had an audience at Carlton House, and the same night the prince was informed by his majesty's command, in general terms, that if the motion intended to be made next day in the house of commons should be withdrawn, every thing might be settled to his highness's satisfaction. Accordingly, Mr. Newnham, upwards of four hundred members being present, said, he felt the highest satisfaction in being able to inform the house, that his intended motion was no longer necessary. Several members joined in expressing, in the warmest terms, the great satisfaction this information afforded them.

In the year 1785, a tax had been imposed upon retail shop-keepers, which was strongly opposed at the time by the inhabitants of London and Westminster, as partial and unjust in its principle, and peculiarly oppressive in its operation upon those two cities. The business was this year committed to Mr. Fox, who on the 24th of April moved the house for the repeal. He said, he had never been forward in opposing taxes, because he thought it the duty, in general, of members of parliament to support government in the arduous and invidious measures of finance; but at the same time he thought there were limits to this duty, and that they were bound to insist upon the abolition of any tax, which upon a fair trial was found to be oppressive and unjust. Such a trial the tax in question had undergone, and it was found by experience to be, a partial tax upon housekeepers, whose houses had shops annexed to them; it was, to all intents and purposes, a personal tax, unjustly levied upon a particular description of men. The partiality of the tax, he said, was in the highest degree glaring. The whole sum assessed for the shop-tax amounted to fifty-nine thousand pounds, of which the cities of London and Westminster, and the adjacent parishes, paid forty-three thousand pounds. In some parts of the kingdom not above one hundred pounds was assessed for a whole county, and not above fifty for a few. If, according to the opinions of some politicians, every place should send such a number of representatives to parliament as was proportionable to their payment of taxes, the inhabitants of London and Westminster would send not less than three hundred and fifty. These facts, Mr. Fox contended, proved the tax to be so partial and unjust in its operations and pressure, that he could not see how the minister could resist the application for its repeal with any colour of reason or candour. Upon a division there appeared for the repeal one hundred and forty-seven, against it one hundred and eighty-three.

On the 30th of May, the king went in the usual state to the house of peers, and the commons being sent for, the speaker, as soon as he came to the bar, addressed his majesty, and stated that he had brought up two bills, by which the house of commons had granted to his majesty an additional supply; and he expressed the satisfaction they felt in having been able to provide for the services of the year without having recourse to any new loan. He then enumerated the principal transactions of the session, as they related to the several objects that had been recommended to their attention at the opening of the session. The royal assent being then given to the bills, the king delivered a speech from the throne, in which he commended their zeal and assiduity, and thanked them for the proofs they had given him, his family, and government, of their attention and regard. The lord chancellor then, by his majesty's command, prorogued the parliament.

A war had for some time raged with the utmost fury between the empress of Russia and the Porte. The empress had had sought the alliance of most of the European courts; but the disposition of the maritime powers of England and Holland were not yet fully known. The empress intended to send a fleet into the Mediterranean; and the assistance of England was now become necessary. In confidence of English succour, pilot-boats were engaged in this country, to wait in proper stations for the arrival of the Russian fleet, to guide them into those ports, which, being the station of the royal navy arsenals, could the more expeditiously supply them with stores and provisions, and, at the same time, most effectually facilitate their equipment for the Mediterranean service. These objects being attained, the pilots were to conduct them through the Channel, and then to be replaced by a new set, equally versed in the navigation of the more distant seas, which they were to encounter. In the mean time some merchants in London, as agents to the court of Petersburg, had agreed for the hire of eighteen large ships, of four hundred tons, or upwards, to serve as tenders to the Russian fleet, in the conveyance of provisions, stores, arms, artillery, and ammunition. Notwithstanding this promising train, a proclamation appeared in the London Gazette, prohibiting British seamen from entering into any foreign service, which threw a fatal damp upon the design: this was attended with a notice to the contractors for the tenders, that the engagement for supplying them must be renounced; that the ships would not be permitted to proceed; and that government was determined to maintain the strictest neutrality during the war, with respect to all the hostile powers, and consequently should afford no aid whatever to any of them. In consequence of this refusal on the part of the English, Russia applied to Holland for the hire of a number of large transports to answer the same purpose; but here the disappointment was renewed, that government not only absolutely refusing to comply with the request, but declaring its determination to observe the strictest neutrality. This rejection was attributed to the influence of Great Britain at the Hague, and stored up for future remembrance.

The interval between the prorogation of parliament, on the 30th of May, and its subsequent meeting on the 27th of November following, was not distinguished by any remarkable domestic occurrences. The speech from the throne contained a very full and explicit declaration of the reasons which induced the king to assemble the two houses at so early a period. He informed them, that the disputes which subsisted in the republic of the United Provinces had become so critical as to endanger their constitution and independence, and were therefore likely in their consequences to affect the interests of his dominions. That, upon this account, he had endeavoured by his good offices to maintain the lawful government in those countries, and had thought it necessary to explain his intention of counteracting all forcible interference on the part of France: that, in conformity to this principle, when his most Christian Majesty, in consequence of an application for assistance against the king of Prussia, made by the party which had usurped the government of Holland, had notified to him his intention of granting their request, he had declared that he should not remain a quiet spectator, and had given immediate orders for augmenting his forces both by sea and land; and that, in the course of these transactions, he had thought proper to conclude a subsidiary treaty with the landgrave of Hesse Cassel. That the rapid success of the Prussian troops having soon after enabled the provinces to re-establish their lawful government, and all subjects of contest being thus removed, an amicable explanation took place between him and the most Christian king, and both parties had engaged to disarm, and to place their naval establishments on the same footing as at the beginning of the year. His majesty next acquainted them with the friendly assurances he continued to receive from all foreign powers, and with the war that had unfortunately broken out between Russia and the Porte. He further informed them of a convention which had been agreed upon between him and the French king; and that he had ordered copies of the several treaties and declarations, before referred to, to be laid before them. Addresses were moved as usual, and after some trifling debates, passed nem con.

Shortly after the commencement of the sessions, Mr. Grenville gave notice, that he should beg leave to propose for the consideration of the house, certain amendments and additions to the bill brought into parliament by his father, for the better regulation of the trials of controverted elections. He explained the objects which his bill had in view, and the means he proposed for obtaining them; namely, to impower a committee to adjudge that the party presenting an election petition, which should turn out to be frivolous, should pay reasonable costs, and to impower them in like manner to oblige the party offering a frivolous pretence or answer to a petition, to pay reasonable costs. He believed such a regulation would save much expence to individuals, and much time and trouble to the house. Another very material inconvenience, he said, called equally for a remedy, which was the want of a rule being laid down to establish the rights of election. To remedy this, he proposed to annex certain provisions to his bill, which he presumed would answer the purport intended, and ascertain the rights of election for the future. The bill was immediately brought in, and read a first time, and ordered to be printed; and, after going through the usual forms in both houses, received the royal assent.

The trade carried on by this country, and other European nations, upon the coast of Africa, for the purpose of purchasing negro slaves, to be employed in the cultivation of the West India islands, and parts of the continent of America, does not seem till lately to have been considered with that general attention, which a practice so abhorrent in its nature to the mild principles of modern policy and manners might have been expected to excite. The first public attempt that was made to put a stop to this inhuman traffic, was said to be by the quakers of the southern provinces of America, who soon after the establishment of their independence, not only presented for this purpose, a strong and pathetic address to their legislative assemblies, but actually proceeded to emancipate the slaves that were in their possession. In Great Britain, the same sect appears also to have taken the lead, and, after the example of their American brethren, presented last year a similar petition to the parliament of this kingdom. The cause soon after became extremely popular. A society was formed, and a considerable sum subscribed, for the purpose of collecting information, and supporting the expence of an application to parliament. Pamphlets were published upon the subject; several eminent divines recommended it from the pulpit and in printed discourses, and in the present session, petitions were presented from the two universities. In the mean time his majesty's ministers thought it their duty to institute an enquiry, before a committee of the privy council, into the facts and allegations contained in the representation of both parties upon the subject; and Mr. Wilberforce, to whom the conduct of that business of the house of commons had been, by a sort of general consent, assigned, having been prevented, by illness, from bringing it before the house, Mr. Pitt, on the 9th of May, moved the following resolution, "That this house will, early in the next session of parliament, proceed to take into consideration the circumstances of the slave trade, complained of in the petitions presented to the house, and conclude on what may be fit to be done thereupon."

Some difficulty attending the introduction of this business before the house, sir William Dolben moved, on the 21st of May, for leave to bring in a bill to regulate the transportation of the natives of Africa, to the British colonies in the West Indies. The regulations of the bill, he said, would regard the number of Africans put on board each ship, limiting the number to the tonnage of the vessel, to prevent their being crowded too closely together; securing to them good and sufficient provisions, and other matters equally conducive to their health, and their accommodation. He declared he should not have thought of bringing in a bill at that late period of the session, were he not convinced of the existence of the grievance to a considerable extent, and, that, by applying an immediate remedy, some thousands of the unhappy persons' lives might be saved before the meeting of the next session.

On the 26th of May, the merchants and other inhabitants of the town and port of Liverpool, presented a petition, stating, that the suppression of the slave trade would be attended with ruinous consequences to many of the petitioners, who had embarked in the trade, and invested their whole property therein; it would be highly injurious to the interest and public revenues of this country; and operate as an effectual bar to future commercial emulation and enterprize; and therefore praying, that they might be heard, by their counsel, against the abolition or restriction of this trade, before any resolution, or a bill, be passed by the house. On the 2nd of June, the house being in a committee upon the regulating bill, the counsel for the petitioners appeared at the bar. The bill, however, having gone through the house of commons, was carried up to the lords, where it also passed, after having received several amendments; some of which being supposed to trench on the privileges of the lower house, a new bill was brought in, which passed both houses, and received the royal assent.

On the 8th of June, the chancellor of the exchequer drew the attention of the house to the compensation which was intended to be made to the American Loyalists, for the losses they had sustained in consequence of their adherence to the mother country, during the late American war. Mr. Pitt thought they had strong claims on the generosity and compassion of the house. He stated the different descriptions of loyalists, who had preferred their claims before the commissioners appointed to inquire into American claims, and divided them into four classes. In the first, he ranked all those who had resided in America at the commencement of the war, and who, in pursuance of their principles of loyalty and adherence to this country, were obliged to abandon their estates and other property in America, which, as a natural consequence, were seized and confiscated by the Americans. The second class of claimants included those who, though resident in England during the war, had exhibited claims on account of their loss of property in America. The other class of claimants, were those loyalists, who, having either enjoyed places, or exercised professions, in America, had, by being driven away in consequence of their loyalty to this country, lost their incomes. With respect to the West Florida claimants, he should propose to pay them the full amount of their claims, as they stood in a very different predicament from the American claimants, having, in consequence of a peace, which ceded Florida to another power, and which that house had agreed to, been obliged to abandon their habitations and property in West Florida. Having thus explained the several points, and stated that the whole amount of claims was upwards of two millions, exclusive of the four or five hundred thousand pounds which had been already advanced at different periods, he said he should move a general resolution for the amount of that sum to be issued in debentures, bearing three and a half per cent. interest, which would, he supposed, be nearly equal to ready-money payment; and he had, on a former occasion, intimated his idea of proposing, with the approbation of the committee, that the whole sum should be paid off by instalment, by means of a lottery. That, however, was reserved for further discussion; it was sufficient for the present to move, "That one million two hundred and twenty-eight thousand two hundred and thirty-nine pounds should be voted for the several American claimants for losses, &c. and one hundred and thirteen thousand nine hundred and fifty-two pounds fourteen shillings and three farthings to the Florida claimants." These propositions, with few exceptions, met with the general approbation of the house (k).

On the 31st of January, departed this life at Rome, prince Charles-Edward-Louis-Casimir Stuart. Since the death of his father in 1765, he assumed the title of king of England. He was generally known on the continent by the appellation of the Chevalier de St. George, and in England by that of the Young Pretender. He was sixty-seven years and two months old on the day of his decease. He was the son of James-Francis, prince of Wales, son of James the Second. His mother was the princess Maria-Clementina Sobieski, grand-daughter of the celebrated John Sobieski, king of Poland. She had an immense fortune; a great part of which was consumed in the fruitless attempt made by her son, in 1745, to place his father on the throne of England. She had two sons; Charles, who lately died, and Henry Benedict, who by his father was created duke of York, and who having been promoted to the purple, has been generally known by the name of Cardinal York. The elder son married some years ago, a princess of Stolberg, in Germany; but by her he left no issue. He has left, however, a natural daughter, whom, by his pretended royal power, he created duchess of Albany, and to whom he bequeathed considerable property: to his brother, the cardinal, he left his empty pretensions to the crown of England. The remains of Charles were deposited at Frescati in Italy.

A singular circular letter, concerning the English nation, was now transmitted by order of the emperor of Morocco, to all the European consuls resident within his dominions (l).

A treaty of defensive alliance between the king of Great Britain and their high mightinesses the States General of the United Provinces, was signed at the Hague, on the 15th of April, 1788. A defensive treaty between his Britannic majesty and the king of Prussia, was also signed at Berlin, on the 13th of August following.

This year was distinguished by a calamity which seemed to threaten the nation with consequences of a very direful nature. The health of the sovereign had suffered a gradual decline, and from some peculiar symptoms, the king was induced to visit Cheltenham, where he drank liberally of the mineral waters, without exhibiting any symptoms of mental derangement, and did not return to the metropolis until the 18th of August. No benefit answerable to the expectations that had been formed, resulted from this excursion. His health was in a precarious state, and, on the 22nd of October, symptoms were observed by one of the royal physicians, of that alienation of mind which afterwards occasioned so many important transactions (m). For some time, it was thought proper to observe as much secrecy as possible respecting the nature of the king's malady. The retreat of the sovereign to Windsor was favourable to this purpose, and for several days an opinion was entertained by the people in general, that his indisposition was a fever, and that it had arisen to so alarming a height as to threaten a speedy dissolution. The real nature of the case, however, could not long be suppressed. Public prayers were offered up to the throne of grace for his recovery, and the private wishes of his loyal subjects accompanied them. By the structure and practice of the English constitution, almost every species of public business is in some degree implicated with the royal prerogatives. The administration of political government, in particular, was by this event virtually suspended from its functions; and notwithstanding the critical situation of Europe, it was now deemed impracticable to return any answer to the dispatches of foreign courts, or of our own ambassadors. In this situation, the most natural expedient was to suffer the two houses of parliament, which stood prorogued till the 20th of November, to meet at that time, and either adjourn for a short interval, or immediately proceed to discuss the measures it would be proper to adopt at the present crisis. Circular letters were accordingly addressed to the members of the legislature on the 14th, signifying to them, that the indisposition of the sovereign rendered it doubtful whether there would be a possibility of receiving his commands for the farther prorogation of parliament. In that case the two houses must of necessity assemble, and the attendance of the different members was earnestly requested. In consequence of which, they hastened to Westminster from all parts of the kingdom.

At the meeting of parliament, the lord chancellor observed in the house of lords, that the reason of their being thus unusually called together, without the ordinary notice for the dispatch of business, arose from the severity of the king's indisposition, which had rendered it impossible for him to approach the royal person, in order to receive his (k) A bill was now brought into the house of commons, for granting to the earl of Newburgh, grandson of the late Charles Radcliffe, and the heirs male of his body, a rent charge of two thousand five hundred pounds, out of the estates forfeited by the earl of Derwentwater, and settled upon Greenwich Hospital. The peculiar hardship of lord Newburgh's case, whose father was an infant when his family were engaged in the rebellion of 1715, had often induced parliament from time to time, during the late and the present reign, to grant certain sums of money for his relief. In the act passed for restoring the forfeited estates, that of the Derwentwater family was not included, but an intention was then declared of making a special provision for the case. Some difficulties occurred with regard to the diminution in the hospital fund, but at last the bill passed as originally stated.

(l) The whole of this curious paper is nothing more than an unqualified assertion, that the English delight in telling lies. We shall, however, select the following article from this curious Imperial epistle.—"According to our religion, a lie is the most abominable of all vices. We never could dive into their character, because they have no other than that of telling lies."

(m) Many indeed were of opinion that the king's temporary loss of intellectual capacity, was the consequence of his general abstemious mode of living, though he habituated himself to exercise. His indisposition, however, continued several months, amidst all the exertions of his medical attendants; among whom Dr. Willis is supposed to have had the most perfect knowledge of his case.

commands. Lord Camden remarked, that the customary practice of giving forty days notice, previously to the meeting of parliament, was not in his opinion absolutely necessary. There was an express act of parliament, that limited the notice in case of treason or rebellion to fourteen days; he therefore recommended an adjournment for that term, and at the same time moved, that the chancellor, by order of the house, should address an official letter to every individual peer. Mr. Pitt observed to the house of commons, that every authority had been consulted respecting the present singular situation of affairs; but they did not point out either the possibility of directing a new prorogation, or enable ministers to open the session of parliament in any regular way. He therefore recommended the interval of a fortnight, when, if the king's illness should unhappily continue, it would be indispensably incumbent upon them to enter upon the immediate consideration of the state of public affairs. Mr. Pitt farther moved a call of the house for the 4th of December, and that the speaker be directed to send circular letters requiring the attendance of every member on that day.

The ministers, by this expedient, removed the difficulties which at first presented themselves, respecting the legal assembling of the two houses of parliament; but the questions that remained were more essential in themselves, and had a greater tendency to interest the passions of mankind. The uniform tenor of all precedents afforded by the History of England, were in favour of a protectorate or regency, under which the whole or a part of the political power should be confided to the next heir to the crown, or to the adult of the royal family most nearly allied to the king (n). Three modes of proceeding that might be adopted in the present instance, and three forms of executive government that might be employed for the present temporary purpose, appeared evident to the ministry. Parliament therefore might either be called upon to nominate a council of regency, or they might constitute the prince of Wales regent, at the same time declaring that none of his proceedings should be valid unless approved of by a council so appointed: or they might constitute the prince sole regent, but under such limitations and restrictions, as should be calculated to supersede as much as possible all important changes, and to restrain him from the adoption of any decisive measures. These three projects are supposed to have passed successively under the contemplation of ministers. The two first were rejected as untenable: the most obvious objection against the last was, that the government of England was a limited monarchy.

On the 4th of December, when the parliament re-assembled, a report of the board of privy council, containing an examination of the royal physicians, was presented to the two houses by lord Camden and Mr. Pitt. In the mean time, doubts were suggested by Mr. Vyner, Mr. Fox, and Mr. Burke, whether parliament could, consistently with its privileges and its momentous situation, dispense with that sort of evidence upon which they were accustomed to proceed. Upon these suggestions, administration changed its original design, and it was resolved on the 8th, that each house should appoint a committee of its own members to examine and report the sentiments of the royal physicians. In pursuance of the usual mode of procedure in the two houses, the committee of the house of commons was named on the same day, and the committee of the house of lords on the day following. The number selected in each house was twenty-one. The report of the committee was laid upon the table of the house of commons, on the 10th, when a farther proposition was moved by Mr. Pitt, for the appointment of a committee to examine and report precedents of cases, in which the personal exercise of the royal authority had been prevented or interrupted by infancy, sickness, infirmity, or any other cause. Mr. Fox embraced this opportunity of bringing forward an opinion that was of considerable consequence to the cause of the prince of Wales, and which, if admitted would instantly put an end to those precautions and limitations upon the regency, which it was in the contemplation of ministers to suggest. By that report, they had ascertained that the king was at present incapable of the executive government; and it was the firm opinion of Mr. Fox, that the prince of Wales had as clear and express a right to exercise the powers of sovereignty, during the continuance of the present incapacity, as if his father were actually dead. He did not, however, mean that the prince of Wales could enter upon this exercise at his own pleasure, or was entitled to judge of the circumstances that caused it to be requisite. His right was perfect and entire, but the two houses of parliament, as the organs of the nation, were alone qualified to pronounce when he ought to take possession of his right. He commended the prince of Wales for not bringing forward his claim himself, and choosing rather to wait the decision of the parliament; adding, that his forbearance was to be imputed to his having been bred in the principles which had placed his family on the throne, and to his known veneration for those principles as the fundamentals of our constitution. Mr. Fox observed with respect to precedents, that there were none that applied to the present instance, and that he could therefore conceive no adequate reason for the proposed delay. The motion for a committee of precedents being at length put, was carried without a division. A motion for a similar committee was offered in the house of lords on the day following by lord Camden: and in the course of the debate, lord Stormont adduced an argument from the act of union concerning the election of a regent, and concluded with recommending an address to the prince of Wales, intreating him to assume the exercise of the royal authority.

On the 16th, the house of commons was to resolve itself into a committee on the state of the nation; and on the preceding day an ultimate attempt was made by lord Fitzwilliam and others in the house of lords, to deprecate the discussion of this delicate topic. The duke of York, in particular, expressed his wishes that the question might be waved. The duke of Gloucester confirmed the declaration of the duke of York. Lord Thurlow spoke with great energy of his sentiments of affection towards the king, emphatically exclaiming, "If I forget my king, may God forget me!" This circumstance, however, was obliquely censured by another peer, as having only a personal and interested tendency. The two leading resolutions proposed by Mr. Pitt, in the committee upon the state of the nation, were entirely of a declaratory nature, the first affirming that the personal exercise of the royal authority was interrupted, and the second, that it was the duty of the two houses of parliament to provide the means of supplying that defect. At length, after vehement debates, the house divided, when the numbers appeared, ayes two hundred and sixty-eight, and noes two hundred and four. The third resolution, which was intended by Mr. Pitt to complete the present proceeding, was stated to the house on the same day, but was not regularly debated till the 22nd. Its tenor was to declare that it was not necessary, for the purpose of supplying the present defect, that the two houses should determine on the means by which the royal assent might be given to the bill, which they might adopt for constituting a regency. The object of this proposition was sufficiently obvious. Administration had determined not to confide the regency to the prince of Wales but with certain limitations and restrictions; and they conceived it incumbent upon them to fix those restrictions in the present maimed and defective state of the legislature. All parties were agreed, that the prince of Wales was the proper person to be nominated sole regent, and that, if parliament possessed a discretion, it would be unwise for them to exercise it for any other than this individual purpose. After some debates, when the resolution passed for the second time under the revision of the house, an amendment upon the second of them was moved by Mr. Dempster, declaring, that it was the duty of the two houses to provide the means of supplying the present defect, by presenting an address to the prince of Wales, heir apparent, and of full age, requesting him to take upon himself the administration of the civil and military government during the royal incapacity. The house divided upon this amendment, ayes one hundred and seventy-eight, noes two hundred and fifty-one. The resolutions which had thus been passed were communicated to the house of lords on the following day, and were taken into consideration on the 26th.

A similar motion to that of Mr. Dempster was made by (n) It may be necessary to observe, that soon after the indisposition of the king had been ascertained, the prince of Wales dispatched an express to Mr. Fox, who was then in Italy, requesting his immediate presence to assist him in forming an administration. Mr. Fox arrived in London on the 24th of November, and the rapidity with which he travelled, had been such as to occasion an indisposition, which for several weeks had an alarming appearance. Lord Thurlow assented to become a member of the proposed administration, and the principal officers of state were said to have been arranged.

lord Rawdon in the other house, and this amendment was supported by lord viscount Stormont and lord Loughborough. When the house divided upon the amendment of lord Rawdon, the contents were sixty-six, non-contents ninety-nine. A protest was entered, signed by the duke of York, the duke of Cumberland, and forty-six other peers (o).

Mr. Pitt had fixed upon the 6th of January as the day for explaining to the house of commons the restrictions, which he should propose as necessary to accompany the declaration of a regent. But this topic was procrastinated, in consequence of a motion by Mr. Loveden for the appointment of a fresh committee to enquire into the state of the health of the king; as the royal indisposition was at this time an object of considerable curiosity, and that of consequence various and contradictory rumours would be propagated upon the subject. The degree of uncertainty was increased by the opposition and rivalship that had broken out between doctor Richard Warren, one of the principal physicians in ordinary to the king, and doctor Francis Willis, whose original profession had been that of a clergyman, but had very frequently and successfully attended persons afflicted with the royal malady. Doctor Warren was particularly cautious of delivering any prognostics upon the subject, not choosing to flatter the public with any delusory expectations; while doctor Willis conceived from the first the most sanguine hopes of his patient's recovery, and declared his opinion with a confidence which was ultimately justified by the event. Doctor Willis, therefore, became exceedingly acceptable to the queen; and doctor Warren, by her majesty's interference, was in one instance prevailed on to sign a report of the sovereign's health somewhat more favourable than he thought it ought to have been. At length, Mr. Sheridan moved an amendment upon the proposition for a committee of enquiry, authorising the members not merely to receive the evidence of the royal physicians, but to enquire generally into the state of the king's malady, and the probability of his speedy recovery, and to send for such persons and papers as might conduce to their information. The house divided upon the amendment, ayes one hundred and forty-one, noes two hundred and twenty-one. The report of the committee which was thus instituted, instead of being prepared, as was predicted, in a few hours, occupied a period of seven days. The report was voluminous, and the physicians underwent the most scrupulous examination. But, though a considerable degree of intelligence was thus obtained respecting the nature and symptoms of the royal indisposition, and the treatment the king had received, there did not appear any satisfactory materials, out of which to form a judgement respecting the duration of his disease.

Mr. Pitt's project respecting the form of government to be instituted, seemed to render it necessary for the ministers to consider the prince of Wales in no other light in the commencement of the business, than a privy counsellor and a prince of the blood; and such had been the principle upon which they acted, till their propositions respecting the decision of the question of right, had been ultimately adopted by the two houses of parliament. It was then thought necessary to proceed by bill, or by resolutions to be made the ground-work of a bill, to provide for the administration of the executive government during the period of the royal incapacity. In this situation they conceived themselves at liberty, and consequently regarded it as an act of deference and respect, to communicate to the prince of Wales the propositions they intended to offer to parliament upon this subject. A letter was addressed to him by Mr. Pitt on the 30th of December, informing him that it was the opinion of the king's confidential servants, that he should be empowered to exercise the royal authority during the illness and in the name of his father; providing nevertheless, that the care of the king's person, and the disposition of his household should be committed to the queen; and that the power to be exercised by the prince should not extend to the personal property of his father; to the granting any office, reversion, or pension, except where the law absolutely required it, as in the case of the judges, for any other term than during the king's pleasure; nor to the conferring any peerage, unless upon such persons of the royal issue as should have attained the age of twenty-one years. Mr. Pitt added, that the ideas he had suggested, were founded upon the supposition that the royal malady was only temporary, and might be of short duration. It would be difficult to fix the precise period of which these provisions ought to endure, but it would be open hereafter to the wisdom of parliament to consider them, whenever circumstances might appear to render it eligible.

The prince of Wales's answer is dated on the 2nd of January, 1789, and expresses, with considerable force, the sentiments which he might have been expected to feel upon such an occasion. Respecting the steps already taken he was silent; but it was with deep regret that he perceived, in the propositions of administration, a project for introducing weakness, disorder, and insecurity into every branch of political business; a project for dividing the royal family from each other, for separating the court from the state, and depriving government of its natural and accustomed support; a scheme for disconnecting the authority to command service from the power of animating it by reward, and for alloting to him all the invidious duties of the king by station, without the means of softening them to the public by any one act of grace, or favour.

On the 16th of the same month, Mr. Pitt opened his propositions to the house of commons, and declared, that the report which had just been prepared abundantly confirmed the sentiments he had before entertained upon the subject. He said, that the king's recovery was more probable than the contrary, and that the greatest length to which the malady was ordinarily known to extend, was a year and a half or two years, the shortest three months, and the average five or six. Such was the opinion of Dr. Willis, who of all the king's physicians was most entitled to credit. Mr. Pitt adverted to the regency bills of queen Anne, of king George the First, and king George the Second, where the circumstance in contemplation being a minority, the prospect of a more certain and longer delegation of power was afforded than might be expected in the present instance. In each of these cases, the powers of the crown had been lodged not in one single hand, but in great variety of persons. He owned that he had considerable doubts whether these bills were well adapted to the circumstances of the times in which they had passed, and was of opinion that the political power should be entrusted by parliament to one individual. But as the delegated authority had in former instances been restricted by the mode in which it was distributed, so he deemed it more judicial in the present, that he should have certain limitations. He adverted to the limitation respecting the peerage, and observed, that it could scarcely be maintained, that the want of such an incentive for a few months, was likely to deprive the country of the services of its meritorious citizens. Mr. Grenville discussed the subject at considerable length; and lord North retorted upon ministers what they had employed in a former debate. The measure which parliament was now called upon to adopt, contradicted that maxim of our constitution, that the king could never die. The king, it was true, in his individual and natural capacity, suffered a demise, but the political capacity of the crown was whole and entire, and the reason of this maxim was obviously to guard against and prevent an interregnum of imperial power. Mr. Pitt's project consisted of five propositions. To the first of these, vesting the prince of Wales with the royal authority, subject to such limitations as the parliament should provide, an amendment was moved by Mr. Powys; the object of which was to confer the exercise of the royal authority, unaccompanied by any limitations. This amendment was rejected with the usual majority. Upon the second resolution, relative to the creation of peers, the house divided, ayes two hundred and sixteen, noes one hundred (o) In this stage of the business, an incident occurred, that was calculated to render the singular situation of the two houses of parliament more palpable and conspicuous. Mr. Cornwall, speaker of the house of commons, died after a few days indisposition, on the 2nd of January, 1789. This was a case within the usual sphere of the royal prerogative, it being requisite to proceed to the immediate election of a new speaker, and the person elected not being accustomed to take upon himself the duties of his office, till his appointment had received the approbation of the king. This form it was necessary to dispense with in the present instance, and on the 5th of January it was moved by lord Euston and Mr. Pulteney, that Mr. Grenville, brother to the marquis of Buckingham, be chosen to supply the present vacancy. By Mr. Welbore Ellis, and Mr. Frederic Montagu, in the name of the other party in the house of commons, it was moved, that the speaker to be elected should be sir Gilbert Elliot, who had lately distinguished himself by the proposed impeachment of sir Elijah Impey. Upon this question the house divided, for Mr. Grenville two hundred and fifteen, for sir Gilbert Elliot one hundred and forty-four.

and fifty-nine. The resolutions that respected the granting offices for life, and the reservation of the king's real and personal property, were then carried without a division. The consideration of the fifth resolution, respecting the guardianship of the royal person, was adjourned to the 19th, and was attended with some degree of debate; when an amendment was moved by Mr. Boverie, to separate that part of the resolution which related to the household; and his motion was rejected upon a division, ayes one hundred and sixty-five, noes two hundred and twenty-nine.

The resolutions on the subject of the regency having undergone so considerable a degree of discussion, the bill which was brought in to carry them into effect, was attended with no remarkable debate, till the 7th of February, when the clauses came to be separately discussed. In the course of the debate, Mr. Pitt brought up certain clauses, enabling parliament to grant a pension of permanent office to any person filling the situation of lord chancellor, or to any person resigning the situation of one of the twelve judges. Mr. Pulteney did not think proper to offer his clause for limiting the duration of the regency, but presented an amendment which was accepted, limiting the duration of the peerage restriction to three years. The bill passed the house of commons on the 12th, and was carried up to the house of lords on the day following. The particular clauses of which bill came under the consideration of the house of lords, on the 17th and 18th, and a few amendments were introduced in this stage of the business. The power of the regent was limited in respect to the peerages to be conferred upon the members of the royal family, to such of them as should be resident in Great Britain, and a clause was introduced for vesting in the queen the guardianship of such of the royal children as had not attained the age of twenty years.

The further proceedings on this extraordinary business were suddenly suspended by the symptoms which now manifested themselves of the king's recovery. On the 12th of February, he was declared by his physicians to be in a state of progressive amendment; and on the 17th they declared his majesty to be in a state of convalescence. In consequence whereof the lord chancellor, on the third day of the intended committee of the house of lords upon the regency bill, moved an adjournment of all farther proceedings upon the subject. On the 25th the king was declared by his physicians free from complaint, and two days after, the reports of his health, which had been daily issued, were discontinued by the royal command. The two houses of parliament continued to sit by various adjournments, till the 10th of March, when the lord chancellor, commissioned by the sovereign, addressed them in a speech, and the ordinary business of the session regularly commenced. Addresses of congratulation were presented; illuminations demonstrated the joy of the people in every part of the kingdom; and a general thanksgiving was solemnized on the festival of St. George; the lords and commons attending their sovereign and his family, on this extraordinary occasion, to the cathedral of Saint Paul (p).

In the speech delivered by the chancellor, in the name of his majesty, to the two houses of parliament, the king conveyed to them his warmest acknowledgements for the additional proofs they had given of their attachment to his person, their concern for the honour and interests of his crown, and the security and good government of his dominions. He communicated to them the treaty of alliance which he had concluded with the king of Prussia, and mentioned the endeavours he had employed to prevent, as far as possible, the extension of hostilities in the North, and to manifest his desire of a general peace. In the conversation that took place upon the motion of address, in return for the speech that had been delivered, earl Stanhope expressed a doubt as to the propriety of the present proceeding. He had no hesitation, he said, in giving a full confidence to the fact of the king's recovery, but doubted whether the present measure was strictly parliamentary. The two houses had determined that the king was rendered incapable by illness of executing the duties of his office, and they had just declared their opinion, in the provisions of the regency bill, respecting the manner in which it was proper he should resume the royal authority. If the king could of himself declare his recovery, such provisions had been superfluous and nugatory. Lord Thurlow replied, that no declaration of the two houses, on account of the king's illness, could take from him the right of governing, nor any clause in such a bill interrupt the resumption of his powers upon the restoration of his health. It was accordingly on the same day moved by lord Hawkesbury that the bill be rejected. The two houses accompanied their address to the king, with an address of congratulation to the queen, upon the fortunate termination of her late calamity.

One of the earliest topics of revenue that engaged the attention of parliament, after the king's restoration to health, was Mr. Fox's annual motion for a repeal of the shop tax; and Mr. Pitt consented to a measure, so earnestly and unremittingly demanded by the persons immediately affected by the tax.

A bill now passed for an extension of the laws of excise, for the purpose of preventing an evasion of the duties on tobacco. Though some of its restrictions appeared rigorous, if not unjust, it was not strongly opposed.

Mr. Beaufoy, on the 8th of May, introduced the motion, which he had two years before submitted to the house of commons, for the repeal of the corporation and test acts. This motion was opposed by lord North and Mr. Pitt, and upon a division the numbers appeared, ayes one hundred and two, noes one hundred and twenty-two.

Mr. Beaufoy also introduced a bill for the purpose of instituting a festival for the commemoration of the Revolution. The bill had originated in the circumstance of the preceding year, being the last in completing a century from that important event. The period had been celebrated in many parts of the kingdom with great zeal and solemnity, and a project had been formed, at the head of which were Mr. Fox and Mr. Sheridan, for the purpose of erecting a column in memory of this illustrious æra, which was to be seated upon the plains of Runnemede, the scene where the barons of old had extorted from king John the confirmation of Magna Charta. The bill was supported by Mr. Sheridan, but met with more opposition than might have been expected. It passed the house of commons, but was rejected upon the first reading in the house of lords.

The subject of the slave trade, which had been suggested to the consideration of parliament, in the preceding session, was not regularly resumed till the 12th of May. In the interval, various petitions had been presented in the last and present session from persons principally interested, the object of which was to demand that so fatal a measure as the abolition of the African trade might not be adopted. In the mean time, the report of the committee of privy council, of which Mr. Pitt had given notice in the preceding session, was laid upon the table of the house of commons, on the 25th of April, and the regular discussion of the business was at length opened by Mr. Wilberforce, in an elegant and energetic speech (q). After the debate, the house of commons proceeded to the hearing

(p) The guns in the Tower and in the Park were fired three times; first, upon the king's setting out; secondly, at the singing of Te Deum; and thirdly, upon his majesty's return: after which, the brigade of foot guards fired a feu-de-joie in St. James's Park, being drawn up in the queen's palace.

(q) In the course of his speech, Mr. Wilberforce noticed the evidence of Mr. Norris from Liverpool, which he observed was delivered in a manner that fully demonstrated that interest could draw a film over the eyes so thick, that total blindness could do no more. "Their apartments," said the evidence, "are fitted up as much for their advantage as circumstances will admit. They have several meals a day, some of their own country provisions, with the best sauces of African cookery, and by way of variety another meal of pulse, &c. according to the European taste. After breakfast they have water to wash themselves, while their apartments are perfumed with frankincense and lime juice. Before dinner, they are amused after the manner of their country; the song and the dance are promoted, and games of chance are furnished. The men play and sing, while the women and girls make fanciful ornaments with beads, with which they are plentifully supplied." Such was the strain, said Mr. Wilberforce, in which the Liverpool delegates gave their evidence before the privy council. What would the house think, when by the concurring testimony of other witnesses, the true history was laid open? The slaves, who were sometimes described as rejoicing in their captivity, were so wrung with misery at leaving their country, that it was the constant practice to set sail in the night, lest they should be sensible of their departure. Their accommodations, it seemed, were convenient. The right ancle of one indeed was connected with the left ancle of the other, by a small iron fetter, and if they were turbulent, by another on the wrists. The pulse which Mr. Norris mentioned, were horse-beans. He also talked of frankincense and lime-juice, while the surgeons described the slaves as so closely stowed, that there was not room to tread among them; and while it was proved in evidence by sir George Yonge, that even in a ship that wanted two hundred of her complement, the stench was intolerable. The song and the dance, said Mr. Norris, are promoted. The real truth was, that for the sake of exercise, those miserable wretches, loaded with chains, and oppressed with disease, were forced hearing of witnesses upon this important subject; at the same time that several attempts were made on the part of the West India proprietors, to procrastinate and interrupt the progress of the business. A motion was twice made for a call of the house, to attain a full attendance at the period of the ultimate decision, and, at length, on the 23rd of June, Mr. alderman Newnham, with the consent of Mr. Wilberforce, moved that the farther consideration of the subject should be deferred to the next session; and the question was carried without a division.

The office of speaker of the house of commons became vacant in June, by the promotion of Mr. Grenville to the situation of one of the principal secretaries of state, on the resignation of lord Sydney. On this occasion it was moved by the marquis of Graham, and Mr. Grosvenor, that Mr. Henry Addington, the personal friend of Mr. Pitt, and the son of Dr. Stephen Addington, physician to Mr. Pitt's family, should be appointed to the chair. Sir Gilbert Elliot was proposed on the part of opposition, and Mr. Fox and Mr. Burke, in support of this amendment, did not fail to mention the youth and inexperience of his competitor. At length the house divided, and the numbers appeared, in favour of Mr. Addington, two hundred and fifteen, and of sir Gilbert Elliot, one hundred and forty-two.

A discussion occurred in the house of commons on the 6th of July, relative to an application that had been made to ministers, by the French government, to permit the exportation of twenty thousand sacks of flour, for the relief of the inhabitants of that country, in the extreme scarcity under which they laboured. Mr. Pulteney having proposed a question to the minister upon the subject, Mr. Pitt replied, that the application was such, as upon a cursory view, seemed improper to be complied with; but that government had not yet sufficiently digested their inquiries upon the subject, and that when they had, they would state the result to the consideration of the house. Mr. Orde and Mr. Windham lamented that the topic had even been mentioned in that public manner. It might lead to very great inconvenience, and the price of corn might rise so suddenly, as to produce all the ill effects of a scarcity at home. They wished government had done whatever to them appeared proper, and had afterwards applied to parliament for a bill of indemnity. As the subject appeared to be of such a nature as by no means to admit of suspence, Mr. Pitt, on the following day, presented the minutes of the examination taken by the privy council, and named a committee of fifteen persons to take the question into consideration. The committee, after retiring, came to a resolution, that from a comparative view of the prices of wheat and flour in France and England, twenty thousand sacks of flour ought not to be exported.

On the 11th of August, the session of parliament was concluded by a speech delivered from the lord chancellor, in the name of the sovereign, in which it was observed, that, though the good offices of himself and his allies had not been effectual for restoring general tranquillity to Europe, the king had the satisfaction of perceiving that the farther extension of hostilities had been prevented, and that the aspect of affairs continued to promise to this country the uninterrupted enjoyment of the blessings of peace (r).

By intelligence from the East, it appeared that lord Cornwallis had totally abolished the slave trade in Bengal, and had issued a proclamation declaring, "That all persons who may hereafter be found either directly or indirectly concerned therein, shall be prosecuted in the supreme court; and, if a British subject, shall, on conviction, be dispatched to Europe. A reward of one hundred rupees is offered for discovering any offender against the proclamation, and fifty rupees more for every person who is delivered from slavery, or illegal confinement, in consequence of such discovery."

The parliament which had been elected in 1784, met for its last session on the 21st of January, 1790. In the speech from the throne, his majesty informed them, that since the last meeting, the continuance of the war upon the continent, and the internal situation of different parts of Europe, had produced events which had engaged his most serious attention. That he received continual assurances of the pacific disposition of foreign powers towards this country; and experienced great consolation in reflecting on the happiness we enjoyed in the increasing advantages of peace, and the uninterrupted possession of those invaluable blessings, which we derived from our excellent constitution. Towards the conclusion, he mentioned the order of council which had been issued with a view to the apprehended scarcity of corn, which measure, as it exceeded the legal authority vested in the executive power, was taken into the early consideration of parliament, and provided for by an act of indemnity passed for that purpose.

The next object of discussion which engaged the house this session, was the augmentation of the income of the speaker. His salary, exclusive of services of plate, and other incidental advantages, amounted to three thousand pounds per annum. Mr. Hussey opposed this augmentation as tending to increase the influence of the crown; and particularly complained of that part of the motion, by which it was supposed the additional salary would be taken out of the sinking fund, and not out of the civil list. It was intended to raise the income of the speaker's office to the annual amount of five thousand pounds, which sum Mr. Burke stated as being even then insufficient; and in this opinion the house so completely coincided, that an amendment for increasing the specific sum of six thousand pounds, was carried by a majority of more than five to one.

A topic which called forth an effort of ability, was the motion of Mr. Sheridan for a repeal of the act of the preceding year, subjecting the manufacturers of tobacco to the survey of the excise. The manufacturers were heard by their counsel, and a considerable body of evidence was adduced, to prove the allegation which had been stated while the act itself was in progress, that the survey of the excise was inapplicable to the manufacture of tobacco. Mr. Sheridan introduced his motion on the 16th of April, and in a train of the most forcible evidence endeavoured to set forth all the enormities with which the collection of the excise was attended (s). Mr. Sheridan's motion was, however, negatived; ayes one hundred and forty-seven, noes one hundred and ninety-one. The object of the petitioners being thus disposed of, Mr. Pitt introduced, as he had promised, a bill to explain and amend the exceptionable clauses of the bill of the preceding year.

forced to dance by the terror of the lash, and sometimes by the actual use of it. "I," said one of the witnesses, "was employed to dance the men, while another person danced the women." And it might also be observed with respect to food, that instruments were sometimes carried out in order to force them to eat, which was the same sort of proof how much they enjoyed themselves in this instance also. With respect to their singing, it consisted of songs of lamentation on their departure, which, while they sung, they were always in tears. That he might not trust, however, too much to any sort of description, Mr. Wilberforce called the attention of the house to one species of evidence, which was infallible. Death was a witness that could not deceive them. It would be found upon an average of all the ships upon which evidence had been given, that, exclusively of such as perished before they sailed, not less than twelve and a half per cent. died in the passage. Besides these, the Jamaica reports stated, that four and a half per cent. expired upon shore before the day of sale, which was only a week or two from the time of their landing; one-third more died in the seasoning, and this in a climate exactly similar to their own, and where, as some of the witnesses pretended, they were healthy and happy. The diseases, however, that they contracted on ship-board, the astringents and washes that were employed to hide the wounds, and make them up for sale, were a principal cause of this mortality. The negroes were not purchased at first except in perfect health, and the sum of the different casualties taken together, produced a mortality of above fifty per cent.

(r) The 19th of November announced the completion of the greatest object of internal navigation in this kingdom. The Severn was united to the Thames by an intermediate canal ascending by Stroud, through the vale of Chalford, to the height of three hundred and forty-three feet, by forty-locks; there entering a tunnel through the hill Sapertra, for the length of two miles and three furlongs, and descending by twenty-two locks, it joined the Thames near Lechlade.

(s) While Mr. Sheridan was speaking on this subject, he held in his hand a book, which contained only ten acts of parliament for enforcing the collection of the revenue by excise; and he would venture to declare, he said, that in no age or country had the blackest despotism pursued measures more tyrannical, cruel, and oppressive, than were to be found in that book. He further observed, that in the reign of Charles II. when the system began to appear, an excise officer could not break into a house, without an information upon oath, without a warrant from a justice of peace, and the presence of a constable; and no house, even with all these precautions, could be entered by an exciseman in the night. By degrees all these barriers, erected for the protection of liberty, were beaten down. There were certain cases in which the trader was admitted to appeal to trial by jury; but even here the tradesman and the exciseman did not go into court upon equal terms. If goods were seized, the owner was obliged to prove that they had paid the duty: but the officer was not obliged to prove that they were seizable. The officer could bring his action within three years, the trader within three months. The latter was compelled to give notice in writing of the grounds on which he intended to proceed. He was restrained at the time of trial from entering into any fresh evidence; and after all, though the jury on finding the conduct of the officer to be vexatious, malicious, and oppressive, should give the trader five thousand pounds damages, yet if the judge should certify that there was probable ground for the seizure, these damages might not amount to two-pence.

One of the financial measures of the preceding session had been the introduction of a tontine, or scheme of annuity with benefit of survivorship. This measure had failed in the execution, the numbers of subscribers being extremely few; and Mr. Pitt accordingly found it necessary at this time to amend his original proposition, by granting to the subscribers an option of exchanging the shares of their tontine for an equivalent amount of long annuity for the term of sixty-nine years.

The motion for the repeal of the Corporation and Test acts came on again this session. The efforts upon the present occasion were more animated than those which had been made upon the two former; the dissenters had prevailed upon Mr. Fox to undertake the introduction of the intended motion: and the clergy of the church of England, alarmed perhaps at the rapid downfall of the pecuniary and territorial eminence of the Gallican church, strenuously exerted themselves to keep alive and diffuse a spirit of opposition, against the encroachment that they imagined was intended upon their exclusive privileges. The question was discussed in the house of commons on the 2nd of March. When the house divided upon the question there appeared, ayes one hundred and five, noes two hundred and ninety-four.

A few days after, a motion was made by Mr. Flood for leave to bring in a bill, on the subject of the equal representation of the people in parliament. This topic had met with a considerable degree of attention from the people towards the close of the American war. Associations had been formed, and petitions originated, for the purpose of obtaining an amendment of the constitution; but, as the immediate cause of the discontent was removed, the spirit of reform subsided, and the last attempt that was made upon the subject, with less hope of success than the instances that had preceded, was upon the motion of Mr. Pitt in 1785. The question had been forgotten by the nation at large; and men of extensive property and hereditary wealth conceived themselves to have too obvious an interest, in preserving the inequality, not anxiously to exert themselves to stifle so dangerous a spirit. Mr. Flood began with informing the house of a truth, which but from a confidence in their virtue, as he said, he should not have dared to have uttered; that they were not the adequate representatives of the people. That they were the legal representatives he admitted: nay, he would go farther, and say, that they were a highly useful and honourable council, a council which in any other government of Europe, would be a great acquisition. But, to the honour of our country, the British constitution entitled us to something better. Representation, he said, was the great arcanum and wise mystery of our government, by which it excelled all the states of antiquity (u). Mr. Flood's proposition was, that one hundred members should be added to the present house of commons, to be elected by a new and numerous body of electors, the resident freeholders in every county. It was on all hands admitted, that every individual in this country paid upon an average fifty shillings per annum to the revenue. The master or father of a family coutributed in proportion for himself and all its members. Who shall say, that this class of men ought to be confounded with the rabble? Who should dare to say, that they ought to be proscribed from franchise? They maintained the affluence of the rich, the dignity of the noble, and the majesty of the crown; they supported our fleets and our armies. Could we deny them the right to protect their liberty? But, so great was the clamour against Mr. Flood's hypothesis, that, borne down by a torrent of ministerialists, he at length consented to withdraw his proposition.

The propriety of continuing the slave trade was again discussed in this session. Early in the year 1790, Mr. Wilberforce revived his proposition, and exerted his eloquence with considerable weight against this degrading species of commerce, which was, however, defended by Mr. Jenkinson, colonel Tarleton, and several other members. The evidence of the planters not being completed, he moved, that the remainder of the witnesses should be examined by a select committee, and not by the house at large. This proposition was opposed by the majority of the persons interested, upon the ground that there was no precedent for referring so important a question to a select committee. The motion, however, was voted without a division, and the examination of witnesses proceeded. The evidence on the part of the trade concluded about the 23rd of April. Mr. Wilberforce now moved, that evidence should be heard on the part of the abolition. But, upon this occasion, the partizans of the trade changed their ground, and as eagerly called for an immediate decision, as they had before avoided it. It was said, that during the two last years, the enthusiasm upon the present question both in and out of the house had greatly abated.

The two members for Liverpool differed in some degree in their sentiments upon the present question. Lord Penrhyn was for pressing the subject to an immediate decision, while Mr. Gascoyne was willing to allow three weeks to the friends of the abolition, to collect their witnesses: their impatience, however, was overruled by the sense of the house. In the mean time, the reinforcements they had gained, encouraged them to become more adventurous; and upon the revisal of sir William Dolben's bill, for limiting the number of slaves to be transported in each slave ship, they proposed an amendment to increase the number in proportion to the tonnage of the ships, without ascertaining, as had hitherto been done, the extent of these superfices. This amendment was carried in a thin house on the 26th of May; ayes twenty-three, noes eighteen. But the planters were not suffered to retain their advantage; and on the next day the amendment was rejected upon the report; ayes ninety-five, noes sixty-nine.

Mr. Fox, in the course of the session, recalled the attention of the house, to a pledge voted in the year 1788, that "they would early in the next session take into consideration the government proper to be established in Canada." The next session, as he observed, had not properly commenced till March, and it was owing to that circumstance that the business had been suffered to pass at that time without discussion. But he conceived that it was incumbent upon ministers, after so long a delay, to proceed to something decisive in the present year. Mr. Grenville, secretary of state, undertook to shew that the delay was not ascribable to any negligence in him. He had not been appointed to his present office till July 1789. With great application, he had been able, in about three months from that time, to study the subject, to digest his own opinions respecting it, to compare them with the opinions of the other members of the cabinet, and to mature the whole into the form of a bill, such as he thought proper to be submitted to the consideration of parliament. This business being completed, he sent out his draught to lord Dorchester, governor of Canada, for his judgement. Unfortunately, the packet in which it was conveyed, did not perform its voyage in the usual time, in consequence of which lord Dorchester's answer was not yet received. It was impossible, therefore, to proceed farther in the business in the present session.

The business of the session was approaching to a conclusion, when, on the 5th of May, a new and unexpected transaction was submitted to the consideration of parliament. It consisted in certain hostilities committed by the Spaniards upon the north-western coast of America, for which satisfaction had been demanded and refused; and which of consequence, were considered as rendering an armament necessary, to induce the Spaniards to make a compensation for the injury they had committed. A small association of British merchants resident in the East Indies, had early in 1786, formed the project of opening a trade to this part of the world, for the purpose of supplying the Chinese market with furs. The principal point towards which these expeditions were directed, was Port Nootka, or King George's Sound; and the adventurers, finding their traffic advantageous, endeavoured in 1788, to secure to themselves a permanent settlement; at the same time that the shipping employed in this expedition, was only from two to four small vessels. The Spaniards, jealous of the intrusion of the English into a part of the world, which they seemed to regard as their exclusive property; dispatched a Spanish frigate of twenty-six guns, from the province of Mexico, for the purpose of annihilating this commerce. The Spanish frigate arrived in May, 1789, and captured two English vessels in the following July, at the same time taking possession of the little settlement and fort, which had been formed upon the coast. This (u) In the course of his speech Mr. Flood observed, that the freeholders, who originally included the whole property of the country, now constituted only a small part of it. What was worse, the majority of the representatives who decided for the whole, and acted for eight millions of people, were chosen by a number of electors, not exceeding six or eight thousand.

transaction

transaction was first notified to the government by the Spanish ambassador, resident at the court of London, who at the same time demanded, that measures should be taken by the English government, to prevent the inhabitants from frequenting these coasts, which were alledged to have been previously occupied by the subjects of Spain. In their remonstrance they even pretended that the whole coast from Cape Horn to the sixtieth degree of northern latitude, belonged to their sovereign. Complaints were made by the British court against this outrageous conduct, and satisfaction required; and, to enforce a demand in which the king of Spain was not inclined to acquiesce, naval preparations were expedited. Both houses offered to support his majesty on the occasion; and, though many were of opinion that the object was too trivial for a cause of war, the majority of the public were advocates for vigorous proceedings. By the answer from the court of Spain, it appeared that the captured vessels and their crews had been set at liberty by the viceroy of Mexico, on the supposition, as he declared, that nothing but an ignorance of the rights of Spain, could have encouraged the individuals of other nations to attempt establishments upon that coast, and in conformity to his previous instructions to shew all possible regard to the British flag. No farther satisfaction was either made or afforded, and a direct claim was set up by the court of Spain to the exclusive rights of sovereignty, navigation, and commerce in the territories and coasts of that part of the world.

Whether Spain was seeking a pretence for hostilities, by this unexpected transaction, we cannot pretend to determine. Charles the Third, their late sovereign, died in December 1788, and consequently before we can impute a premeditated intention of hostility, we must suppose an absolute coincidence of views between him and Charles the Fourth, his successor.

The claim of the court of Spain was certainly the most absurd and exorbitant that could be imagined; it originated in no treaty, and was indefinite in its extent. If we submitted to it, we must expect to be deprived of our South Sea fishery, a commerce which promised to afford us the most considerable advantages. Mr. Fox, in a debate on this subject, declared, that no man felt a warmer resentment in the unprovoked aggression of the court of Spain, or was more fully persuaded of the necessity of an immediate and vigorous armament than he was. It was now hardly a fortnight since the minister had expatiated on the flourishing state of the finances, and in no part of his argument did he seem more confident, than in the assurance he had given the house of the probable continuance of peace; yet at the moment that Mr. Pitt was vaunting of the resources of the country, he must have known that Spain had seized upon British ships, made prisoners of the crews, and confiscated the property they contained. Mr. Fox then moved, that there should be laid before the house, the intelligence which had been obtained concerning the captured ships, and such information as had been received concerning the armament in the Spanish ports, together with the dates of that information. The first of these motions was carried, and the second passed in the negative, it being alledged that the publication of such an account was calculated to betray the channel through which the intelligence had been obtained. On the 10th, Mr. Pitt moved for a vote of credit to the amount of one million sterling. In the mean time opposition obtained information which they deemed credible, that the first notification of the Spanish ambassador had passed so long ago as the 10th of the preceding February; and this circumstance they were desirous to ascertain in an authentic form, as it appeared to them materially to criminate the conduct of administration. In the mean time, Mr. Pitt observed, that he had not understood the communication of the Spanish ambassador as included in the intelligence moved for, by Mr. Fox, or he should certainly have opposed the granting that intelligence; of consequence the other side of the house had no reason to flatter themselves, that this communication would be produced together with the other papers. Accordingly, a distinct motion was shortly after brought forward by Mr. Grey, for the purpose of obtaining it. It was necessary, he said, to obtain information, that it might be seen whether we had been hurried on to the eve of war by the rashness, the credulity, and the inattention of ministers, or whether it had arisen from unavoidable circumstances, and such as no human foresight could have prevented. Mr. Pitt had been acquainted with the unjust and insulting conduct of Spain for no less than three months. His conduct had therefore been unwarrantable, in holding out to the public the ideas which had accompanied his opening of the budget; and he ought to ask pardon of the parliament and of the nation. Mr. Lambton seconded the motion, and deprecated the wantonly precipitating the nation in hostilities. The house divided upon the question, ayes one hundred and twenty, noes two hundred and thirteen. A motion was then made for the date of the paper only, and likewise rejected.

On the 10th of June the king terminated the session by a speech from the throne. He said, that he had not hitherto received the answer of the court of Madrid. He entertained the strongest desire for the maintenance of peace, upon just and honourable grounds; but under the present circumstances he felt it necessary to proceed with vigour in the armament. He had received the most unequivocal assurances of the support of his allies on this interesting occasion; and he trusted their mutual good understanding would be productive of the happiest effects. The king proceeded to acquaint parliament of his intention immediately to dissolve them, at the same time expressing a deep and grateful sense of their loyalty and constitutional principles.

On the 13th, the court of Spain delivered a memorial to Mr. Fitzherbert, his Britannic majesty's ambassador at Madrid, in which the Spanish court endeavoured to justify their proceedings at Nootka. To this memorial Mr. Fitzherbert delivered a spirited answer, which drew a reply from the count de Florida Blanca on the 18th. However, this affair was brought to a conclusion on the 24th of July; when a declaration (v) and counter-declaration was signed at Madrid between the Spanish minister and the British ambassador (w).

The new parliament assembled on the 25th of November, (v) Besides the particulars which we have already mentioned, the declaration provided, that the English should not sail or carry on their fisheries, either in the north or south Pacific, within the space of ten leagues from the coasts occupied by the subjects of Spain, and should not form any settlements to the southward of the eastern and western coasts of South America, which were already in Spanish occupancy; but might land in those southern districts, and erect temporary huts for their fisheries. Respecting the territory of Nootka, and other parts situated to the northward of the districts occupied by the Spaniards, it was stipulated, that if individuals of either nation should have formed settlements since April 1789, or should hereafter form such colonial arrangements, the subjects of both nations should have free access, and might trade without any kind of molestation.

(w) On the same day the following authentic paper appeared in the London Gazette:

DECLARATION.

"His Britannic majesty having complained of the capture of certain vessels belonging to his subjects in the port of Nootka, situated on the north-west coast of America, by an officer in the service of the king: the undersigned counsellor and principal secretary of state to his majesty, being thereto duly authorized, declares, in the name and by the order of his said majesty, that he is willing to give satisfaction to his Britannic majesty for the injury of which he has complained; fully persuaded that his said Britannic majesty would act in the same manner towards the king, under similar circumstances; and his majesty farther engages to make full restitution of all the British vessels which were captured at Nootka, and to indemnify the parties interested in those vessels, for the losses which they shall have sustained, as soon as the amount thereof shall have been ascertained.

"It being understood that this declaration is not to preclude or prejudice the ulterior discussion of any right which his majesty may claim to form an exclusive establishment at the port of Nootka.

(Signed) (L. S.) "Le Compte de Florida Blanca."

N. B. The counter-declaration, signed by Alleyne Fitzherbert, would be superfluous here.

In March accounts were received at the admiralty of a mutiny on board the Bounty armed ship, captain Bligh, in the South Sea. The ship sailed from England in the autumn of 1787, on a voyage to the Society Islands, for bread fruit trees. The Bounty had made good the object of her voyage, so far as to have received on board a great number of trees; and there was every prospect of their being capable of preservation. The ship thus laden, quitted Otaheite on the 4th of April, 1789, and every thing like good order was supposed to prevail on board. Even the mid-watch was relieved, without the least apparent disorder; but, at day-break, on the 28th, the cabin of captain Bligh was forcibly entered by the officer of the watch, assisted by three others, who dragged him instantly on the deck, menacing his life if he attempted to speak. His endeavours to bring back the conspirators to their duty proved of no avail. Each of the desperadoes was armed with a drawn cutlass, or fixed bayonet, and all their musquets were avowed to be charged. Captain Bligh saw, when he came upon deck, several of the crew, and most of the officers pinioned; the ship's boat was let over her side, and all who were not on the part of the conspirators, to the number of eighteen, besides the captain, were committed to the boat, with an inconsiderable quantity of provisions and water. One of the victims secured a compass and a quadrant, as they were stepping into the boat; and the mutineers, after giving them a cheer, stood away, as they pretended, for Otaheite.

The

ber, and on the following day his majesty opened the session by a speech from the throne. He began with testifying his satisfaction that the differences with the court of Spain had been amicably terminated. He informed the parliament, that since the last session, a foundation had been laid for pacification between Austria and the Porte, and for adjusting the dissentions in the Netherlands. He remarked, that a separate peace had taken place between Russia and Sweden; but as the war still continued between the former of these powers and the Porte, he intimated an intention of exerting the influence of Great Britain in restoring general tranquillity. On the 30th, an address was moved and carried without a division.

About this period a very important business engaged the attention of the British legislature; it was respecting a continuation of the war which had for some time been carried on between the subjects of his Britannic majesty in the East Indies, and Tippoo Sultan. The origin of the war may be thus briefly stated. The rajah of Travancour having purchased of the Dutch the ports of Cranganore and Jacottah, refused to comply with the demand of the sultan Tippoo, who, declaring himself the feudal sovereign of that part of the coast, had insisted on the renunciation of the agreement (x).

Mr. Hippesley proposed, that copies of the correspondence relative to the attack of Tippoo Sultan on the lines of Travancour, should be laid before the house. He supported his motion by a statement of the particulars, and insisted principally on the ancient feudal claim of the Sultans of Mysore to the forts of Cranganore, &c. on the pacific intentions of Tippoo, and on the report of his offer to submit the dispute to an equitable arbitration. He considered the purchase of the fort by the rajah of Travancour, as the effect only of unwarrantable ambition, and as a fair cause of uneasiness and complaint to the neighbouring powers. Travancour he admitted to be the ally of Great Britain, who had certainly guarantied all our lawful possessions: but he asserted that it was a most mischievous principle, that we were bound to protect her in every ambitious scheme for the extension of dominion, whether by purchase or otherwise. The native powers, he asserted, neither were, nor could be, radically friendly to the English. Little dependence was to be placed upon the Nizam or the Mahrattas: both these powers were notorious for their perfidy. However flourishing our force in India, there was reason to believe that Tippoo had kept equal pace with our improvement. He had a force of one hundred and fifty thousand men, a large corps of Europeans, well officered, an admirable artillery, well served. He had a revenue of five millions sterling, and a treasury of eight or nine millions. To these resources we had to oppose an exhausted treasury, and a tottering credit. Mr. Hippesley deprecated a war in India, and entered into a forcible detail of the difficulties and miseries which would attend it in that part of the world.

Mr. Francis supported Mr. Hippesley's reasoning, by shewing that it had ever been considered by all good statesmen, that to increase our territories in India was a destructive policy to this country. Between the Nizam and Tippoo there subsisted a mutual jealousy, by means of which they might be prevented from employing their power to the prejudice of our settlements. The Mahrattas again were the most formidable power in India; and on this account it would be dangerous to extirpate Tippoo, even were it in our power, as he served particularly to maintain the balance of India. Mr. Fox observed, that the extirpation of Tippoo would not be a politic measure: however he might detest his vices, with the Mysore country, we ought to be friendly, as it was a strong barrier between the most powerful states of India and our settlements. Mr. Pitt, Mr. D. Scott, and colonel Macleod, supported the necessity of the war, and represented Tippoo as a merciless tyrant. The question was, however, carried in favour of the production of the papers.

On the 28th of February, Mr. Hippesley renewed his former motion on the Indian war; but his ill state of health only permitted him to move the reading of the acts of parliament and resolutions of the house of commons, which prohibit the British governors in India from entering into offensive war. The reading of these was followed by that of several extracts from the correspondence of the government and council of Fort St. George. After the reading of these papers, Mr. Francis rose at the request of Mr. Hippesley, and in a very able speech explained the causes of the war, which he entirely attributed to the policy of the Dutch, and the ambition and the imprudence of the rajah of Travancour. He said it was a mistake to suppose that a war in India did not affect the best interests of Great Britain; for India did not possess the means of supporting the war for a single hour, but by incurring debts which must be paid by England. He censured the appointment of a military officer, over the immense civil as well as military government of Bengal, observing that the preservation of peace could not be the predominant passion of men educated in a camp. From a civil to a military, from a military to an arbitrary government, the gradations are easy, and the progress rapid. The same facts which counteract principles to-day, will be precedents to-morrow, and principles the day after. He endeavoured to shew that the rajah was the aggressor, in making what Mr. Francis termed a collusive purchase from the Dutch: the aggressor, he said, should alone be answerable for his aggression: and as to the forts themselves, they were allowed to be of no use or importance, and ought in fact to be demolished. He pressed the necessity of preserving the balance of power in India, by keeping Tippoo as a counterpoise to the Mahrattas: and quoted the authority of Mr. Dupré, Mr. Hastings, lord Clive, and several others. Mr. Francis concluded with a series of motions, the object of which was to censure the origin, and prevent the prosecution of the war.

Mr. Fox reprobated the treaties which had been entered into with the Nizam and the Mahrattas for the extirpation of Tippoo. At a time when the enlightened policy of all Europe led them to renounce their offensive alliances, we were pursuing this disgraceful system in India. The rajah, he asserted, was the aggressor even to us, by purchasing the forts contrary to our advice. But supposing Tippoo to have been the aggressor, what right had we to ask for more than adequate satisfaction? We censured his conduct, but did not look at the injustice of our own. He professed to have a claim upon Cranganore, and aimed at recovering his right. But what do we? We carry the war into the center of his dominions, extirpate him and divide his territories.

Mr. Wilberforce, lord Fielding, and the solicitor general, supported the conduct of administration, and Mr. Francis's motions were negatived. Not satisfied, however, with this triumph, Mr. Dundas, on the 2nd of March following, moved three resolutions approving of the Indian war, and of the conduct of lord Cornwallis, which were carried without a division. The expediency of the war was debated upon nearly similar principles in the house of lords, on the 11th of April; but the debate ended only in the triumph of ministers; as lord Grenville, before the house broke up, moved three resolutions, similar to those which had been moved in the commons, approving of the conduct of lord Cornwallis, &c. which were carried by a great majority.

The captain in this dreadful situation, found his boatswain, carpenter, gunner, surgeon's mate, two midshipmen, and one master's mate, Mr. Nelson the botanist, and a few inferior officers, among those who were likely to share his fate. After a short consultation, it was deemed expedient to put back to the Friendly Islands; and, accordingly, they landed on one of these, in hopes they might improve their small stock of provisions, on the 30th of April; but they were driven off by the natives two days after, and pursued with such hostility, that one man was killed and several wounded. It was then deliberated whether they should return to Otaheite, and throw themselves on the clemency of the natives; but the apprehension of falling in with the Bounty determined them, with one assent, to make the best of their way to Timor. To effect this enterprise, astonishing to relate, they calculated the distance near four thousand miles; and in order that their wretched supply of provisions might endure till they reached the place of destination, they agreed to apportion their food to one ounce of bread and one gill of water a day for each man. They received no other nourishment till the 5th or 6th of June, when they made the coast of New Holland, and collected a few shell fish; and with this scanty relief, they held on their course to Timor, which they reached on the 12th, after being forty-six days in a crazy open boat, too confined in dimensions to suffer any of them to lie down for repose, and without the least awning to protect them from the rain, which almost incessantly fell for forty days. A heavy sea and squally weather, for great part of their course augmented their misery. The governor of this settlement, which belongs to the Dutch, afforded them every succour. They remained here to recruit their strength and spirits till the 20th of August, when they procured a vessel to carry them to Batavia, which they reached on the 2nd of October, and thence captain Bligh, with two of the crew, embarked for the Cape of Good Hope, and the rest were preparing to follow as soon as a passage could be obtained. Captain Bligh reached the Cape about the middle of December: and soon after took his passage for England, which he reached on the evening of the 13th of March, 1790, and on the day following he arrived in London.

(x) To enforce submission, Tippoo assaulted the lines of Travancour; but his troops were repelled with loss and disgrace. In the following year he renewed his his attack, and dispossessed the rajah of his capital, and other parts of his territories.

The cause of toleration received an accession this year, which must be peculiarly grateful to the friends of freedom. As the Romish church was the grand terror in the first ages of reformation, we cannot be astonished that our statute book should be loaded with the most rigorous edicts directed against the professors of that faith; and though in 1710 some of these were removed, yet in 1791, in Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, we find not less than seventy pages entirely occupied with the enumeration of the penal statutes in force against the Roman Catholics. That such laws should have been framed in times of difficulty and danger, in times when the church of Rome flourished in all the vigour of temporal power, and urged her authority by all the rigours of persecution, is not surprising; but it is surprising that they should have been suffered to remain in force for centuries of peace and tranquillity, when the power of the pope is annihilated even in countries professing his religion, and when all noxious principles of that faith are disavowed by its professors. A reform in the penal statutes became the more necessary, since, in the course of the year 1790, a large body of Catholic dissenters had formally protested against the temporal power of the pope, against his assumed authority of releasing men from their civil obligations, or dispensing with the sacredness of oaths. It was upon these principles, and supported by these arguments, that Mr. Mitford moved on the 21st of February, for a committee of the whole house, to enable him "to bring in a bill to relieve, upon conditions and under restrictions, persons called protesting Catholic dissenters, from certain penalties and disabilities, to which papists, or persons professing the popish religion are by law subject." This bill, Mr. Mitford added, would be similar to that which had passed in Ireland some years since; and as no ill consequences had resulted in a country where the Roman Catholics were so much more numerous than in this, he should hope the house would see no impropriety in the proposition; and the motion passed unanimously. On the 21st of March, the house resolved itself into a committee on Mr. Mitford's proposal, and the bill proceeded through its several stages without opposition.

Early in the present session Mr. Wilberforce gave notice of an intended motion for appointing a committee for receiving and examining evidence on the abolition of the slave trade, and on the 4th of February he submitted a motion to that effect, which was opposed by colonel Tarleton and others, on the frivolous ground that there were many other objects on which we might more properly exercise our philanthropy. After a short debate, the motion of Mr. Wilberforce for a committee above stairs was put and carried. It was not, however, till the 18th of April, that the business was in such a degree of forwardness as to enable Mr. Wilberforce to press for the abolition; when he noticed, among other things, the beneficial effects that might result from a fair and open commerce with Africa, which was capable of producing the most desirable commodities. He said, let the fate of his motion be what it might, he was satisfied that "the public had already abolished the slave trade." Supported by this consideration, he should continue to persevere, and would never abandon the object till he had accomplished it. He concluded with moving, "That the chairman be instructed to move for leave to bring in a bill to prevent the further importation of African negroes into the British colonies (y)." The motion was, however, negatived by a majority of seventy-five!

On the 28th of March, a message was delivered from his majesty, importing, that his endeavours, in conjunction with those of his allies, to effect a pacification, not having proved successful, his majesty thought it requisite to add weight to his representations, by making some further augmentation of his naval force. As soon as Mr. Pitt had moved, "That the message be taken into consideration on the morrow," Mr. Fox deplored the circumstance of their having fallen into a situation so unfortunate and so unexpected. He asked the chancellor of the exchequer, whether he meant only to move a simple address of thanks to his majesty for the communication, or whether he meant to include in the vote, an approbation of the measure? Mr. Pitt said, in reply, that a vote of supplies would be included in an answer on the message. The day following, the debate came on, when several weighty arguments were used in opposition to the armament against Russia: the question, however, was carried in favour of the address, by two hundred and twenty-eight votes against one hundred and thirty-five.

The attention of the house was again called to this important subject on the 11th of April, by Mr. Grey, who said, that he intended to introduce a motion for the committee on the state of the nation; but having understood from high authority, that an objection would be taken against such a committee, he thought proper to wave that object, and to come before the house directly with the following propositions. He then brought forward eight resolutions, which he supposed might have a tendency to prevent the melancholy events which must naturally attend a war, and point out a road to tranquillity among the seemingly dissatisfied parties. These resolutions were opposed by several able speakers on the side of the minister, and as ably supported by some of the first orators in the house. At length, after a considerable debate, Mr. Grey's resolutions were negatived by a majority of eighty.

The question was agitated a third time on the 15th of April, on two motions being made by Mr. Baker, the first expressing it as the duty of the house, before they proceed to any additional burthens on their constituents, to enquire into the justice and necessity of the objects: the second stating, that no information had been given to the house on the present occasion. Mr. Baker's motions, however, were both negatived by a majority of ninety-two.

The business of the session being concluded, his majesty proceeded to the house on the 10th of June, when he delivered a speech from the throne, expressing his satisfaction, that a mode had been adopted for defraying the expences of last year, without any permanent addition to the public burdens. He expressed his regret at being unable to acquaint them with the result of the negociation for peace between Russia and the Porte; thanked the commons for the supplies, and prorogued the parliament to the 16th of August.

A short time after the rising of the parliament, the nation was disgraced by a series of outrages, which almost exceeded any thing of the kind which had ever been heard of; and which, for the space of four days, spread terror and alarm through the large and opulent town of Birmingham, and the adjacent country. A vast difference of sentiment concerning the French revolution prevailed among the higher orders of society in this country; and the same difference of sentiment seemed to pervade the other classes. This difference of opinion at length broke out in a settled hatred; and considerable pains were taken to excite the passions and prejudices of the populace against the asserters of Gallic liberty. On the other hand, a considerable body of the whig party in Great Britain, rejoiced in the emancipation of a neighbouring nation from slavery, and flattered themselves, that they saw in the establishment of the French constitution, not only the annihilation of despotism in that country, but the commencement of a new system of politics in Europe, the basis of which was peace, happiness, and mutual concord. In many of the larger towns of Great Britain, associations were formed for the celebration of that event, by the anniversary dinners on the 14th of July; but the opposite party were not indifferent spectators of these proceedings. The populace were inflamed by the most injurious insinuations conveyed in journals and pamphlets: the friends of the French revolution were stigmatized as determined republicans; and the act of joining in a convivial meeting on the odious 14th of July, was represented as an attempt to overturn the British constitution in church and state. Notwithstanding the pains which had been taken to lessen these associations in the eyes of the public, the meeting in London consisted of not less than one thousand five hundred respectable gentlemen, many of them literary characters of high reputation and distinguished virtue. As rumours, however, had been spread to the disadvantage of the meeting, and the populace appeared to collect in a tumultuous manner, round the Crown and Anchor Tavern, where the meeting was held, the company dispersed at an early hour.

(y) Mr. Fox in speaking upon this occasion instanced two shocking acts of inhumanity. In one of the French islands a poor negro having run away; to prevent his repeating the offence, and indeed as a common punishment for such offences, the planter ordered the surgeon to amputate his leg: the surgeon, who had more humanity than his master, refused. "You refuse," said the planter; "then what you decline as an act of friendship to me, I will force you to do as an act of duty;" and instantly broke the leg of the poor wretch in a most barbarous manner. The other instance occurred in an English island. As one of the witnesses, Mr. Ross, was walking along, he heard the most dreadful shrieks proceeding from a barn or outhouse. On looking in, he saw a young female tied up to a beam by her wrists, entirely naked, writhing and swinging about, while the inhuman author of her torture was applying a lighted torch to different parts of her body as they occasionally approached him!

At Birmingham, the causes of discord were more numerous than even in London. According to Dr. Priestley's statement, a violent animosity had subsisted for years between the high church party and the dissenters of that place. The religious controversies, which took place between Dr. Priestley and some of the clergy of Birmingham, greatly contributed to increase this animosity. A festive meeting in commemoration of the French revolution, was projected at Birmingham, on Thursday, the 14th of July; and on the preceding Monday, six copies of a most inflammatory and seditious hand-bill, proposing the French revolution as a model to the English, and exciting them to rebellion, were left, by some person unknown, in a public house. The views and intention of the meeting having, however, been greatly misrepresented, the majority of the gentlemen who projected it, thought proper to relinquish the scheme; notice was accordingly given to that effect; but at the instance of Mr. Russel, as it is said, the intention was revived, and the company met at the appointed time to the number of between eighty and ninety. Mr. Keir, a gentleman well known for his great attainments in chemistry, and other branches of philosophy, and a member of the established church, was placed in the chair. The gentlemen had hardly met, before the house was surrounded by a tumultuous crowd, who testified their disapprobation by hisses and groans, and by the shout of "Church and King," which became the watch-word on this occasion. At five o'clock the company dispersed; and soon afterwards, the windows in the front of the hotel were demolished, notwithstanding the appearance and interference of the magistrates. After supper, they were alarmed with the intelligence that the mob were assembled at the new dissenting meeting-house, (Dr. Priestley's,) and were threatening both the doctor and his house. The rioters soon set the meeting on fire, and nothing remained that could be consumed. The old meeting-house shared almost a similar fate, being nearly levelled with the ground. Many other scandalous outrages were committed. The day broke on the succeeding morning, only to discover the ruins which this infatuated multitude had made, and to enable them to continue their depredations. Early in the morning they were met by a party of gentlemen, who persuaded them to desist from their outrages, and even to assist in their endeavours to preserve tranquillity. About noon, however, a fresh party demolished the elegant mansion of Mr. Ryland, formerly Mr. Baskerville's, at Easy Hill. Here, as they found a profusion of liquor, a dreadful scene of intoxication ensued; and several of the wretched rioters perished in the cellars by suffocation, or by the falling in of the roof. Six, terribly bruised, were dug out of the ruins, and committed to the hospital; ten dead bodies were found, and one man remained alive in one of the vaults till the Monday following, when he worked his way out with but little injury (z). Many other elegant seats and houses were likewise destroyed, till, at length, by the arrival of the military, a period was put to their excesses. A great number of persons were taken in the act of rioting; of whom five were tried at Worcester; one of whom was found guilty and executed. At Warwick, twelve were tried, but only four received sentence of death; but upon an application from the magistrates, and some other respectable inhabitants, one of the convicts was afterwards reprieved (a).

Intelligence was received, that ministerial notes had been delivered at St. Petersburgh, by William Whitworth, Mr. Fawkener, and count Goltze, on the part of his Britannic majesty and of the king of Prussia, and by count Osterman on the part of the empress of Russia, relative to the terms of pacification between Russia and the Porte. In these notes, the ministers of his majesty and the king of Prussia agree, on the part of their respective sovereigns, that their majesties will propose to the Porte to conclude a peace with Russia, on the terms of the cession of the district of Oczakovv, from the Bog to the Dniester; her Imperial majesty engaging not to disturb the free navigation of the latter river, but to favour and protect it, (to which condition the Porte is to be equally and reciprocally bound,) and her Imperial majesty being also to restore to the Porte at the conclusion of the peace, all other conquests whatever. The minister of her Imperial majesty agrees, on the part of his sovereign, to make peace on these terms; and the ministers of his majesty and the king of Prussia agree, on the part of their respective sovereigns, that if the Porte should decline to enter into negociation on this basis, their majesties still leave the termination of the war to the course of those events to which it may lead. The preliminaries were signed at Petersburgh, on the 4th instant, by the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain, Prussia, Holland, and Russia.

On the 23rd of November, were married at St. James's, the duke and duchess of York. The ceremony was performed by the archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by the bishop of London; his majesty standing at one end of the altar, and her majesty at the other; the duke and duchess of York in the centre; the archbishop opposite to them; and the lord chancellor standing behind them; the prince of Wales next to the duchess of York, and the duke of Clarence next to the duke of York.

On the 31st of January, 1792, the king opened the session with a speech from the throne, in which he informed them of the marriage of the duke of York with the eldest daughter of the king of Prussia: he also acquainted them with the conclusion of peace between the emperor of Germany and the Porte, and between the empress of Russia and the Porte, through the mediation of the court of Great Britain. An address being moved in the house of commons, violent debates ensued, in the course of which Mr. Grey moved an amendment, "That the house, fully sensible of the evils of a procrastinated war, which must be ruinous to the finances of the company, cannot help expressing their regret that the prospects held out in the speech from the throne at the commencement of the last session have not been realized; nevertheless, that their attachment to his majesty, and their desire to support the honour of his crown, are undiminished." The debates were again renewed, and, after some altercation, the house divided on the question of amendment; ayes eighty-five, noes two hundred and nine. The original address was then moved and carried without a division (b).

On the 17th of February, the chancellor of the exchequer presented a copy of the treaty, entered into between his Britannic majesty and the king of Prussia, dated the 26th of January, on the marriage of the duke of York with the princess of Prussia. It was afterwards passed into a law. On the 7th of March, Mr. Pitt moved, "That his majesty be enabled to settle eighteen thousand pounds per annum upon his royal highness the duke of York." He further stated, that it was his majesty's intention to settle an additional sum of seven thousand pounds per annum upon his royal highness out of the Irish revenue; the additional revenue to commence July, 1791. He then moved, "That a sum of eight thousand pounds per annum, be settled upon her royal highness the duchess of York, in case she should survive. Both motions were put and carried unanimously.

(z) Among the articles consumed at Mr. Ryland's, was the body of the late Mr. Baskerville, who by will ordered he should be buried in his own house, and he was accordingly interred there. A stone closet was erected in it, where he was deposited in a standing posture. The house was afterwards sold with this express condition, that it should remain there.

(a) In the afternoon of the 2nd of February this year, the highest flood-tide appeared in the Thames that had been known for several years. Above Westminster-bridge, it overflowed the banks of the river on both sides. In Palace Yard, it was near two feet deep; it also ran into Westminster Hall, and hindered people from passing for two hours. Boats came through the passage of Old Palace Yard, from the Thames, and rowed up to Westminster Hall Gate. The inhabitants in Milbank Street, were obliged to pass to and from their houses in boats. The two Scotland Yards and Privy Gardens, Whitehall, were entirely under water, and many parts rendered impassable for two hours. Several poor people who kept small shops near the barracks in Scotland Yard, had four feet water in their shops, and their beds floating in their rooms. Westminster Hall suffered much; the water ran in at the great door for upwards of an hour, and was up to the second stair, leading to the court of King's Bench. Most of the gardens and fields between Blackfriars Road and Westminster Bridge were overflowed.

About this time a meeting of the people took place in the Champ de Mars, in France, to frame a petition for dethroning the king. Robespierre was at the head of the party. Four thousand armed men were brought against the multitude, who, without orders from their general, fired on them; many hundreds were killed and wounded.

(b) About this time the British ministry issued a proclamation, under the signature of the king, against the printing, publishing, and dispersing of wicked and seditious writings. The very rapid circulation of Thomas Payne's Rights of Man, Common Sense, &c. were supposed to have occasioned this proclamation.

On

On the 2nd of April, the order of the day was read, for the house going into a committee on the African slave trade, Mr. Hobart in the chair. Mr. Wilberforce, after an appropriate introduction, took a review of the manner in which negroes were procured in Africa; enlarged upon the disgrace which the trade brought upon our national character, from the conduct of those who were engaged in it. He then stated, that the trade, instead of being a nursery, was the grave of our seamen; and concluded with moving, "That it is the opinion of this committee, that the trade carried on by British subjects, for the purpose of obtaining slaves on the coast of Africa, ought to be abolished." And, "That the chairman be directed to move the house for leave to bring in a bill for the abolition of the slave trade."

A long debate afterwards followed, in which Mr. Dundas said, that he thought an immediate abolition would not be expedient, as it might excite the clamours of the West Indian planters, and other interested individuals; therefore he was for a gradual amendment. Mr. Fox rejected all terms of compromise in a case of flagrant injustice. Mr. Pitt expressed a wish that the trade might instantly be abolished. The majority for the gradual abolition amounted to one hundred and forty-five. Mr. Windham contended for the most speedy suppression that could be effected. After various debates and divisions, the term was limited to the first day of the year 1796. These resolutions, however, were not approved by the peers: the duke of Clarence, in particular, was zealous for the indefinite continuance of a trade which he pronounced justifiable and politic.

Mr. Fox moved on the 11th of May, for the repeal of certain penal statutes, passed in the reign of king William. He began by stating his opinion of toleration; and enforced, by a variety of arguments, the justice of the cause in which he now came forward. After enumerating a variety of acts which he meant should be included in the principle of his motion, he moved, "That the ninth and tenth of William III. be repealed, and that the said motion be referred to a committee of the whole house." Mr. Burke said, no man could be a greater advocate for proper toleration than he was; but then the sacredness of the church establishment should be the first object; and which he asserted, was one and the same thing with the state. The claims of the present petitioners were of so questionable a shape as to require much consideration. He then took a view of those persons and their professions; he asserted, that they were a set of Propagandists, with Dr. Priestley at their head, who, not satisfied with the quiet enjoyment of their own opinions, sought industriously to make proselytes of the world, and so to sap the very foundation of the most sacred of all religions, and subvert all order in society. He read various extracts from several books, written by members of the society, which, he said, indicated their projects to overturn the constitution as well as the established church; and their correspondence with the licentious clubs of France, he particularly condemned. The house divided; for Mr. Fox's motion sixty-three; against it one hundred and forty-two.

On the 15th of June, the king went to the house of lords, and after a speech, as usual, from the throne, he prorogued the parliament to the 13th of August (c).

A large body of the lower class of people assembled in the market-place at Coventry, in the month of May, and after manifesting symptoms of disorder, entered the shambles, which in a short time, they cleared of all the meat, as well as of all the utensils belonging to the butchers. The doors, shutters, fire-places, &c. were also broken down, and the remnants of wood collected to make a fire in the market-place; but the mayor, calling in some troops of the sixth regiment of dragoons, then in the town, and prudently addressing the mob, prevailed upon them to depart. On the following morning a great number of people assembled again, and seemed to threaten a further riot: the mayor himself went among them, endeavouring to dissuade them from disorders; and one or two butchers setting up a stall in the market-place, and offering their meat at reduced prices, the peace of the town was restored. On the afternoon of the following day, the people assembled again, and their threats seemed chiefly against the master shoemakers. However, through the vigilance of the magistrates, assisted by the military, the mob was dispersed, without any damage of consequence.

(c) At Kettering in Northamptonshire, on the 2nd of March, 1792, about a quarter before nine in the evening, an earthquake was felt, and at several of the neighbouring towns, which continued near thirty seconds. It was attended with no perceptibly pernicious effects, other than causing a general alarm. The shock was sensibly felt throughout the counties of Bedford, Leicester, Nottingham, Rutland, and Lincoln.

On the 29th of March, this year, died Gustavus III. of Holstein Gottorp, king of Sweden, assassinated by Ankerstrom, at the opera-house, on the 16th. He vested the whole of his authority in his brother, the duke of Sudermania, during the minority of his son. The assassin was put to the torture: after being three times exposed and flogged, having his right hand cut off, and being about to receive the fatal blow, he addressed himself to the surrounding multitude in the following words:—"I now reach the minute of deliverance, and everlasting reward. I rejoice in my deed. I have rescued my country from a tyrant, by the only means left to a slave: I know that you will bless me for the act, and my memory will be sacred in Sweden: let your gratitude to me be shewn in friendship to my children." His head was then separated from his body, which being quartered, was exposed to public view.

CHAP. IV.

THE revolution in France, which has overturned, in its consequences, the whole of Europe, now demands our particular attention, especially as the war which it occasioned continues still to rage with the utmost fury.

In July, 1789, one of the most extraordinary revolutions occurred in France that ever happened in the political world. The monarchy was overturned, and the king, being divested of his absolute authority, became one of the most limited sovereigns. He was afterwards, by a decree of the national convention, denominated king of the French. But as so great a change in the internal polity of France could not be supposed to have been effected in a short period of time, the nation, as might naturally be imagined, experienced various commotions, jealousies, and dissentions, till the king's acceptance of the new constitution in the beginning of September, 1791. We shall, however, begin our detail of the most material circumstances, with the escape of the royal family from Paris. And, accordingly, in the night between the 20th and 21st of June, 1791, the king and queen escaped from the palace of the Thuilleries in Paris, and took the route towards Mons. On the 21st, it was decreed, that all persons should be stopped from passing out of the kingdom. The king and queen were arrested at Varennes. June the 25th, it was decreed, among other things, that the king should return to the Thuilleries, under the guard of the commandant-general; and that both himself and his queen should be heard in their own defence. On the 7th of July it was decreed, that all the people of France should have a right to travel out of the kingdom, and return at their pleasure. On the first of September, the king, attended by a deputation of sixty members, went to the national assembly, and, amidst the applauses of those august senators, solemnly consecrated by oath the assent which he had given the preceding day, to the constitutional act. On the 30th of the same month, he issued a proclamation, in which he declared, "that he had accepted the constitution, and that the revolution was completed." In December following, the emperor of Germany published a manifesto, wherein he declared against France. To this manifesto, the king of the French returned a spirited answer. April the 19th, 1792, the national assembly declared war against the king of Hungary. On the 12th of May, it was decreed, "That the immense heap of papers and parchments, which relate to the late nobility, and were collected from various monasteries, &c. and deposited in the church des Grandes Augustins, shall be burned." Six hundred volumes were accordingly burned on the 19th of June. On Sunday, the 5th of August, the city of Paris was alarmed early in the morning, by an attempt made by the king to escape from the Thuilleries. Upon being recognized by a centinel, he sent for the mayor of Paris, and informed him, that he had gone out solely to take the air. The king was in the habit of a peasant. On the following day, a petition signed by several thousand persons, in the Champ de Mars, and requesting the deposition of the king, was presented to the national assembly. Long and interesting debates succeeded this important circumstance, and on the 12th of August, the assembly passed the following decree: "First, the hotel of the minister of justice shall be inhabited by the king. Second, he shall be furnished with a guard, subordinate to the mayor of Paris, and to the commandant of the national guard, who shall be answerable for his safety, and that of his family. Third, there shall be a sum of five hundred thousand livres allowed to pay his expences, until the moment of the national convention meeting." The hotel of the minister of justice not being deemed a safe place, the Temple was afterwards chosen, and the assembly passed a decree for conducting the royal family to that place. It being suspected that several persons of rank had been concerned in the robbery of the jewel office, the convention, on the 24th of September, decreed, "1. The French republic no longer acknowledges princes; 2. The national convention, in consequence, suppresses all appanages." In the beginning of September, dreadful commotions took place in Paris, on receiving intelligence of the siege of Verdun. The populace were irritated to that degree, that they forcibly entered several prisons, and slew a vast number of persons whom they suspected; among whom were the princess Lambelle, M. Montmorin, and about three hundred ecclesiastics who refused to take the oaths prescribed by the legislature. A few days after this massacre, fifty-two state prisoners, who had been confined at Orleans, were conveyed to Paris, and instantly put to death. About the close of the same month, the French opened the navigation of the Scheldt. On the 11th of December, the ci-devant king was carried to the bar of the national convention; when the reading of the act of accusation against him by Barbaroux, was followed by a long discussion, wherein much calumny was used. After he was seated, the instrument of accusation and the interrogatories were read by M. Maille; to all of which the king returned spirited answers. On the 26th, he was again taken to the bar with his counsel, when he was informed by the president, that the convention had decreed, "That he should be heard definitively that day." M. Romaine Deseze, one of the king's counsel, read his defence; which being concluded, the king addressed the convention in a short but animated speech. After long and violent debates it was decreed, "That the further discussion of the proceedings against Louis XVI. is open, and shall be continued without any other business interfering, till judgement be pronounced upon him. On the 15th of January, 1793, a profound silence having taken place, and the appeal nominal being finished, the president examined the register, and made the following report: "Of seven hundred and forty-five members that form the convention, six hundred and ninety-three have voted for the affirmative [DEATH], twenty-six are absent upon public business, twenty-six have made different declarations; but not a single person has voted for the negative." A scrutiny, however, among the votes took place, and on the 17th, the president made the following declaration: "That out of seven hundred and twenty-one votes, three hundred and sixty-six were for death, three hundred and nineteen for imprisonment, eight for a suspension of the execution of the sentence of death, till after the expulsion of the family of the Bourbons; twenty-three were for not putting him to death, unless the French territory was invaded by any foreign power, and one was for death, but with commutation of punishment." After this enumeration, the president took off his hat, and lowering his voice, said, "In consequence of this, I declare, that the punishment pronounced by the national convention against Louis Capet, is DEATH!" On the 19th, it was decreed by the national convention, that the sentence passed upon Louis XVI. should be put in execution within twenty-four hours. Three hundred and eighty voted for immediate death, and three hundred and ten for a suspension of the sentence. On the 21st the French king was guillotined in the Place de Revolution, in the thirty-eighth year of his age.

On the 13th of March, a decree of accusation was passed against general Dumourier, a very skilful officer, and four commissioners, with Bournonville, the minister at war, were sent to arrest him. Having sounded the dispositions of his army, and declared his intentions, he arrested the commissioners, whom he sent prisoners to general Clairfait, and made a temporary truce with the Austrians.

In December, 1793, the British ministry began to be alarmed at the growth of republicanism, from its rapid progress in France; and, to prevent any disorders, the Tower was put in a posture of defence, the Bank double guarded, the environs of the capital billeted with soldiery, and several regiments of cavalry ordered into the neighbourhood of London. On the 13th of the same month, his majesty repaired to the house of peers, and opened the session with a speech from the throne, breathing hostilities against France, and proposing an augmentation of the army and navy to check their proceedings, as well as to curb that spirit of tumult in this kingdom, which began to be truly alarming. A message to this effect, from his majesty, delivered to the speaker by Mr. Dundas, was read from the chair, the members being uncovered. After a debate on the subject of his majesty's message, the chancellor of the exchequer moved, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, thanking him for his most gracious communications to the house, and assuring him of their zeal and readiness to furnish that augmentation of forces required by his majesty for the purpose stated in the message."

In debating on this motion, Mr. Fox declared that he should shrink from his duty to his constituents, and to the people at large, if he did not deprecate a war with France as the greatest calamity in which this nation could be involved. The death of the French king, he considered as a disgraceful event; but he did not see the propriety of the parliament of Great Britain expressing any opinion on this public act, unless it was alledged as a ground affecting this country.

About this time, the king ordered a circular letter to be sent to the bishops, commanding them to cause collections to be made in every parish throughout England, for the relief of the French emigrant clergy; when such a vast sum of money was collected as to furnish an additional proof of the generosity and liberality of the English. A convention was also signed in April, between the kings of England and Sardinia, wherein his Britannic majesty engaged to pay two hundred thousand pounds per annum, during the continuance of the war, to the king of Sardinia.

The business of the session being closed, the king addressed the house of peers on the 21st of June, mentioning his having concerted with other powers for the effectual prosecution of the war, and flattering himself with the best prospect of a happy issue to the important contest in which we were engaged; recommending perseverance in vigorous exertions, for the restoration of peace on such terms as might be consistent with our permanent security, and with the general tranquillity of Europe. The parliament was then prorogued to the 13th of August following.

On the first of February, war against Great Britain and Holland was decreed in the French national convention; soon after which the duke of York proceeded to Holland to take the command of the British forces, destined to serve in the ensuing campaign on the continent, in conjunction with the allies against the French. After engaging in several hazardous enterprizes, the strong and important town of Valenciennes became an object of his attention, the siege of which commenced on the 14th of June.

The island of Tobago, in the West Indies, which had been ceded to Great Britain at the peace of 1763, and returned to the French by the treaty of peace in 1783, was successfully attacked by a small detachment of British forces under the command of major-general Cuyler, in April this year. The whole of the British force, destined for the reduction of this important island, consisted of about five hundred men. In this expedition, the English had three men killed, and twenty-five wounded, and the French had fifteen killed and wounded. On the 14th of May, the small islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon were also taken by the English under brigadier-general Ogilvy and captain Affleck. These islands had been ceded to the French by Great Britain, at the peace of 1763, for the purposes of curing and drying their fish.

The Nymph frigate, captain Pellew, of thirty-six guns, arrived at Portsmouth, on the 20th of June, with the Cleopatra French frigate, of the same force, which she captured on the morning of the preceding day, off the Start, after a most severe action of fifty minutes. The Cleopatra was a commodore of five other frigates, sent to protect the trade of France, which had separated from the fleet, and, on coming within hail of the Nymph, gave her three cheers, coming fairly and by consent into action. The first broadside from the French frigate cleared captain Pellew's forecastle, and towards the close of the action, the Cleopatra's wheel was shot away, and she fell on the Nymph's quarter: when the English boarded the enemy, and cut every thing before them. Upwards of seventy of the French fell in boarding, and the killed or mortally wounded in the French ship amounted to ninety. The chief captain of the Cleopatra was fatally wounded early in the action, and did not live to see his colours struck: the second captain also died of his wounds. The Nymph also suffered severely, having the boatswain, four midshipmen, and twenty-two seamen killed; and the second lieutenant, the lieutenant of marines, and twenty-two seamen and marines wounded. The Cleopatra's mizenmast was carried away about twelve feet from the deck; her jib-boom, with part of her bowspirit and head, went into the water, and her sails and rigging were shot to pieces. The Nymph was also greatly wounded in her hull and masts.

Hostilities were preparing on the part of Austria, Prussia, Sardinia, &c. and France manifested a determination to oppose the united attacks of all whom they deemed despotic sovereigns. War and desolation now commenced their ravages, and such enterprizes were achieved as threw all Europe into a consternation.

Dumourier, an officer of great military talents, succeeded to La Fayette's command, while the advance of the combined armies through the deserts of Champagne, demanded every precaution. A camp was formed at Chalons, whence Luckner was to supply the armies of Dumourier, Kellerman, and Bournonville with reinforcements, and support them in case of a defeat. Yet it was computed, at this critical time, that these three armies did not exceed forty thousand men, of whom Dumourier had seventeen thousand. Dumourier and Kellerman were separately attacked by the enemy: the assault of the latter at Dampierre, on the 20th of September, was formidable, and repelled with great skill and courage. The former ordered Chalons to be evacuated, and seized a strong position at St. Menehoud, between Chalons and Verdun: the Prussians advanced to Flans; a decisive engagement was daily expected; and the destruction of the French armies was considered as inevitable.

Such was the situation of affairs when the national convention assembled at Paris, on the 21st of September. The assembly voluntarily resigned the superintendence of public business, which had exceeded its capacity and powers, into new hands. On the first day of the meeting of the convention, the Abolition of Royalty in France was decreed by proclamation: and on the following day, it was ordered that all public acts should be dated The First Year, &c. of the French Republic. No sooner was the democracy declared, than the genuine republican spirit shone forth, in the answer given by the French to the Prussian king, refusing to treat till the enemy had evacuated the territories of the republic. A report was circulated through Europe, that the French general had laid down his arms, either from treachery, or despair; and that the Prussians had advanced within ten leagues of Paris, when they suddenly adopted the resolution of an inglorious retreat. Prussia offered to withdraw her armies, and enter into an alliance with France, on condition that due regard was shewn to the French king in the new order of affairs. This was refused: the Prussians and Austrians retreated; and France immediately commenced her career of, at least, temporary success.

The retreat of the Prussians and Austrians was followed by the re-capture of Verdun and Longwy, and the raising of the sieges of Thionville and Lisle, after a fourth part of the latter city had been destroyed by the Austrians. The invasion of Savoy was now projected. On the 21st of September, general Montesquieu entered the Savoyard territories, seized on the frontier posts and castles without resistance, and two days after took Montmelian and Chamberry; and all Savoy soon followed. Any further transactions in the south are hardly entitled to narration. Admiral Truquet, commanding a squadron in the Mediterranean, captured Nice, Villa Franca, and the fortress of Montalban, belonging to the Sardinian king.

Having thus concisely mentioned the progress of the arms of France in the south, their more surprizing success in Italy, Germany, and the Netherlands, demands attention. The king of Sardinia, having entered into the confederacy, was punished with the loss of the duchy of Savoy. The conquest of Savoy, however, was not much regarded; but when general Custine began his acquisitions in Germany, every eye was turned to the rapidity and importance of his progress, till diverted by the wonders of Dumourier. Spires yielded to the French arms on the 13th of September, and Worms soon followed. Custine, pursuing his course along the left shore of the Rhine, next captured Mentz, and afterwards Frankfort; but the latter was speedily retaken.

Towards the conclusion of October, Dumourier published his manifesto to the inhabitants of the Netherlands; declaring his intention of entering their territories to erect the tree of liberty, and deliver them from the Austrian yoke; and promising that, if they would establish the sovereignty of the people, and renounce the sway of despots, the French would become their brethren, friends, and supporters. General Dumourier had declared he would pass his Christmas at Brussels; this was looked upon as mere bombast; but he was afterwards found to have been in earnest, for that city was actually in his possession by the 14th of November. Having entered the Netherlands on the 1st or 2nd of that month, with an army of forty thousand men, and with a most formidable train of artillery, repeated engagements with the Austrian army, commanded by the duke of Saxe-Teschen, and by general Beaulieu, took place on the first five days. At length, on the 6th of November, a decisive battle was fought at Jemappes, which decided the fate of the Netherlands. After an obstinate defence, the Austrians retired in the utmost disorder: their loss in the various engagements, amounted to about four thousand killed and wounded, besides about fifteen hundred prisoners and deserters. The killed and wounded among the French did not exceed one thousand.

General Dumourier advancing, took possession of the neighbouring town of Mons. Tournay surrendered to a detachment, on the 8th of November. Dumourier proceeded to Brussels, where, after an indecisive engagement between his van and the Austrian rear, he was received with acclamations on the 14th of that month, as above noticed. Ghent, Charleroi, Antwerp, Malines or Mechlin, Louvain, Ostend, Namur; and in short, all the Austrian Netherlands, except Luxemburgh, successively followed the example of the capital. Ruremond, the principal city of Austrian Guelderland, submitted to Miranda on the 11th of December.

The city of Antwerp having yielded to the French arms, in order to conciliate the Dutch, the opening of the navigation of the Scheldt, shut up by the treaty of Munster, in 1648, was projected and ordered. The Dutch considered this measure as injurious to their trade, because Antwerp might prove a dangerous rival to Amsterdam. The first inclination manifested by Great Britain to break with France, regarded the navigation of the Scheldt. The court of St. James's declared an alliance with the Dutch, and the French formally issued a declaration of war against Great Britain.

Shortly after, Cagliari, the capital of Sardinia, was bombarded, under the command of admiral Truquet, but the admiral failed in his attempt. We have now to notice the hasty retreat and final defection of general Dumourier in the Netherlands. Soon after that general quitted Holland, and assumed the command of the disconcerted armies of Valence and Miranda, the forces of the prince of Cobourg and general Clairfait attacked him with a vigour which astonished him, he having but a few months before, driven the same troops out of France, and through the Netherlands into Germany. He beheld, with dismay, the laurels of Jemappe wither on the plains of Tirlemont.

On the 14th of March, 1793, the Imperialists advanced towards Tirlemont, and were attacked by general Dumourier, on the 15th and following days: the first attempts were successful, the Austrians' advanced posts were obliged to retire to St. Tron through Tirlemont, which they had already passed. On the 18th, a general engagement ensued, the French army being covered by Dormael, and on the right by Landen: the action continued with great obstinacy, from seven in the morning till five in the evening, when the French were obliged to fall back, and the Austrian cavalry coming up, put them entirely to flight: the loss on both sides was considerable. About this time, Dumourier described the army as in a state of the utmost disorder, and having provisions only for ten days: he said, it was impossible for him to stop the progress of the enemy, who, without amusing themselves with sieges, might, with an army of twenty thousand cavalry, lay waste and reduce to ashes all that part of the country, which lies in the vicinity of the metropolis. Such is the outline of affairs preceding the defection of that celebrated general from the republicans of France, whose conduct and not their cause, he seems to have disapproved. Convinced that no reliance was to be placed upon the majority of his army, Dumourier, with two regiments of horse, and accompanied by young Egalité, and some other officers, officers, determined to repair to the enemy at Mons. He has since appeared in Switzerland, England, &c. but hardly any country seemed inclinable to give him the least encouragement.

Amidst the accumulation of external misfortunes, France was at this period internally agitated by the most formidable insurrections in different parts; a great number of royalists assembled on the banks of the Loire, and threatened the reduction of Nantz. In the department of Vendée, they assumed the denomination of the Christian army; many skirmishes took place between these and the republican troops, in which both parties were occasionally victorious. Robespierre and Marat were now accused, in the convention, of having excited the people to murder, with an intention of aspiring to a dictatorship or triumvirate. They both answered very equivocally.

General Custine, finding Mentz closely besieged by the forces of the king of Prussia, attempted to succour it on the 19th of May, and succeeded beyond his expectation. He advanced at the head of a very numerous army, and attacked general Wurmser, whom, after a vigorous resistance, he obliged to retire beyond Queich. He afterwards, with part of his forces, attacked the Prussian corps, commanded by the hereditary prince of Hohenloe, at Carlsberg, in the duchy of Deux Ponts, when the latter, after a brave resistance, was obliged to yield to superior numbers, and abandon that important post (d).

A particular enumeration of the actions which followed, between the combined armies and the French republic, would be uninteresting. Many of them were trifling and indecisive, and the defeats and victories were so nearly equal on each side, that it could not with certainty be pronounced on which side the advantages predominated; till on the 10th of July, the governor of Condé consented to surrender that place to the Imperial forces, under the command of the prince of Wirtemberg, by whom it had been long blockaded. This was deemed a conquest of the utmost importance, Condé being one of the strongest places of the frontier, requiring only a small garrison for its defence, commanding the navigation of the Scheldt, and facilitating any future operation. This acquisition was succeeded by another of very great importance: on the 28th of the same month, the town and castle of Valenciennes surrendered to the combined army, under the command of his royal highness the duke of York (e).

His royal highness, after several less important exploits, intended on the 24th of August to attack the enemy, who were then posted at some distance from Dunkirk, in order obtain possession of the ground which it was necessary to occupy, previous to the siege of that place. The enemy hastened the execution of his design, by attacking the out-posts between the canal of Furnes and the sea. Lieutenant-general Dalton advanced with the reserve, which was encamped on that side, to their support; the enemy were repulsed, and driven with loss into the town; one piece of cannon, and a few prisoners were taken. The ardour of the troops carried them farther in the pursuit than was intended, in consequence of which they came under the cannon of the place, and sustained a considerable loss. Lieutenant-general Dalton, was killed with a cannon shot, towards the conclusion of the attack. The duke had also to lament the loss of lieutenant-colonel Eld, of the Coldstream regiment, and of other valuable men.

The position afterwards taken by the duke of York, was judicious and favourable to the besiegers. It was between the canal leading from Dunkirk to Furnes, and the sea-coast.

The Hanoverian general Freytag was fiercely attacked by the French army on the 8th of September, and compelled to retreat with great loss. That general and prince Adolphus, the younger son of George III. were made prisoners in their retreat, but were opportunely rescued by a detachment. The duke of York's right wing was harrassed by a sally; but, on this occasion, he drove the enemy back into the town. A despair of success, however, induced them to desist from the siege; and his artillery and ammunition fell into the hands of the enemy. The loss sustained was about fifteen hundred in killed and wounded, among whom were many gallant officers. His royal highness sent two battalions of Hessians to general Walmoden's support; but, finding that aid to be ineffectual, he was compelled to collect his whole force, by abandoning the position he had taken near Dunkirk. Thirty-two of the heavy guns, and part of the stores provided for the siege, were left behind, there being no possibility of carrying them off. The French were commanded by general Houchard, who is said to have been put to death by the tyranny of the convention, for suffering the duke's forces to escape destruction.

Intelligence was about this time received from admiral lord Hood, commander of his majesty's ships in the Mediterranean, that an intercourse had taken place between his lordship and the commissioners from Toulon and Marseilles; and by subsequent accounts it appeared, that the treaty relative to Toulon was brought to a conclusion; and on the 28th of August, lord Hood's fleet landed fifteen hundred men, and took possession of the batteries at the mouth of the harbour. The French fleet hauled into the inner road; and on the 29th the British fleet and the fleet of Spain, which joined the same day, anchored in the outer road of Toulon. Several declarations and proclamations were issued by lord Hood on this occasion (f).

The English being now in possession of Toulon, and consequently masters of the Toulon fleet, thought to establish themselves in that part of France, and lieutenant-general O'Hara, was requested to send word whether he wanted more troops, but so confident was that officer that the place was impregnable, that he apprehended he had sufficient to defend it against the whole force of France, if it could be collected before the place. Towards the close of November, however, the French opened a considerable battery on the heights of Arenes, against Toulon, and managed their attack with so much enthusiasm and military skill, that the allies were compelled to quit that important post in the utmost confusion and disorder, the loss on their side, as may be imagined, from the nature of the attack, and the situation, being immense. Lieutenant-general O'Hara himself was wounded in the arm and taken prisoner; and many gallant officers were killed or taken on this occasion. On the 20th of December, lord Hood sent intelligence to England, dated on board the Victory, Hieres Bay, that he had been obliged to evacuate Toulon, and to retire from the harbour to that anchorage. But as they conceived themselves authorised by the laws of war, to inflict on the enemy all the mischief in their power, they distinguished their retreat by conflagration and havoc. Sir Sidney Smith engaged in the arduous task of burning the store-houses and ships, amidst an unceasing fire from the approaching enemy. It was also asserted that three ships of the line, four frigates, and many sloops were added to the British fleet; and that ten of the enemy's ships of the line in the arsenal, with the mast-house, great store-house, hemp-house, and other buildings, were totally destroyed: (which, however, does not seem to have

(d) The States General, about this time, presented a reply to a memorial of lord Auckland, of the 18th, expressive of their most grateful remembrance of the earnestness and promptitude of the duke of York and his troops in their cause. Their high mightinesses gave the most solemn assurances, that they would exert all their efforts to combat an enemy, which they regarded not only as the enemy of Holland, but of the human race; as having formed the project of destroying the happiness of civil society, by the annihilation of all the principles of religion, justice, and humanity.

(e) The delay of naval preparations for the siege, and the necessity of waiting for heavy artillery, enabled the enemy to make ample provision for the defence of the town.

(f) On the 16th of October, 1793, was guillotined at Paris, in her thirty-eighth year, (having been born November 2, 1755,) Marie Antoinette, the beautiful widow of the late French king Louis XVI. She was archduchess of Austria, and sister of Leopold II. emperor of Germany, and was married to the king of France in 1770. This unfortunate princess had been condemned on the preceding day, by the revolutionary tribunal, as "Guilty of having been accessary to, and having co-operated in, different manœuvres against the liberty of France, of having entertained a correspondence with the enemies of the republic; of having participated in a plot tending to kindle civil war in the interior of the republic, by arming citizens against each other," and of other crimes too horrid and ill-founded to be here enumerated. When the sentence of the tribunal was read, the queen cast down her eyes, and did not afterwards lift them up. "Have you nothing to reply, upon the determination of the law?" said the president to her. "Nothing," she replied. "Nor you her official defenders?" "Our mission, (said they) is fulfilled, with respect to the widow Capet." The execution took place at half after eleven o'clock in the forenoon. As soon as the queen left the Conciergerie, to ascend the scaffold, the multitude assembled in the courts and streets, cried out Bravo! Marie Antoinette was clad in a white loose dress, and her hands were tied behind her back. She looked firmly round on all sides. She was accompanied by the deposed curate of St. Landry, a constitutional priest; and on the scaffold preserved her natural dignity and composure of mind.

About this time John Frost was indicted and tried for uttering the following seditious words at the Percy Coffee-house: "I am for equality: I see no reason why one man should be greater than another. I would have no king, and the constitution of this country is a bad one." He was found guilty in the court of King's Bench before lord Kenyon.

been entirely the fact; for it afterwards appeared in the London Gazette, that several of the ships said to have been burned on this occasion, formed a part of the French navy in 1795:) and, before day-light, all his majesty's ships, together with those of Spain and the Two Sicilies, were out of the reach of the enemy's shot and shells, except the Robuste, which was to receive captain Elphinstone, and she followed soon after without being struck by a single shot.

In opening a new session of parliament on the 21st of January, 1794, his majesty made favourable mention of the advantages gained upon the whole, by the allied armies; and that even the temporary possession of the town and port of Toulon, had greatly distressed the operations of the enemy. He recommended a steady perseverance in so just and necessary a war on our part, till it shall be terminated by an honourable and permanent peace. "It only remains for us (said he) to persevere in our united exertions: their discontinuance or relaxation could hardly procure even a short interval of delusive repose, and could never terminate in security or peace." He further said, "Although I cannot but regret the necessary continuance of the war, I should ill consult the essential interest of my people, if I were desirous of peace on any grounds exclusive of a due provision for their permanent safety, and for the independence and security of Europe."

In the house of lords, an address of thanks to his majesty for his speech, was moved by the earl of Stair, and by lord Cliefden in the house of commons. The earl of Guildford proposed an amendment to the former, and wished for a speedy negociation, as we had rushed into the war without necessity; and Mr. Fox to the latter; but on a division, the address was carried by ninety-seven against twelve in the upper house, and two hundred and seventy-seven against fifty-nine in the lower house.

By a letter from sir Charles Grey to the right hon. Henry Dundas, dated Fort Royal, Martinico, March 25, 1794, intelligence was received at the court of St. James's, that a complete conquest had been made of the island of Martinico; the last and most important fortress of Fort Bourbon having surrendered to his majesty's arms on the 23rd of the same month. Sir Charles Grey landed with a respectable force on the island of Martinico, while sir John Jervis superintended the naval operations. Several strong posts were soon seized, and the reduction of Pigeon isle opened the bay and harbour of Fort Royal to the shipping. Very few men were killed or wounded in this enterprize. The garrison of Fort Bourbon, amounting to nine hundred men, marched out prisoners of war, laying down their arms on the parade of Fort Royal, and were embarked for France immediately. His majesty's troops having marched in, struck the French and hoisted the British colours, and changed the name from Fort Bourbon to that of Fort George. Major-general Dundas and prince Edward landed in St. Lucie without any loss, and proceeded to the investment of La Morne Fortunée; lieutenant-colonel Coote stormed a redoubt and two batteries; and the dread of an assault on the fort accelerated a surrender.

The armies of the combined powers, commanded by the duke of York, obtained a considerable advantage near Cateau on the 16th of April; and on the 22nd, the hereditary prince of Orange made a general attack upon the posts which the enemy occupied in the front of Landrecy, and succeeded in getting possession of them all; and in taking by storm their intrenched camp, and a very strong redoubt which they had thrown up at the village of Éloques, within six hundred yards of the place. The duke of York, in a letter to the right hon. Henry Dundas, dated April 26, Heights above Cateau, says, "It is from the field of battle that I have the satisfaction to acquaint you with the glorious success, which the army under my command have had this day. At day-break, this morning, the enemy attacked me on all sides. After a short but severe conflict, we succeeded, in repulsing them, with considerable slaughter. The enemy's general Chapuy, is taken prisoner, and we are masters of thirty-five pieces of the enemy's cannon. The behaviour of the British cavalry has been beyond all praise!"

About the same period, general count Kinksly, and major-general Bellegarde, after driving the enemy with great slaughter from Prisches, pursued them as far as day-light would permit, and took from them twenty-two pieces of cannon.

The Austrian general Clairfait received a check from the enemy at Moncron, and was forced to retire with the loss of some cannon and tumbrils; but to atone for this disaster, Landrecy surrendered to the duke of York on the 30th of April. His royal highness soon after repulsed twenty thousand of the enemy near Tournay, taking from them thirteen pieces of cannon and four hundred prisoners. A few days after, the island of St. Lucie surrendered to his majesty's forces, under the command of sir John Jervis, K. B. Guadaloupe and its dependencies soon followed the example, and surrendered to the British.

The republican troops gained a considerable advantage over the duke of York near Tournay in the beginning of May, and the duke escaped with extreme difficulty; but towards the conclusion of the month, general count Kaunitz attacked the French army which had passed the Sambre, defeated them, and obliged them to pass in great confusion over the river. The enemy lost near fifty pieces of cannon, and above five thousand men, three thousand of whom were taken prisoners; the loss of the Austrians was inconsiderable (g).

Marshal Mollendorf, on the 14th of May, surprized the French in their entrenchments near Mentz, and defeated them with great slaughter. The French sustained a loss of one thousand killed, two thousand taken prisoners, eighteen pieces of cannon, and two howitzers.

The glorious first of June firmly established the laurels on the brow of admiral earl Howe. He was cruizing off the coast of Bretagne, when he was informed that the French admiral, Villaret Joyeuse, had sailed from Brest harbour. Having approached the enemy to the westward of the isle of Ushant, rear-admiral Paisley briskly attacked the rear, and a spirited engagement ensued on the following day, the nautical skill of the veteran Howe having obtained the weather-gage. Three days afterwards the French were brought to close action. The enemy's force, consisting of twenty-six ships of the line, opposed his majesty's fleet of twenty-five. The admiral, in the Queen Charlotte, displayed great skill and intrepidity in breaking the enemy's line. Captain Berkeley, in the Marlborough, after sustaining a dangerous conflict with two ships, disabled one and repelled the other. Captain Hervey, in the Brunswick, engaged several ships with undaunted valour, and had a violent contest with the Vengeur, whose crew vociferated for mercy; but the British captain could not prevent her sinking. Many of the French were, however, saved by the humanity of their adversaries, but about three hundred of them perished in the ocean. Captain Montague was the only officer of rank who fell in this action; but admiral Graves received a wound in the arm; and the rear-admirals Bowyer and Paisley, and captain Hutt of the Queen, had each a leg taken off. The names and forces of the French ships captured by lord Howe, are La Juste, eighty guns; Sans Pareille, eighty; l'Amerique, seventy-four; l'Achylle, seventy-four; Northumberland, seventy-four; l'Impetueux, seventy-four; the Vengeur, seventy-four, in which six hundred and ninety were killed, and five hundred and eighty wounded. This splendid victory added to the renown of our naval countrymen, and raised the hearts of our people with joy and admiration.

There was likewise received from lord Hood, an account of the surrender of the town and forts of Bastia, and consequently of the whole island of Corsica. General Paoli, having exercised his influence over his countrymen, the sovereignty of the island was voted, in a regular assembly, to be transferred to the king of Great Britain. Sir Gilbert Elliot, in the name of his royal master, accepted the offer; but the success of lord Howe's fleet excited stronger emotions of joy than the addition of Corsica to the territories of George the Third.

The national convention now determined the fall of Robespierre. Billaud Varennes delivered a speech in the (g) Madame Elizabeth, the ill-fated sister of Louis XVI. fell a victim to the sanguinary system of republicanism on the 10th of May. She was followed to the scaffold by twenty-five persons, condemned at the same time; but was not suffered to fall under the edge of the fatal axe, till the heads of all her fellow-sufferers had been severed from their bodies. Having ascended the scaffold, and continued in prayer till the moment when she was to submit her head to the ensanguined instrument, she advanced with perfect resignation, with a kind of heroism inspired by religion, and perfectly submissive to the decree of Providence. Thus died the amiable Elizabeth Philippina Maria of France, after having lived, with an unsullied reputation, thirty years and seven days.

Tribune

bune, replete with invective, denouncing Robespierre as aspiring at the dictatorship, and endeavouring to destroy many members of the convention. "I, therefore," said he, "proclaim the tyranny of Robespierre." Loud and repeated bursts of applause resounded in the hall. Robespierre attempted to speak, but in vain, in consequence of the vociferous exclamations from every quarter, of "Down with the tyrant! Down with the tyrant!" Tallien, in a speech of considerable length, followed Billaud Varennes; and the arrest of Robespierre, the elder, Robespierre, the younger, and several others, was immediately decreed. A decree of arrest was also passed against Henriot, commandant of the armed force at Paris, and others of the creatures of Robespierre. Robespierre was then sent prisoner to Luxemburg. A decree of outlawry was also passed against him. Leonard Bourdon, having shortly after ascended the Tribune, informed the convention of Robespierre's being seized in the hall of the commune, by a gens d'arme, then at his side: Robespierre had been armed with a knife, which the gens d'arme immediately wrested from him. So great was the abhorrence of the convention to the tyrant, that they would not suffer him or his accomplices to appear at the bar, but, in obedience to their decree of outlawry, immediately ordered him to the place of execution, where, in conjunction with twenty others, he fell a victim to his own cruelty and ambitious views.

To signal victories, a remarkable change took place in the state of affairs in the West Indies. The force originally sent out under sir Charles Grey, and sir John Jervis, was comparatively small, considering the magnitude of the undertaking; and the yellow fever, with other diseases so fatal to European constitutions in that climate, made dreadful havoc among the soldiers, in the course of the summer, insomuch that nearly two-thirds of our force was consigned to the grave.

A French squadron appeared off the island of Guadaloupe, on the 3rd of June, and manifested an intention of attacking fort Fleur d'Epée. Accordingly on the 5th they manned thirteen boats, and on the following day, attacked the fort, which they carried by storm, when the English garrison retreated with considerable loss to fort Louis, and afterwards retired to Basseterre. The fort being no longer tenable, they found it expedient to retire in the night. The French commissioner Victor Hughes, a man of uncommon enterprize, and daring courage, made every necessary arrangement both for defence and attack. Sir Charles Grey, on the other hand, was equally active; he sailed from St. Kitt's with all the troops he could collect, on a short notice, and landed on the 19th at Guadaloupe, under cover of the English fleet.

On the 2nd of July, sir Charles Grey dispatched brigadier Symes, with a select number of soldiers and seamen, to attack the town of Point-à-Petre, and take it by surprize; but they were repulsed with great loss, and obliged to retreat. The enemy then attacked Basseterre, which after a long and gallant resistance, was compelled to surrender. The efforts of the French were then directed against the fort of Tiberen, in St. Domingo, which after a severe contest was evacuated by the British troops on the 29th. In addition to these mortifications, a French squadron of one ship of the line, two frigates, and two sloops, destroyed in the course of the winter of this year, all the British settlements on the coast of Africa, and took a number of merchant ships, with an immense quantity of plunder.

On the 16th of June, the hereditary prince of Orange attacked and defeated the French army, which had again passed the Sambre, and chosen a position near Josselies, in order to cover the siege of Charleroi, before which they had begun to open trenches. The enemy's loss was about seven thousand men, twenty-two pieces of cannon, and thirty-five ammunition waggons, besides horses and baggage. A succession of disastrous events on the part of the combined armies, more than over-balanced these disadvantages; but intelligence of the surrender of Port au Prince, in the island of St. Domingo, revived the drooping spirits of the British nation.

On the 29th of June, the national convention received information, that general Pichegru had pushed his advanced posts as far as Ghent, and that he had taken from the enemy ten pieces of cannon, and six hundred prisoners. That the enemy, reinforced by twenty thousand Prussians, with an army of one hundred thousand men, under the prince of Cobourg, had in vain attempted to relieve Charleroi. That victory had remained long doubtful, and nothing was to be seen but slain and combatants, in this memorable battle which was fought in the plains of Fleurus: in which about nine thousand of the allied troops were killed, wounded, and taken prisoners. It also facilitated a junction between the French armies of the Moselle, the Ardennes, and the north. This battle began at three o'clock in the morning: thrice was the French army forced, by the numerous artillery of the allies, to fall back on the entrenchments; but those movements served only to increase the ardour of the republicans, who exclaimed aloud throughout the line, "No retreat to-day! No retreat!" For nine hours the victory seemed indecisive, and no one could determine which would be the conqueror. At six in the evening, general Jourdan collected the corps de reserve, and the artillery, and charged the whole: their efforts were accompanied by unanimous cries of "Vive la republic!" and at this moment the allied army, no longer able to resist the shock, fled on all sides with the utmost precipitation.

A treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between the king of Great Britain and the United States of America, was signed on the 19th of November by lord Grenville, his majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, being duly authorized for that purpose on his majesty's part; and the hon. John Jay, envoy extraordinary from the United States of America, having like authority on the part of the said States.

In consequence of bills found by the grand jury, at Hicks's Hall, several persons were tried, in the course of the months of November and December, for high treason. Thomas Hardy, secretary to the London Corresponding Society, standing foremost on the list, first put himself on the justice of God and his country; and, after a very long and deliberate investigation, was acquitted on the 5th of November, having been ably defended by Messrs. Erskine and Gibbs: John Horne Tooke, Thomas Holcroft, John Thelwall, the political lecturer, the reverend Mr. Jeremiah Joyce, Stewart Kyd, a barrister at law, and most of the others accused of similar offences, were also successively acquitted, and many of them discharged from prison.

The court party lamented the escape of these men, and blamed the forbearance and indulgence of the jury; but there was not evidence sufficient to justify a verdict of guilt. Edward Watt, who, on a prior charge of high treason, had been convicted, was executed at Edinburgh, on the 15th of October preceding (h).

About this time a decree was passed in the national convention,

(h) It may not be improper to give some further particulars relative to the extraordinary trials of these gentlemen. On the 10th of September a special commission of oyer and terminer was issued for the prisoners, confined on a charge of high treason in the Tower of London; and on the 2nd of October it was opened at the sessions-house, Clerkenwell, by the lord chief justice Eyre, in an elaborate charge to the grand jury: and in the course of their proceedings the jury found a bill of indictment against Thomas Hardy, John Horne Tooke, and ten others; and on the 28th of October, Thomas Hardy, secretary to the London Corresponding Society, was put on his trial at the Old Bailey. Mr. Wood opened the pleadings, and stated nine overt acts of high-treason with which the prisoner was charged. When he had finished, sir John Scott, the attorney-general, in a speech of nine hours, went into a very minute detail of the subject of these prosecutions for high-treason. The counsel for the prosecutions then produced their evidence, which consisted of papers that had been found in the custody of different persons, and seized under the warrant of the privy-council. Prior to the court's breaking up, about twelve o'clock, a conversation occurred respecting the gentlemen of the jury, who wished to be discharged on their honour; to which Mr. Erskine, on behalf of the prisoner, consented; but the court were of opinion that the law would not permit the jury to separate after having been once impanelled. The jury were therefore consigned to the care of the sheriffs, by whom preparations for their accommodation in the sessions-house had been previously made; and, the next day, the jury having complained that their accommodations were uncomfortable, and incapable of affording them the necessary rest, they were provided that evening, and all the subsequent evenings of the trial, with beds at the Hummums in Covent Garden. The 29th, 30th, and 31st of October, were employed in the production of evidence for the crown, both documentary and oral, which latter took up great part of the morning of November 1. This being finished, Mr. Erskine, in behalf of the prisoner, addressed the jury for the space of six hours. The remainder of the day was occupied in the examination of witnesses for the prisoner, many of whom gave him an excellent character. The court adjourned at half past twelve on Sunday morning, November 2nd, till the Monday following, when the counsel for the prisoner proceeded with their evidence: after which Mr. Gibbs likewise addressed the court in his favour. He was followed by the solicitor-general in reply. The next day the solicitor-general concluded his reply, and the lord precedent commenced the summing up the evidence; which he resumed the following day, and finished about noon.—The jury then returned, and after having been absent two hours and a half, returned and delivered their verdict—Not guilty.

vention, against the use of the manufactures of Great Britain or Ireland; which was followed by another, declaring, that all the English, Scotch, Irish, and Hanoverians, of either sex, and all the subjects of Great Britain generally, at present within any part of the republican territories, shall be put in a state of arrest in houses of security, and seals shall be put upon their papers; and the effects of those subjects of the same nation who are absent, shall be seized and confiscated for the benefit of the republic.

The fate of Holland was now determined; and the French only waited for the setting in of the frost, to complete the total overthrow and reduction of that country. In some of the provinces the disaffected party were very active, and several resolutions hostile to the stadtholder and his government were passed.

General Pichegru, still mindful of his plan of seeming tardiness and irresolution, made no advance whatever for more than a month; but a frost setting in about the middle of December, opened a new field to the adventurous spirit of the republican forces. In the space of a week the Maese and the Waale were both frozen over, and on the 27th of the month, a strong column of the French crossed the Maese near Driel, the right wing extending from Nimeguen to fort St. Andre, which was employed in watching the movements of the allies, while the centre made themselves masters of the Bommel, the Waert, and Langstraale; and the left forced the lines of Breda. On this day the French gained one hundred and twenty pieces of artillery, sixteen hundred prisoners, and three hundred horses. But notwithstanding this success, the French were driven back across the river, in three days after, with considerable loss, by a well conducted attack of the British forces, co-operating with a body of Hessians, and a party of emigrant hussars.

This check, however, was but trifling, for on the same day a detachment from Pichegru's army took possession of the fortress of Grave, after a very obstinate resistance. General Bons defended it till his last shot was expended, the whole town being reduced to a heap of ruins, and the garrison were made prisoners of war. The terms granted reflect the highest honour on the humanity of the conquerors. Shortly after the main body of the French army, to the amount of sixty or seventy thousand men, crossed the Waale at different points, and made a general attack on Walmoden's position between Nimeguen and Arnheim. The allies were defeated in every direction, with great slaughter; and before they had time to rally, or even to make any necessary preparations for flight, their remaining posts between the Waale and the Rhine were attacked with irresistible fury. This put the finishing stroke to the power of the stadtholder, for, neither the troops nor the inhabitants of the United Provinces made any attempt to stop the progress of the French. The tri-coloured flag was speedily displayed, and the tree of liberty was planted in every province.

Previous to the above disasters a general attack had been made on the French (on the 17th of May) at Turcoing, with a view to compel them to evacuate West Flanders. The battle was very long and extremely obstinate, but it terminated in favour of the French, who were successful at every point. During the contest the duke of York was cut off from every part of his own corps, and obliged to repair to that of general Otto, to concert measures with him to extricate the British forces from the critical situation in which they were then placed. This was at last effected, and the English troops retired to Templeneuve, after a dreadful havoc had been made among them, in fighting their way through the ranks of the enemy. By the French accounts it appears, that they took on this occasion sixty pieces of cannon, and two thousand prisoners, consisting of English, Hanoverians, and Hessians. The duke of York quitted the command on the 6th of December, and shortly after returned to England.

The parliament met again on the 30th of December, when his majesty, in his speech, urged the necessity of persisting in the war, however unfortunate it had been. The Dutch had, he observed, from a sense of present difficulties, entered into a negociation for peace with the prevailing party in France, but no established government could derive security from such a negociation. The most effectual means had therefore been adopted for the further augmentation of the forces, on whose valour his majesty professed he had the utmost reliance. He also mentioned the accession of the sovereignty of Corsica to the British dominions, and the conclusion of a treaty of marriage between the prince of Wales and the princess Caroline of Brunswick, for whose provision his majesty expected the concurrence and support of both houses. He exhorted the house of commons to make ample provision for the public service; lamented the necessity of imposing additional burthens on the subject; but observed with satisfaction the state of crédit, commerce, and resources in this country.

An address was moved in the house of lords by earl Camden, seconded by the earl of Besborough, and supported by the earls of Morton and Kinnoul, lords Mulgrave, Grenville, and Darnley. It was opposed by the marquis of Lansdowne, and earls Stanhope and Derby. On the question for the amendments proposed by the opposition, it was rejected by a majority of one hundred and seven against twelve.

In the house of commons an address was moved by sir Edward Knatchbull, and seconded by Mr. Canning, on the leading grounds, that a peace with France at present must be so insecure as to incur all the inconveniencies and expence of a war establishment. Mr. Wilberforce objected to the address, as pledging the house to prosecute the war till there was a counter-revolution in France; for there was nothing in his majesty's speech in the least pacificatory. After maturely considering the matter, his opinion was, that government ought to endeavour to negociate a peace in an open and manly manner. England, he said, was now reduced to that state, when necessity required her to endeavour to bring back the country to the blessings of a fair and honourable peace. He did not think that the country would be at all debased by a declaration for peace; and moved an amendment to the address, containing the substance of the arguments he had advanced, which was seconded by Mr. Duncombe.

Mr. Wilberforce's motion for the amendment was strenuously opposed by Mr. Pitt, who censured with much asperity the members of the house, that after agreeing to the war, now wished for peace. Mr. Pitt was answered, with great calmness, reason, and energy, by Mr. Fox; but the amendment, as was to be expected, was negatived by a large majority: no less than two hundred and forty-six against seventy-three! The motion for the address was then put and carried.

Mr. Sheridan introduced his proposed motion, relative to the suspension of the habeas corpus act, on the 5th of January, 1795. He strenuously argued against the suspension of that act, as suspending the whole British constitution, and urged the authorities of sir Edward Coke, and judge Blackstone. Such a measure could only be justified by an emergency, when a traiterous conspiracy was apprehended, which, he contended did not exist. He denied the reality of the plot, on which the suspension was professedly founded; and mentioned the encouragement given to spies and informers, as disgraceful to any government. The motion was supported by Mr. Erskine, Mr. Fox, Mr. Milbank, and Mr. Thompson, and opposed by Mr. serjeant Adair, Mr. Windham, the secretary at war, the master of the rolls, and Mr. Pitt, who in his speech intimated a renewal of the bill. There were forty-one members for the repeal, and one hundred and eighty-five against it.

On the 15th of the same month, the attorney-general moved for leave to bring in a bill to continue the suspension of the habeas corpus act for a limited time. A debate guilty. On Monday, November 17th, the court again met, and proceeded on the trial of John Horne Tooke, Esq. on the same charge of high-treason. This trial was conducted in the same manner as the preceding, and ended on the Saturday following about eight in the evening, when the jury retired, and in a few minutes returned with their verdict—Not guilty.

On Monday the 6th of December, the court again met, and John Augustus Bonney, Jeremiah Joyce, Stewart Kyd, and Thomas Holcroft, (who, much to his honour, though not in custody, had surrendered himself as soon as the bill was found against him by the grand jury,) were arraigned, and a jury was sworn in; when the attorney-general informed the court that he should decline going into the evidence against the prisoners, as it was the same that had been adduced on the two late trials, and on which, after the most mature consideration, a verdict of acquittal had been given. The prisoners were of course acquitted and discharged. Mr. Thelwall was then put to the bar, and, after a trial of five days, acquitted.

Thus ended these memorable trials, the issue of which the country awaited with the utmost agitation and anxious suspense, until the just and temperate verdict of an honest jury had defended the law of the land, against the dangerous innovation of constructive treasons.

ensued,

ensued, in which the motion was opposed by Mr. Sheridan, lord William Russel, Mr. Lambton, Mr. Francis, Mr. Grey, and Mr. Whitbread, and supported by the attorney and solicitor-generals, Mr. Anstruther, and Mr. serjeant Watson, after which there appeared for the motion seventy-one, against it thirteen! The second reading of the bill was opposed by Mr. Lambton, and several other members, who denied the existence of a conspiracy in the country to subvert the constitution, which was as peremptorily affirmed by the advocates of administration, who strongly contended for the adoption of the measure, as essential to its preservation. The motion was carried by a majority of two hundred and thirty against fifty-three. The bill was then read a second time, and the ministers were earnest to go instantly into a committee upon it, though it was then three o'clock in the morning. This was, however, strongly opposed by Mr. Erskine, Mr. Fox, and Mr. Sheridan, and deferred till the 28th. It was then again opposed by Mr. Fox, but was carried by a considerable majority.

The earl of Lauderdale, on the third reading of this bill in the house of lords, moved an amendment, limiting the operation of it to the first of July; though, by the words of the bill, the crown, by the power of not proroguing parliament, was vested with the privilege of continuing the suspension for an indefinite time. This he forcibly urged on the ground of preventing a dangerous precedent on future occasions. This amendment was agreed to, and the bill read a third time; after which, lord Grenville moved that it should pass. His lordship entered at large into the proceedings of the societies, to prove the existence of the conspiracy, insisting that the late verdict did not negative that, but only considered whether the persons put upon their defence, were guilty to the extent charged in the indictments. The earl of Guildford replied to his lordship in a pointed speech; and a spirited debate ensued, in which the suspension was supported by the dukes of Leeds and Portland, lord Carlisle, and several other peers; but it was strenuously opposed by the duke of Bedford, the marquis of Lansdowne, and the earl of Lauderdale. The question was then proposed, and carried without a division. A protest was, however, entered against the bill, signed by the dukes of Bedford and Norfolk, and the earls of Lauderdale and Guildford.

The most strenuous endeavours of the opposition members were exerted in both houses, during the course of this month, for the attainment of peace. In the upper house motions were made to that effect by earl Stanhope, the duke of Bedford, and the earl of Guildford. In the lower house by Mr. Grey and Mr. Fox; the subject excited much warmth of debate; but the event terminated in favour of the administration, who carried their point when the several motions were introduced, by very considerable majorities.

The affairs of Ireland, during the course of this and the two following months, occupied much of the public attention in both kingdoms. The coalition between a certain portion of the whigs, and an administration whom they had so frequently reviled, and whose appointment to office they had represented as an insult on the people, was not likely to be productive of the happiest effects; and it is singular, that the man who was the principal agent and the most active in bringing about the coalition, should be the first victim of ministerial artifice and cunning.

Earl Fitzwilliam, whose zeal for the war had recommended him to the ministry, was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland in the beginning of the year. It may be proper to observe, that though the Roman catholics had been restored in some degree to their civil right, by the elective franchise; it does not appear, that either their own leaders, or their parliamentary adherents, were satisfied with what had been granted, or would probably be satisfied with less than a total repeal of all remaining disqualifications. The temporising spirit so characteristic of the administration of the day, had made them receive, with some degree of surprize, the former concessions; but as the Portland party had come into office, the hopes of the catholics revived, and in that party they expected confidently to find firmer friends, and more strenuous supporters; and even before the appointment of earl Fitzwilliam, they had taken the most effectual means for pressing their claims on the first opportunity which appeared to be favourable.

It is evident, however, that not only the new-appointed viceroy, previous to his acceptance of the office, satisfied himself that the catholics ought to be relieved from every remaining disqualification, but that the duke of Portland uniformly concurred with him in this opinion. When the question came under discussion, previous to his departure for Ireland, ministers were strongly impressed with the same conviction, and his lordship adds, in his own statement of the case to a noble friend, "had I found it otherwise, I never would have undertaken the government."

His lordship certainly appears to have proceeded with caution in the business. It was his intention in assuming the government, not to press the question forward; but rather to endeavour to protract it to a period of a more general tranquillity; but, as the principle was agreed upon by all parties, he determined, if the catholics should seem resolute, to bring it before parliament, and give it support on the part of government.

Perhaps no administration was ever more popular in Ireland than that of earl Fitzwilliam. All parties seemed united, and all differences of sentiment subsided. The Irish parliament assembled on the 22nd of January. The address, in the lords, was voted unanimously; that in the commons with only three dissentient voices. On the 9th of February the house of commons agreed to the most liberal supplies, almost without a debate. On the 12th Mr. Grattan moved for leave to bring in a bill for the further relief of his majesty's subjects professing the Roman catholic religion, and, after a feeble opposition, leave was obtained, and Mr. Grattan with three members were appointed to prepare and bring in the same.

Although earl Fitzwilliam had been enjoined by the cabinet not to bring forward the bill for the farther relief of the catholics, he was instructed not to oppose it, should it be introduced by any member who did not act in any official character. Yet, when the measure had been proposed by the house of commons he was suddenly recalled, at the instigation of that party who had long possessed and exercised great influence in Ireland.

Earl Camden, son of the celebrated chancellor, was at the same time appointed to succeed earl Fitzwilliam in the government of Ireland, and the bill was then rejected by the influence of the reigning party.

The rumour of this recal acted upon the whole island like an electric shock, which shook it from the center to its remotest shores. It excited the utmost discontent both in and out of parliament. In the house of commons, sir Laurence Parsons proposed an address to the lord lieutenant, stating that he possessed the confidence of the people and of the house, and expressing the strongest apprehensions if his excellency should be prematurely removed. The address was seconded with great warmth, and some expressions of indignation were uttered against the conduct of the British ministry. It was, however, withdrawn on the persuasion of Mr. Ponsonby.

On the 2nd of March sir Laurence Parsons moved for the limitation of the money-bill to the 25th of May, which was negatived; but a resolution, highly approving the conduct of lord Fitzwilliam, was passed on the motion of Mr. Conolly, with the single dissentient vote of Mr. Beresford. The kingdom continued for some time in a violent ferment, but not without serious conflicts between the military and the people. Addresses poured in from all quarters to the disgraced viceroy; and the discontent occasioned by this unpopular measure universally prevailed. On the 25th of March, earl Fitzwilliam took his departure for England. The day was observed as a day of general mourning: the shops were shut: no business was transacted; and the citizens were clad in black. In college-green, a number of respectable gentlemen, dressed in mourning, took the horses from his excellency's carriage, and drew it to the water-side. His lordship wished, as usual, on such occasions, to distribute money to the populace; but the offer was rejected even by the people. The military had been ordered out, in expectation of some disturbance; yet nothing was displayed but the serious emotions of sorrow, and the utmost order and decorum.

When earl Fitzwilliam returned to England, the duke of Norfolk condemned, in pointed terms, the dismission of that nobleman, and moved for an enquiry into the subject, as it involved the honour and character of a very respectable peer, and disturbed the tranquillity of the country which he had been deputed to govern; but after a debate, in which the earls of Caernarvon, Guildford, Moira, and lord Grenville took a part, a majority of seventy-five voted against it.

On

On the 31st of March earl Camden arrived in Dublin to assume the government. Some disturbances arose in the evening of his arrival, which were soon quelled by the interposition of the military. But so unpopular was the dismissal of earl Fitzwilliam from the lord lieutenancy, that a riot took place in Dublin on the day in which earl Camden was sworn in. When the lords were returning from the council after the ceremony, a furious party attacked the lord chancellor's carriage, and disfigured it with stones and brickbats. His lordship received a wound in the head by a stone, and probably would have fallen a sacrifice, had he not been preserved by the guards. At length, however, the insurgents were dispersed, but not till one person had lost his life, and many had been wounded.

On the 30th of April the Irish parliament met, pursuant to adjournment, and on the 21st of May a motion was made by Mr. Grattan for an enquiry into the state of the nation, including the reasons for the recal of earl Fitzwilliam. This motion was negatived by a large majority of that very parliament, who had almost unanimously supported the measures of the preceding administration. Mr. Grattan presented the bill for the emancipation of the catholics on the 24th, but it was rejected on the second reading by a majority of seventy-one.

On the 24th of April, earl Fitzwilliam appeared in his place in the British house of peers, and, in a spirited manner, called upon ministers to come forward to a full investigation of the business. They had, he said, insinuated blame to him; they had thrown down the gauntlet; he accepted the challenge, and wished to try the issue.

The duke of Norfolk then moved an address to his majesty, praying there might be laid before the house, such parts of the correspondence between ministers and earl Fitzwilliam, while in Ireland, as related to the motives of his recal, at a time when parliament had voted their confidence in him, and granted supplies with unexampled munificence. This motion was deferred to the 8th of May, when it was prefaced by the noble duke with whom it originated, by a variety of remarks in justification of the proceeding. He thought, from a full consideration of this affair, the time was arrived, when the inquisitorial power of parliament over the conduct of ministers ought to be exerted. His grace was warmly thanked by earl Fitzwilliam, who earnestly urged a full enquiry into the cause of his removal. The motion was supported by the earl of Guildford, the earl of Lauderdale, the dukes of Bedford and Leeds, and the earl of Moira, who urged the question as involving the interests of both kingdoms.

The motion was strongly opposed, particularly by the earl of Mansfield, who thought the enquiry improper, from the secrecy necessary to be observed in cases of this nature. The removal of earl Fitzwilliam did not, he contended, imply any charge against his character: it only proved such a difference between him and his majesty's ministers here, respecting Ireland, as rendered it impossible for them to act properly together.

Earl Fitzwilliam alledged that the embarrassments which had arisen in the affairs of Ireland, proceeded, in a great measure, from the arrangements made for this purpose by the late lord-lieutenant; and declared that a very perfect system had been formed with ministers at home for accomplishing this end. That the whole truth in this affair might be unravelled, his lordship earnestly supported the motion, and added, that he asked for no more than the impartial decision of the house. The motion, however, was lost by a majority of three to one; there being contents twenty-five, non-contents one hundred.

In the house of commons, the recal of earl Fitzwilliam underwent a very spirited discussion, and a motion for inquiry, similar to that introduced by the duke of Norfolk in the upper house, was made by Mr. Jekyll, and supported by Mr. Fox. The motion, however, was lost by a majority of one hundred and eighty-eight against forty-nine. Thus ended this important business, which had so generally engrossed the public attention, and was eventually productive of the most dangerous consequences, which we shall in the progress of our history have occasion to notice (i).

Let us now revert to the affairs of Britain. In the course of the preceding year, a treaty of marriage had been negociated between his royal highness the prince of Wales, and the princess Caroline of Brunswick. From the troubled state of affairs on the continent, the arrival of the princess in England was delayed till the 5th of April, and, on the 8th of the same month, the royal nuptials were celebrated in the chapel of St. James's, with becoming solemnity.

A message from his majesty was delivered to both houses of parliament, on the 27th, mentioning the debts of the prince of Wales. It stated the reliance of his majesty upon their liberality, for enabling him to settle an establishment on the prince and his august bride, suited to their rank and dignity; that the benefit of any settlement now to be made could not be effectually secured to the prince, till he was relieved from his present incumbrances to a large amount; but that his majesty did not propose to his parliament any other means of providing for this object, than the application of a part of the income which may be settled on the prince, and the appropriation, for a certain time, of the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall; declaring his readiness to concur in any plan of establishing a proper and regular arrangement in the prince's future expenditure, and of guarding against the possibility of his being again involved.

Mr. Pitt then moved for a committee to consider his majesty's message on that day se'ennight, upon which colonel Stanhope moved for reading the address to the house on the 24th of May, 1787. On this being complied with, he observed that the house had already liberally paid the debts of the prince; and he wished for a call of the house, that the attendance upon such an important business might be as full as possible. This was opposed by Mr. Pitt, who stated, among other things, that an establishment for the prince had long been a matter of general expectation. In a provision for supporting the dignity and splendour of the prince of Wales, it was certainly necessary to remove from his affairs all embarrassments. He enlarged upon the necessity of supporting the dignity and splendour of the royal family in every branch; and that, on a subject of such general notoriety, a call of the house was not necessary.

A conversation took place respecting this second application of the prince for assistance; which, with the exception of general Smith, appeared to be universally disapproved. The extent of the debts was stated by Mr. Pitt at between six and seven hundred thousand pounds, no part of which, he said, could be paid out of the civil list, so many charges having lately been made upon it. He expatiated upon the interest which the house had in preserving the hereditary succession, and in supporting the character of the house of Brunswick. He recommended to the house, before they yielded to heat or resentment, to consider, that in the issue of the discussion was involved the credit of the hereditary monarchy, and consequently the safety of this country. To this Mr. Martin significantly replied, that the way which appeared best calculated for the preservation of the hereditary monarchy, was to prevent it from being oppressive to the people.

When the consideration of his royal highness's debts was resumed on the 14th of May, various propositions were made by Mr. Pitt, after which he moved, that his majesty be enabled to appropriate sixty-five thousand pounds annually as an establishment for the prince of Wales. This produced a debate, in which some gentlemen contended for an abatement of the sum specified by Mr. Pitt, others for the exact sum, and others for an increase. Mr. Grey proposed that the new annual allowance should be only forty thousand pounds, and he thought the creditors who had encouraged the prince's prodigality, might be satisfied with a composition. But the original motion was carried by a great majority. A bill for preventing future princes of Wales from incurring debt was afterwards presented by sir William Pulteney, and passed the house, and the jointure of the princess was settled at fifty thousand pounds a year.

In the house of lords, on the 26th of June, the bill for preventing future princes of Wales from contracting debts, for granting an establishment to his royal highness, and for granting a jointure to the princess of Wales, were read and passed.

(i) A decree, about this time, passed the national convention, respecting the formation of a military school in the plains of Sablons, near Paris. Six young citizens from each district of the republic, under the name of Elèves de l'école de Mars—Pupils in the school of Mars—from the age of sixteen to seventeen and a half, were to be instructed in all the knowledge and habits suitable to a republican soldier: these youths were to be taken from the children of Sans Culottes, and clothed, armed, and fed, at the expence of the republic.

The intricate long-depending cause of Mr. Hastings, which began on the 12th of February, 1788, terminated during this session. The whole of the charges exhibited against him, which were comprised under four heads, were negatived by the committee appointed to examine the articles of impeachment. These consisted of twenty-four particulars. After the articles had been severally put to those peers who chose to vote, the lord chancellor observed, that there was a considerable majority for the acquittal of Mr. Hastings, and he declared him acquitted of all the charges alledged against him by the commons, and of all the matters contained therein. Thus, after a protracted trial of upwards of seven years, was brought to a conclusion this celebrated cause, so highly expensive to the nation at large, and so ruinous to the fortune of the accused individual. The high court of parliament sat, during the interval of its duration, not less than one hundred and forty-one days.

On the 27th of June the session ended with the usual formalities. His majesty, in his speech, noticed the liberal and spirited support which he had received from parliament in the prosecution of the war; he thanked the house of commons for the ample supplies which had been granted both on this account, in settling the establishment of the prince and princess of Wales, and in extricating the prince from his embarrassments. The lord chancellor then prorogued the parliament to the 19th of August. The supplies granted by parliament for the year 1795, were twenty-nine millions, three hundred and seven thousand two hundred and sixty-five pounds.

The peace and unanimity which accelerated the revolution in Holland, reflects great credit on the prudence and humanity of general Pichegru. The terms of capitulation proposed to the several provinces were extremely liberal. Perfect liberty of religious worship was established, and persons and property secured. French troops were permitted to be put in garrisons; and assignats were prohibited from circulation by forcible measures.

During the time that these events were in agitation, a requisition was made by the French generals for a supply of some articles of provision and cloathing for the armies. The French republic was pledged for the payment of the amount, and the proclamation issued by the French general at the Hague on the 27th of January, 1796, states, that the demand was made, not as from a conqueror, but as from an ally in support of the common cause. The amount of the requisition was estimated at one million, four hundred and three thousand and fifty-four pounds.

In consequence of the resistless power of the French arms in Holland, a royal proclamation was issued on the 16th of January, by the British ministry, ordering that all goods, merchandizes, and effects, belonging to the inhabitants of the United Provinces, should be permitted to be landed in any of the ports of Great Britain, and be secured in warehouses under the joint locks of his majesty and the proprietors, to remain in safe custody, till due provision should be made by law to enable the proprietor to re-export and dispose of the same. The emigrations from Holland in consequence of this proclamation were expected to be numerous, but they happened to be very few; and but little advantage was taken of the measure, except by the stadtholder himself and his family, who repaired to take refuge in England; and, according to general opinion, brought with them a considerable portion of their effects (k).

The success of the invaders induced several of the Dutch, though not so many as was expected, to seek refuge in Britain, where they were received with politeness and hospitality. On the 21st of the month, his serene highness, the prince of Orange, accompanied by the princess Frederick Louisa Wilhelmina his daughter, and prince George Frederick his son, arrived at Harwich in a fishing boat from Helvoetsluys. To the firmness of the Swiss regiment, and the fidelity of the Dutch horse guards, they were principally indebted for their escape in safety.

The expulsion of the stadtholder, finally terminated all friendly disposition on the part of the British ministry, towards the Dutch of every description. Peremptory orders were immediately dispatched to seize, without enquiry or delay, whatever Dutch vessels might be found in the different ports of Great Britain. In Plymouth Sound, two Dutch sixty-four's and two sloops of war, were seized by virtue of this authority. Six homeward-bound, and two outward-bound Dutch East India ships, and about sixty sail of other vessels, were captured in that port at the same time. A further proclamation was also issued, authorizing all ships of war, privateers, or letters of marque, to seize and bring into port all Dutch vessels bound either to or from any of the ports of Holland; and also all neutral vessels laden with military stores, bound to any part of the United Provinces. This proceeding was considered as equivalent to a declaration of war on the part of Great Britain.

About the close of January, the provisional representatives of the citizens of Holland assembled. Citizen Pierre Paulus (for the Hollanders had already adopted the language of the French their new allies) was unanimously chosen president. His speech, though not brilliant, was well adapted to the occasion, and concluded with recommending peace and unanimity. The Dutch now treated our military with contempt and illiberality; and the United Provinces were now revolutionized on the French model, liberty and the rights of man, were every where proclaimed.

After various disasters, the total reduction of Holland, and the consequent abolition of the Stadtholderate, the British army took the route to Deventer. To general Abercrombie, who conducted it during this painful and perilous retreat, every praise is due, for his humanity and vigilance. The partial thaw which occasionally happened, only served to aggravate the misery of the wretched fugitives. At Deventer, Zool, and Zutphen, great numbers of the sick were left behind, but the magazines were partially destroyed (l). Of the loss of men in this dreadful march no accurate return has been made. Private letters have asserted, that the British army, which amounted to thirteen thousand men when the retreat commenced, was reduced by the beginning of February to half the number. In the march from Amersfort alone, upwards of three hundred soldiers were frozen to death, besides women and children. The division commanded by lord Cathcart encountered the greatest difficulties, as his rear was continually harassed by the advanced parties of the French forces. At Groningen they were refused admittance into the city, and every where experienced loss and disappointment from the prevailing disaffection to the family of Orange.

In March the French were enabled to make some advances into the bishopric of Munster. Bertheim was taken early in that month, after an obstinate engagement, and on the 31st they advanced to Bienen, a league distant from Rees, and an engagement commenced at an early hour in the morning. The French were at first repulsed, but having brought fresh reinforcements into the field before the close of the day, the tide of success was turned, and the Austrians were defeated with amazing loss. The republicans immediately took possession of Bienen. The allied powers after this appear to have lost all their energy in the north of Germany, and the conquests of the French were only bounded by natural obstacles and the territory of neutral powers.

After some preliminary negociations in the beginning of February, Charette and the principal chiefs of his army, in the name of the royalists in La Vendée, and another chief of the name of Cromartie, as representing that party which was distinguished by the appellation of Chouans, (or night-owls,) publicly declared their intention to live in future subject to the laws of the republic, and to deliver up their arms and magazines. In the mean time conferences were opened at a place about three leagues distant from Nantes, between all the chiefs of the Chouans and Vendeans, and the representatives of the French people on mission in those departments; and on the 3rd of March the treaty was solemnly concluded, signed, and ratified at Nantes.

The naval war was now carried on as usual with success

(k) The following were the circumstances and ceremonies which preceded the stadtholder's departure from Holland: On the evening of the 16th of January, the stadtholder, in the assembly of the States General, and in the assembly of the States of Holland, requested that his two sons might be permitted to resign their situations in the army of the republic. The request was instantly complied with. On the next day he assisted again at the deliberations of the two assemblies, and obtained the necessary dispositions for absenting himself from the United Provinces. The States-general, however, appointed previously a committee to examine the documents and representations laid before them by the stadtholder.

(l) During the two days that the army remained there, it is said that upwards of twelve thousand stand of arms were destroyed; fifty thousand hundred weight of powder; some millions of musket ammunition; one hundred gun carriages; the artillery was in general spiked; working implements and other stores were lost to an incredible amount.

on the part of Britain, as the maritime force of France was never able, in its most flourishing periods, to contend with that of Great Britain. Several frigates were taken by the English in the course of the year, most of them without resistance, but some after a serious conflict; one of the most remarkable of which happened on the 4th of January, off Martinique, between the French frigate La Pique, of thirty-four guns, and the Blanche, commanded by the gallant captain Falkner, of thirty-two guns. The engagement continued five hours of close fighting. The French frigate had all her masts shot away, and had seventy-six men killed, and one hundred and ten wounded, besides about thirty who were lost with their masts. The loss of the English was eight killed and twelve wounded; but among the former was captain Falkner himself.

A considerable action took place on the 14th of March, in the Mediterranean, between the English fleet, consisting of fourteen ships of the line and three frigates, under admiral Hotham, and a French fleet of fifteen sail of the line, having an equal number of frigates with the British. Admiral Hotham, while in Leghorn road, on the 8th of March, received intelligence that the French fleet had been seen off the isle of St. Marguerite; he therefore ordered the British fleet to be unmoored, and the following morning put to sea. Having previously received information by the Mozelle, that the fleet she had seen was steering to the southward, he shaped his course for Corsica, and dispatched the Tarleton brig with orders for the Berwick at St. Fiorenza to join him off Cape Corse; but in the course of the night, the Tarleton returned with the unwelcome intelligence, that the Berwick had been captured two days before by the enemy's fleet. The two squadrons were not within sight of each other till the 12th. The signal was made the following morning by the British admiral for a general chase; and the wind blowing very fresh, one of the French line of battle ships was discovered without her top-masts, which afforded captain Freemantle, in the Inconstant frigate, a good opportunity to attack, rake, and harass her, till the Agamemnon came up, when the French ship received so much injury, as to be disabled from repairing her damage. The two English vessels were, however, so far distant from their own fleet, that they were obliged to quit her, as others of the enemy's ships were coming up to her assistance. On the morning of the 14th, the enemy's disabled ship was observed by admiral Hotham, with one who had her in tow, to be so far to leeward, as to afford a probable chance of cutting them off. For this purpose, every possible exertion was made; and the French were obliged to abandon those ships, or venture a battle. Though the latter did not appear to be their choice, they came down with a view of supporting them; but the Captain and Bedford were so far advanced, and so closely supported by the other ships of the British van, as effectually to cut them off. The conflict ended in the French abandoning these ships, which proved to be the Ca-Ira of eighty guns, and the Censeur of seventy-four. The total killed on board admiral Hotham's fleet was seventy-five, and of wounded two hundred and eighty: the loss of the French could not be ascertained.

The Illustrious and Courageux, which were the van ships that engaged the Ca-Ira and the Censeur, suffered so much in the conflict, having each lost their main and mizen-tops, that the British admiral was not able to renew the action. The Illustrious, in particular, was so much disabled, that she was taken in tow by a frigate, but was afterwards separated in a gale of wind, and driven on shore and lost near Avenza (m).

Admiral Cornwallis's judicious retreat from a superior force in the beginning of June, has been generally celebrated as a naval manœuvre. The squadron under his command consisted of five line of battle ships and two frigates. On the 7th of June, as he was cruizing off Belleisle, he fell in with a fleet of merchant ships under convoy of three ships of the line and six frigates. The men of war escaped; but the British admiral captured eight of the convoy, which were laden with wine and military stores. On the 16th, as he was standing in with the land near the Penmarks, the Phæton frigate made a signal for an enemy's fleet, which consisted of thirteen sail of the line, several frigates, two brigs, and a cutter. The wind now fell very much, and came round to the northward, bringing the enemy's ships to the windward; and the next morning they were seen moving, before day-light, upon both quarters of the squadron. About nine o'clock in the morning of the 17th, the front ships of the French line began to fire upon the Mars, which, as well as the rest of the British fleet, kept up a running fire during the whole of the day. It has been said that admiral Cornwallis was relieved from this perilous situation, by causing the signals to be made for a superior British fleet, which deterred the French admiral from pushing his advantages, and enabled the British fleet to effect their escape with little loss.

The period now approached, when the factious commotions which prevailed in France, during the violent paroxysm of liberty, was about to terminate. Distracted as the convention still was by faction and jealousies, and implicated as many of the leading members were, in the guilt of Robespierre's administration, it was some time before it could retrieve its character, and before its proceedings could be directed on principles of justice and honour. Several of the accomplices of that execrable tyrant were brought to condign punishment, and a committee of general security was ordered on the motion of Tallien, to frame a report concerning several persons that had been imprisoned, in order that those men who had been deluded by their leaders, should be restored to liberty, and the severity of justice be exclusively confined to their principals. About the same time, a decree was issued, charging the committee to revise the whole code of the laws, and to propose the repeal of such as should be found contrary to justice and liberality. Some other regulations were adopted, and on the 21st of February a decree highly honourable to the convention, was unanimously passed: it was for securing the freedom of religious worship and opinions.

The reign of Jacobinism was now no more, and it was determined that whatever tended to place an impediment in the way of peace, was contrary to good policy and to the general prosperity: and the power of the committee of public safety to negociate and conclude treaties, subject to the ratification of the legislative body, was acknowledged.

A committee was appointed on the 3rd of April to prepare the mode of organizing the laws of the republican constitution, and a decree to that effect was unanimously passed. Strong decrees were passed by the convention, to prevent the return of the emigrants, without the consent of the legislature; yet saving clauses were admitted in favour of the creditors and relatives of emigrants; all confiscation of property was abolished, except in cases of actual emigration; and the estates of those persons who had been condemned by the revolutionary tribunal, were restored to their respective families.

In the course of this month the French republic was publicly acknowledged by the court of Stockholm; and the Swedish ambassador, baron Storel, was received with great form. The address of the king of Sweden to the convention, concludes with these remarkable words: "We are making vows for the continual increase of your prosperity, and we recommend you with all our heart to the divine protection."

The moderation shewn by the French rulers towards the Dutch republic, was the basis of an advantageous treaty between the two nations.

During the month of May great riots and insurrections happened in Paris. A scarcity of bread was the real or pretended cause of the rising of the jacobin insurgents; and the emissaries of sedition had little difficulty in persuading the people of the suburbs, that the legislature was chargeable with all the public miseries. For several days previous to the bursting forth of the insurrection, placards were stuck up in various parts of Paris, accusing the convention of withholding bread from the people. At length, on the evening of the 19th, a plan of insurrection was openly circulated in the different sections, prefaced with that alarming political principle, "That insurrection is the most sacred duty of the people,"—followed by a determination, "that the citizens of Paris, of both sexes, and of all ages, should, without further delay, proceed in a mass to the convention, to demand bread,—the abolition of the revolutionary government, the immediate establishment of the constitution of 1793,—the dissolution of the present convention, and the establishment of another,—the arrest of each of the members who composed the present convention,—the convocation of the primary

(m) It is observable, that one or both of the French ships that were taken, were among the number of those reported, in the London Gazette, to have been destroyed at Toulon, assemblies, in order to renew the constitutional authorities, and to replace the national convention by the legislative body on a day to be specified." The rallying exclamation was to be "Bread, and the constitution of 1793."

Early on the 20th, the tocsin was rung in the Fauxbourg St. Antoine, and the générale beat. On this alarm the convention assembled, and a decree was passed, ordering all the citizens to their respective sessions. The insurgents, in the mean time, surrounded the convention, and the people in the tribunes insulted the deputies. Several conflicts now took place between the gens d'armes and the insurgents. A crowd of insurgents burst into the tribunes, exclaiming for "Bread and the constitution of 1793." These cries were accompanied with actions, menacing the national convention, whose deliberations were for some time suspended. The president, with a becoming energy, commanded silence, and, having obtained it, exclaimed—"They demand bread—and to give them bread is the object of our constant care. Let the people know that disorder will only stop the supplies of provisions." The president then ordered, without effect, the left tribunes to be cleared. General Hoche was appointed commandant of the armed force. The insurgents at length obtained possession of the hall of the convention; but some veteran soldiers repelled the besiegers, and there was an interval of tranquillity for about half an hour; after which a cry of "To arms," was heard on all sides. Bayonets and swords clashed against each other at the door;—a conflict took place—detachments of the armed force traversed the hall—three guns were fired, which drew a crowd into the hall. A citizen snatched off the hat of one of the populace, upon which was written—"Bread and the constitution of 1793:" the person who had taken off the hat was immediately assailed with sabres. He flew towards the tribune; but before he had reached it, a musquet was fired at him, and he fell by the side of the president. The representative of the people, Feraud, ran to his assistance; but he fell under repeated strokes of sabres and pikes. He endeavoured to defend himself, but was killed in one of the corridors; and his head was brought into the convention upon a pike.

During the tumult Boissy D'Anglas, had taken the president's chair, and remained firm and immoveable amidst the violence and confusion which still continued to increase. A drum was heard, and immediately an immense number of armed men appeared, marching in regular order, and filling the whole hall. A petitioner, in the dress of a cannoneer, read the paper, which was before agreed upon by the insurgents; he was often interrupted by the acclamations of the multitude, which filled and surrounded the hall. This was about four o'clock in the afternoon. The greater part of the deputies had departed: those who remained were principally the favourites of the insurgents, who took advantage of this moment of horror and consternation, to pass several decrees favourable to their faction. Duroc demanded the repeal of the law of the fifth Ventose, which struck the patriots under the name of terrorists: Goujon, Du Quesnoi, and Bourbotte, made several motions, which equally favoured the fallen party of Robespierre and Barrere: their propositions were received with the enthusiastic acclamations of the multitude; but this usurped authority was of short duration; a crowd of citizens made their appearance in company with the military, and entered the hall, exclaiming, "Long live the convention, and down with the factious!" It was instantly announced, that if those who prevented all legal deliberations, did not immediately retire, force would be used to compel them to be quiet. The multitude, alarmed by this menace, escaped in disorder by the windows.

Though defeated the preceding night, the jacobins rallied again on the 21st, and returned to the charge. They had thrown aside the guise of petitioners, and had roused themselves to the execution of the most violent acts. The convention, either conscious of the superior force of the insurgents, or desirous of averting this new danger by a seeming accommodation, sent a deputation of ten of its members to fraternize with them. When the deputation was repairing to fraternize, the assembly decreed, that bread should become more plentiful, and that the constitution of Robespierre should be put into immediate activity. To complete this scene of disgrace, the president was ordered to give the fraternal kiss to the rebellious mob, and a deputy congratulated the convention on what he called the holy re-union.

On the 22nd, the rebels were alarmed by the arrival of some regiments of troops of the line: but when they saw the whole of the Fauxbourg surrounded by increasing numbers, and, in addition to famine, were informed that if they did not instantly surrender, their houses should be laid in ashes by a general bombardment; they sent a deputation to inform the convention, that they had repealed the decree respecting gold and silver, making these metals no longer merchandize, and they were inclined to hearken to terms.

The convention, treating their offer of capitulation with a proper degree of contempt, ordered their generals to reduce the Fauxbourg to unconditional obedience, which was speedily effected, the inhabitants having forced the rebels to surrender; since they saw the destruction which awaited both themselves and their property, if they joined them, or sanctioned the resistance which they made.

On the 20th of May an insurrection happened at Toulon, in which Brunel, one of the representatives of the people, lost his life. Niou, who was then on board the fleet, hastened to oppose the designs of the insurgents, but in vain:—they insisted on the liberation of the terrorists. The fleet was on the point of sailing; but the jacobins succeeded in detaining it in the road. The insurgents took possession of the gates of the town, and mounted cannon upon them. They also marched from Toulon on their way to Marseilles, to the amount of three thousand men, and twelve pieces of cannon, but were soon interrupted in their career by the forces under the command of generals Charton and Pacton, who completely defeated and carried three hundred of them prisoners to Marseilles. By this event, Toulon was restored to the republic and to tranquillity.

If the king of Prussia had been so disposed, he might now have become the general pacificator of Europe: the protestant princes would have accepted his mediation; and if the catholic princes continued obstinately to prosecute the war, they would, by so impolitic a proceeding, have weakened their force, and consequently their opposition to his views of acquiring that influence, which had hitherto belonged to the house of Austria as head of the empire. But from whatever cause the indecision of the court of Prussia arose, time was given, by its neglect of the favourable moment, for Austria and England to regain the ascendency; and though Hesse Cassel formed a treaty soon after, and Saxony and other powers withdrew their contingents from the army of the empire, while the duke of Wirtemburg and others began a negociation, every thing was broken off; except the treaty of Hesse Cassel, and another with the elector of Hanover, by the reserve of the French on the eastern side of the Rhine.

The next discussion agitated in the national convention of France regarded the secret articles. After a long debate, in which the propriety of admitting secret articles was most ably supported by Cambaceres, it was agreed "that secret articles may be made, provided they do not militate against those of the open treaty." When the discussion was resumed on the following day, Cambaceres, as reporter from the committee of public safety, presented the plan of a decree upon the subject, the articles of which were adopted in their fullest extent, without a dissenting voice.

Though the negociation with the king of Prussia had commenced some time before, it was not presented to the convention till the 10th of April. "At length," said Reubell, "you are on the eve of gathering the fruit of your principles. The coalesced powers, who had sworn the ruin of the republic, feel compelled to sue to you for peace, since you have proved that justice and humanity were really the order of the day. Your committee, this day, offers, for your ratification, the peace which it has concluded with the king of Prussia. We have not forgotten, that if the wishes of the French people are for peace, it is for a glorious peace, and such as can compromise neither its dignity nor its interests. We thought it our duty to re-establish a commercial intercourse between Prussia and the French republic, and even to extend it by removing the theatre of war from the north of Germany. We thought it proper that a power so long coalesced against us, and now become our friend, should have a preponderance in the Germanic circles, which may be useful to the republic. We have observed, since the commencement of the last campaign, that the Prussian nation has omitted no opportunity of giving us the testimony of their esteem. We have been seconded in this proceeding, by the indefatigable zeal of the citizen Barthelemy, our ambassador in Switzerland."

Shortly after the Prussian negociation, a treaty was entered tered into between the French republic and Spain. As the king of Prussia had departed from the integrality of the coalition by his secession, the king of Spain found no difficulty in abandoning it also; and seeing the French troops marching to his capital, orders were dispatched to Don D'Yriarte to come to an immediate conclusion. So expeditious were they in this negociation, indeed, that though Don d'Iranada had been sent to Bayonne by the Spanish court at this time, and general Servan was sent to meet him by the committee of public safety, before these negociators had one interview, the peace was concluded at Basle between Don D'Yriarte and Mons. Barthelemy. The treaty at Basle was signed on the 22nd of July, by Mons. Barthelemy, on the part of the French republic, and by Don Domingo D'Yriarte, on the part of Spain.

A court was held at the East India house, early in the month of June, to determine by ballot, the following question; "That this court do recommend, that the court of Directors should apply to Warren Hastings, Esq. for a statement of the legal expences incurred by him in making his defence; and that, after having ascertained the same, by a full and satisfactory investigation, they discharge the amount thereof, not exceeding the sum of seventy-one thousand, and eighty pounds." On casting up the votes, after the ballot, there were for the question five hundred and forty-four—against it two hundred and forty-four. Majority three hundred.

A general court was also held the next day, for determining by ballot the following question: "That it is the opinion of this court, that in consideration of the long, faithful, and important services of Warren Hastings, Esq. and to mark the grateful sense entertained by this company of the extensive benefits which they have received from those services, a grant of an annual sum of five thousand pounds, from the first of January, 1795, to issue from the territorial revenues, during the term of the company's present exclusive trade, to Warren Hastings, Esq. his executors, administrators, and assigns, be prepared by the court of directors, and submitted to the board of commissioners for the affairs of India, for their approval and confirmation, pursuant to the act of parliament." On casting up the votes, the numbers were, for the question five hundred and eight; against it three hundred. Majority two hundred and eight. From this liberal proceeding, on the part of the East India Company, it clearly appears that the directors and proprietors of that opulent trade, entertained very different ideas of the abilities and integrity of Mr. Hastings than those which were entertained by the gentlemen who were the instigation of his impeachment.

The important capture of the Dutch settlements of Trincomale and Fort Ostenburg, in the East Indies, was effected on the 26th and 31st of August, 1795, by his majesty's forces under the command of colonel Stuart, and rear-admiral Rainier. On the 18th of August the British troops broke ground; on the 23rd the batteries were opened, and on the 26th a practicable breach was made. The garrison then surrendered by capitulation. The capture of Fort Ostenburg followed the surrender of Trincomale. The garrison, in consideration of their gallant defence, were allowed to march out of the fort with the honours of war, drums beating, and colours flying to the glacis, where they were to ground their arms, and surrender themselves prisoners of war; the officers keeping their swords. Private property was secured to them; but all public property, guns, stores, and provisions of every kind, were delivered up to the officers appointed by the British commanders to receive them.

On the 9th of June, died Louis Capet, son of the late unfortunate king of France, during his imprisonment in Paris, aged eleven years. It was at first suspected that the youth had been taken off by poison; but for such calumny there does not appear to have been the least foundation. For some time previous to his death, he had been afflicted with a swelling in his knee, and another in his left wrist; and he was at length attacked with a fever. It does not appear that any attention or medical aid was neglected. He expired in the prison of the Temple, where he had been confined ever since the autumn of 1792.

Perhaps in consequence of this event, or influenced by the general sympathy of the people of France, the committee of public safety, proposed the exchange of the princess, who remained a prisoner in the Temple, for the deputies delivered up to Austria, by the treachery of Dumourier; and the two ambassadors, Semonvillet and Muret, who had been seized contrary to the law of nations, upon neutral territories, by an Austrian corps, and who were also detained as prisoners in that country. After some hesitation, the emperor acceded to the proposal, and before the conclusion of the year the princess was delivered up to the Austrian envoy at Basle in Switzerland, and the captive deputies were at the same time restored to their country.

On the 13th of July the convention issued a decree respecting the regulation and dismission of foreigners.

The unsettled state of France, in the convention, and the late disturbances in Paris, pointed out the necessity of giving to France a regular form of government, an executive power, and to snatch her out of the military revolutionary vortex in which she had been long involved. While the events, we have been relating, were in agitation, the convention was sedulously employed in discussing the plan of the new constitution. It was presented by the committee of eleven on the 23rd of June, and was introduced to the consideration of the assembly by an excellent speech from Boissy D'Anglas, the reporter of the committee. Long and interesting debates succeeded. The different articles were separately discussed, and many of them referred back to the committee of eleven for revision. In the course of these debates, the convention restored that useful institution which formed a part of the old free constitution of France, electoral assemblies, and indeed the whole plan was materially altered. On the 23rd of August, the constitution was declared complete, and was referred to the primary assemblies for their acceptance and confirmation.

Shortly after a treaty of peace and amity was concluded between the French republic and the landgrave of Hesse Cassel. By this treaty the landgrave engaged neither to prolong nor renew his subsidiary treaties with Great Britain, nor to employ his troops in any manner hostile to the republic during the war. Peace was also concluded with the Elector of Hanover on nearly the same terms.

Great antipathy prevailed between the discontented sections and the convention: the former most grossly vilified the latter, and imputed to them all the mischiefs that had desolated the republic, as well as evinced every disposition to excite insurrection. On the 4th of October both parties made preparations for acts of hostility, and a contest ensued, in which the sectionaries displayed much valour, till they were compelled by the military force of Paris, to retreat to the place they had fixed for their headquarters. After an interruption of two hours, the cannon was heard again, and it only ceased firing at midnight, when the conventional troops had full possession of the field of battle, having driven the sectionaries from all their posts. The number that fell on this fatal day was eight hundred.

The executive directory were thus employed for the general good of the nation, when they received intelligence that hostilities were renewed in La Vendée; and the Chouan chiefs, and other royalists, were engaged in active correspondence with certain emigrants in England, and through them with the British ministry. The correspondence was detected, and seven of the leaders were assested, in consequence of some intercepted letters. The royalists had assembled in a body, and blockaded the Grand Champ; but the republican army came up with them, surprized the leaders in their beds, and completely defeated the Chouans. While those efforts were making in favour of a counter revolution in the interior of France, preparations were made in England for an invasion on the coast of Brittany. M. de Puisaye, who was appointed commander-in-chief of the catholic royal army of Britanny, published a proclamation at Carnac, inviting all Frenchmen to rally round the standard of their lawful king, Louis XVIII. for so was the count of Provence denominated on the death of the son of Louis XVI. With Puisaye was united in the command, the Count D'Hervilly, a royalist of an excellent character, and some military skill (n).

This expedition was set on foot by Mr. Windham, but he did not derive much honour from it; for it was ill-planned and extremely disastrous.

The squadron having reached the bay of Quiberon,

(n) M. D'Hervilly did not solicit to be employed in this service, but was sent for expressly by the British ministers, as well as a young man of uncommon merit, the count de Sombreuil, who was sent afterwards with a small reinforcement to join him. This youth, who did not approve of the expedition, was induced to sacrifice his conviction to a nice point of honour, by which he lost his life.

landed

landed on the peninsula, and raised intrenchments for their defence. It was at length determined to attack the fort of Quiberon, which was surrendered to a detachment under Mons. D'Hervilly, on the 3rd of July, the republican garrison consisting only of about six hundred men. The main army of the royalists, in consequence of a determination in a council of war, were removed within the peninsula and fort of Quiberon, where they were surprized by the republican forces on the night of the 21st. The royal troops were completely overthrown; and the slaughter made among them was extremely dreadful. A small part of the troops, however, who had sailed from England, to the amount of about nine hundred, together with near one thousand five hundred royalist inhabitants, who had joined the regiments in the pay of Great Britain, effected their embarkation on board the ships. The remainder fell into the hands of the enemy, together with all the stores and ammunition that had been landed.

The British ministry, notwithstanding the ill success of this expedition, meditated a second attempt on the coast of Britanny, but this plan proved as abortive as the former.

The fortress of Luxembourg surrendered on the 7th of June, to the republicans, and the garrison engaged to take an oath, according to the terms of the capitulation, not to serve against the republic, or her allies, till they were exchanged. They were to be conducted to the right side of the Rhine, and to cross the river at Coblentz.

As some compensation for these losses on the part of the Austrians and their British ally, the republican army under general Jourdan, was obliged to fall back from Mentz, and on its retreat towards the Rhine, experienced several trifling defeats.

The republican forces in the West Indies, by the reduction of Guadaloupe, acquired property belonging to the emigrants, to a vast amount, and colonial commodities in abundance. A great number of vessels were taken from the English, most of which were either sunk or burned; and slavery was abolished in the French colonies, which, as a necessary consequence, was attended with the destruction of the English planters. To add to these misfortunes, a dreadful fire broke out at Montego Bay, in the island of Jamaica, on the 14th of June, which destroyed an hundred and ten houses, and an immense quantity of merchandize. This was succeeded by a more serious calamity—a war with the Maroons, who inhabited the mountainous part of that extensive island.

Towards the close of the year, an event occurred in the South, to compensate the losses the British nation had sustained in the West. This was the reduction of the Cape of Good Hope, on the 16th of September, by admiral Elphinstone and general Clarke. An attempt to surprize the most considerable out-posts failed; and, though the English repelled a fierce attack, their adversaries were not deterred from preparing for a general engagement. At this instant, the appearance of a British reinforcement at sea, commanded by major-general Clarke, checked the ardour of the enemy. At Wynberg, the Dutch attempted to resist, but were soon driven from their post. The governor then proposed a cessation of hostilities, that terms of capitulation might be adjusted. It was agreed, on the 16th of September, 1795, that the troops should be considered as prisoners of war, and that the property of the Dutch East India Company should be delivered up to the captors of the settlement. Private possessions, and civil rights were, however, left inviolate.

On the 28th of October, the ratification of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between his majesty and the United States of America, signed on the 19th of November last, was exchanged by lord Grenville, his majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, with William Allen Dias, Esq. chargé d'affairs from the United States.

Among the naval exploits of the day, that of the honourable captain Cochrane demands our notice. Being ordered by rear-admiral Murray to cruise off the Chesapeak, with his majesty's ship the Thetis, accompanied by the Hussar, commanded by captain Beresford, an action was commenced and gallantly maintained against five ships of the enemy, when two of the latter were taken, viz. La Prevoyante, pierced for twenty-six guns, but mounting only twenty-four, and the Raison, carrying eighteen guns, though pierced for twenty-four. The Thetis had eight men killed, and two wounded: the Hussar had only two wounded.

The naval war, however, was not so fortunately concluded as it commenced. On the 7th of October, the British Mediterranean fleet, which originally consisted of upwards of sixty merchant ships homeward-bound, richly laden, under the convoy of three ships of the line and four frigates, were overtaken off Cape St. Vincent, by a French fleet, commanded by admiral Richery, consisting of nine ships of the line and several frigates. On discovering the French fleet, the British commodore made the signal immediately to wear and stand from them. The French frigates were, however, previously dispatched to prevent the escape of the merchant ships; and admiral Richery, by employing a press of sail, cut off the retreat of one of the British ships of the line, the Censeur, of seventy-four guns, which had previously lost her main-top-mast. But the attention of the French being chiefly directed to the capture of the convoy, the Bedford and Formidable, with the other ships of war, found means to escape, keeping up a smart fire from their stern chases. The number of vessels belonging to this fleet taken by admiral Richery, amounted to thirty-one.

On the 19th of October, the London Gazette contained a proclamation of the king of Great Britain, granting general reprisals against all ships, goods, and subjects of the United Provinces.

The British parliament were summoned to meet on the 29th of October, on which occasion we lament to relate the daring outrages which were offered to his majesty, on his passage to and from the house of lords. He proceeded from the palace to open the session of parliament, at the usual hour; and the crowd in St. James's Park, which is always considerable on these occasions, was at this time much greater than usual. As the royal carriage passed along the park, the predominant exclamations were, "Peace!—Peace!—Give us bread!—No Pitt!—No famine!—No war!"—It was likewise said, that a few persons were heard to exclaim, "Down with George!" or words to that effect. In the Park, and in the streets adjacent to Westminster Hall, some stones and other hostile substances were thrown, nine of which, it is asserted, struck the state coach. On his majesty's return from the house, those outrages were renewed, and after he had alighted at St. James's, the populace attacked the state carriage, and in the way through Pall Mall to the Mews, it was almost demolished (o).

Four witnesses of what occurred in the course of the day were severally examined at the bar of the house of lords, on the evening of the 29th, and a copy of the minutes of the evidence was communicated to the house of commons on the following day (p). On the 31st a proclamation was issued offering a reward of a thousand pounds, to (o) The treatment his majesty received in passing to and from the house of lords, was imputed to the intrigues of the seditious members of the London Corresponding Society. This, however, was supposed to be without foundation.

(p) Among the several witnesses examined to these facts, were John Walford, of Pall Mall, a constable, who deposed, that on entering Parliament Street, he observed one man in particular among the crowd, very active, running by the side of the coach and exclaiming, "No war!—Down with George!" and on their entrance into Palace Yard, he observed something come with great velocity from the foot pavement as he thought; on which he observed to Mr. Stockdale, his brother constable, "Good God! the glass is broken!" This man repeated the exclamation of "Down with George!" again; upon which he immediately seized him; and under the protection of the horse guards, conducted him to the court-yard of St. James's, where he left him.

On the same evening some persons taken into custody upon suspicion of having insulted his majesty, were examined at the public-office, Bow Street. The first was Kidd Wake, aged twenty-seven: he was a journeyman printer. Lemon Caseby, a constable, deposed, that he observed the prisoner, soon after the carriage had entered the park, hiss, groan, and call out, "No war!" vehemently and repeatedly. The witness endeavoured to secure him, but fell down in the attempt; when he rose, he observed the prisoner again in the same act. After his majesty alighted at the house of lords, a Mr. Walford came up, and observed to the witness and other peace officers, that he should know the man who broke the glass of the coach, describing him to wear a green coat with a black collar. The prisoner said he was in the service of Mr. Noble, a printer; was a married man; and by hissing and groaning at his majesty, he meant to let the king see "he was dissatisfied at the war."

On the next morning Kidd Wake was brought before the sitting magistrates for re-examination, when Mr. Walford, above mentioned, came forward, and deposed, that as soon as he joined the procession as a constable, he observed to Mr. Stockdale, his brother officer, how very particularly active the prisoner was in hissing, hooting, and calling out "No war!" As the procession was passing from the Horse Guards, towards Carleton House gates, six or seven stones were thrown at the carriage; and about the same time the stones were flung, he observed the prisoner stoop two or three times; but whether he flung any of the stones he could not positively say. The prisoner, Kidd Wake, was re-committed for further examination. He at length was brought to trial, and con-to any persons, other than those actually concerned in doing any act by which his majesty's royal person was immediately endangered, who should give information, so that any of the authors or abettors in that outrage might be apprehended and brought to justice.

On the 30th of October, the minutes of the evidence of the witnesses examined in the house of lords was communicated to the house of commons. The reading of this evidence being closed, the commons unanimously agreed to the address they had received for their concurrence, and a message was sent to acquaint the lords therewith (r).

On the 4th of November, another proclamation was issued. It began by announcing, that, immediately before the opening of the present session of parliament, a number of persons were collected in the fields in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, by advertisements and hand-bills, and that many inflammatory discourses were delivered to the persons so collected, tending to create groundless jealousy, and discontent, and to endanger the public peace; and that such proceedings were followed, on the day on which the session of parliament commenced, by acts of tumult and violence, to the imminent danger of his majesty's person. And further, that uneasiness and anxiety had been raised in the minds of his majesty's faithful subjects, by rumours and apprehensions that seditious assemblies were intended to be held, by evil disposed persons; that it was therefore thought necessary to enjoin and require all justices of peace, sheriffs, and all well-disposed persons, to discourage and suppress all seditious and unlawful assemblies, and the distribution of all seditious papers and publications.

Notwithstanding the outrages which had taken place, during his majesty's progress to and from the house, the session of parliament was opened as usual by a speech from the throne, but the address was suspended, the house having resolved itself into a committee of privileges, in consequence of the atrocious insults recently offered to his majesty's person.

In the house of lords, on the 6th of November, lord Grenville, after some prefaratory remarks, recapitulating the causes which had given rise to the late proclamation, presented a bill, entitled, "An Act for the Preservation of his Majesty's Person against treasonable and seditious Practices and Attempts." At the same time he moved for the printing and second reading of the bill.

The bill was opposed in all its stages by the earl of Lauderdale, and the dukes of Bedford and Norfolk. The noblemen in opposition expressed their concern for the outrages offered to his majesty, but deprecated the evils which would arise from the bill, as tending to effect a total alteration of the laws respecting treason, and a most dangerous innovation upon the constitution of the realm.

Lord Grenville, the earl of Mansfield, and the bishop of Rochester, strenuously contended for the propriety of passing the bill, on the ground alledged on presenting and moving for its being taken into consideration, by the noble secretary of state. The learned prelate, in the course of other remarks in support of the bill, adopted an expression which has since been often noticed, that he did not know "what the mass of the people in any country had to do with the laws but to obey them."

The earl of Lauderdale and the duke of Bedford expressed their astonishment at the assertion of the noble prelate: the former observed, that if he had been in Turkey, and heard such a declaration from the mouth of a mufti, he should have attributed it to his ignorance; but to hear it from a British prelate, filled him with indignation.

In its progress through the house, some amendments took place, after particular discussion; and on the 16th of November, the bill passed the house of lords, but a protest was entered on the journals against it. Notwithstanding the tyrannical complexion of this bill, it baffled every attack, being supported by all the influence of power (s).

On the passing of the bill, a message was then sent from the lords to the commons, informing them that they had passed an act for the preservation of his majesty from treasonable acts, and desiring their concurrence in the same. The bill, after much altercation, passed the house on the 10th of December. It is needless to recapitulate the arguments adduced upon this occasion, as they were similar in their tendency to those advanced in the house of lords.

Another bill, to nearly the same effect, originated in the house of commons, on the 10th of November. The chancellor of the exchequer, after a prefatory speech, moved, "That leave be given to bring in a bill for the more effectually preventing seditious meetings and assemblies."

The introduction of the bill was warmly opposed by Mr. Fox, Mr. Stanley, Mr. Halhed, Mr. Grey, and Mr. Sheridan. It was contended, that if such alarming proceedings took place, and such seditious meetings were held, the speakers were amenable to law, and, when found guilty, were liable to adequate punishment; that the present bill was a libel on the loyalty of Englishmen; that the interference of a magistrate at a public meeting of peaceable subjects would be an arbitrary measure; and, on the whole, it militated against the liberty of the subject.

Sir William Pulteney, Mr. alderman Lushington, Mr. Wilberforce, and Mr. Windham, spoke in favour of the bill. It was averred, on their part, that in such inflammatory assemblies as those in question, where sedition was copiously dealt out to the multitude, there ought to be something to save the public mind from imbibing the insidious poison; that it was the business and duty of le-convicted of hooting, groaning, and hissing at the king; for which he was sentenced to be confined for several years in the penitentiary house at Gloucester, and to stand in the pillory.

(r) The following are the copies of the address, and answer:

Address of both Houses of Parliament to his Majesty, on the daring Outrages committed on the 29th of October, 1795.

"Most gracious Sovereign,

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons in parliament assembled, beg leave to approach your majesty, humbly to express to your majesty our indignation and abhorrence at the daring outrages offered to your majesty in your majesty's passage to and from your parliament. We cannot reflect without the utmost concern, that there should be found within your majesty's dominions, any person so insensible of the happiness which all your majesty's subjects derive from your majesty's just and mild government, and of the virtues which so eminently distinguish your majesty's character, as to be capable of these flagitious acts: and we beg leave humbly to lay before your majesty, the earnest wishes of your faithful lords and commons, in which we are confident we shall be joined by all descriptions of your majesty's subjects, that you will be graciously pleased to direct the most effectual measures to be taken, without delay, to discover the authors and abettors of crimes so atrocious."

ANSWER.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I receive, with great pleasure, this additional proof of your uniform zeal and loyalty. I have too much reason to be assured of the affectionate and steady attachment of my people at large, to have felt any other sentiment upon this occasion, than that of concern at so high a violation of the laws. I shall not fail to give such directions as may tend to bring to justice and punishment, the persons concerned in an offence so dangerous to the public tranquillity, and so injurious to our excellent constitution."

(s) Protest against the Bill entitled, "An Act for the Safety and Preservation of his Majesty's Person and Government, against Treasonable and Seditious Practices and Attempts.

"Dissentient,

"1. Because we conceive this bill to be founded on a false pretence. It recites a daring outrage on his majesty's person, (which we feel with the utmost horror) and purports to provide further remedies against such practices, while, in reality, it affords no additional security whatever to his majesty's person, and leaves us to regret a deep and irreparable injury to the laws and constitution of our country, by making the compassing, imagining, inventing, and devising the levying war, a substantive treason; thereby departing in a most dangerous and unjustifiable manner, from the statute of the twenty-fifth of Edward the Third, the salutary provisions of which we cannot be tempted to abandon, by the example of temporary statutes, whose doubtful policy stands in opposition to a law, in which the wisdom of our ancestors has been so repeatedly recognized by the legislature, and so strongly confirmed by the permanent experience of its benefits.

"2. Because the free discussion of the administration of government in all its branches, by writing, speaking, and meeting for the purpose of representing grievances to any of the three branches of the legislature, has afforded the best protection to the liberties of the people, and is the undoubted inherent right of Englishmen. Yet this bill erects into a high misdemeanor, the exercise of this most valuable privilege, and inflicts in certain cases the pains and penalties of transportation, for the offences which it creates; a punishment in the case of misdemeanors, thus generally constituted, as unprecedented in the history of our laws, as it is unnecessary and unconstitutional.

"3. Because the extension of the treason laws, and the creating new misdemeanors, is an alarming encroachment on the security of the subject, and affords no additional protection to his majesty's person and government: for the state of every king, ruler, and governor of any realm, dominion, or commonwealth, standeth and consisteth more assured by the love and favour of the subjects toward their sovereign, ruler, and governor, than in the dread and fear of those laws with rigorous pains and extreme punishments, which have at all times disgraced our code. History, however, shews us, that by succeeding legislatures, our statute book has, with every mark of generous indignation, been uniformly cleared of these temporary and unconstitutional excrescences; a circumstance which we now regard as a solemn warning against creating new and unheard of misdemeanors, or altering the treason laws of our country.

gislators to apply remedies for public evils, as occasion required; and that, if the magistrate exceeded his powers, he might be punished, as there was no fear that liberty would be surrendered in a country where the juries were judges.

A very great majority of the house decided in favour of the bill, which was accordingly brought in; and after warm debates, it passed into a law, by vote of the usual majority which supported the measures of administration. It was then taken up to the lords, and on the 14th of December, passed the house, though protested against by several of the noble members (t).

While these two bills were under discussion in the houses of parliament, the public mind was much agitated, and parties proceeded to very intemperate extremities, in opposing and defending the principles on which they were founded, according to the declaration of the partizans of government.

On the 11th of November, the Whig Club of England met at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, when his grace the duke of Bedford was in the chair. They resolved, "that they would give every aid to the civil magistrate, in detecting and bringing to punishment the persons concerned in the daring attack made upon his majesty, in his passage to parliament, on the first day of the session: that, lamenting as they did, this nefarious act, they saw with the utmost concern, that it had been used as a pretext for introducing into parliament a bill striking at the liberty of the press, and the freedom of public discussion. That it was highly expedient, that meetings of the people in their respective districts, should be immediately called to consider this important subject, and for the purpose of petitioning parliament against the said bill, or any other measure which might tend to infringe the rights of the people of Great Britain."

This meeting of the Whigs was very generally attended. All the members of both houses of parliament belonging to the club were present, to the number of near fifty lords and members of the house of commons.

A great number of the members of the corresponding society, and others of the populace assembled on the 12th of November, in a field near Copenhagen House. An address, remonstrance, and petition to his majesty, was proposed, imploring his majesty to exert his royal authority to maintain and preserve inviolate the rights and liberties of his subjects, then about to be invaded, by the two bills impending in parliament. A petition to the lords spiritual and temporal, nearly to the same purport, was also read; and, lastly, one to the commons of Great Britain, stating it to be the petition of nearly four hundred thousand Britons, inhabitants of London, and its environs, assembled together in the open air, to express their free sentiments, according to the tenure of the bill of rights, on the subject of the threatened invasion of their constitutional liberties.

The association against republicans and levellers, well known by the appellation of Mr. Reeves's society, met at the Crown and Anchor, about the same time, and agreed to an address to his majesty, highly approving of the measures that had been taken, and of the two bills pending in parliament. The example of the Whig Club was immediately followed by the livery of the city of London, the electors of Westminster, the freeholders of Middlesex; and by several counties, and almost every considerable town in the kingdom; wherever a meeting was publicly called, the decision was almost unanimous.

At a very numerous and respectable meeting, of merchants, bankers, manufacturers, and other inhabitants of the city of London, consisting of upwards of eight hundred persons, convened by public advertisement, at the Paul's Head Tavern, Cateaton Street, on the 25th of November, to take into consideration, an humble and affectionate petition to the king, most ardently beseeching him to dismiss his present ministers from his presence and councils, and to adopt measures for the purpose of speedily obtaining for his distressed subjects, the blessings of peace, Samuel Ferrand Waddington, esquire, in the chair, It was resolved (with only twenty-five dissentient voices) that the critical and calamitous state of these kingdoms demands an immediate peace; and it is the opinion of this meeting, that his majesty's ministers have lost the confidence of the people. That an humble petition be presented to his majesty; praying that he would be graciously pleased to adopt measures for immediately procuring to his distressed subjects the blessings of peace, and to dismiss his present ministers from his presence and councils.

At another meeting held at the London Tavern, in Bishopsgate Street, November the 27th, Samuel Bosanquet, esquire, in the chair: It was unanimously resolved, that it is expedient in the present important crisis, that a meeting should be convened of such merchants, bankers, traders, and other inhabitants of London, as have not joined in the proceedings of some meetings, lately held at the Paul's Head Tavern, Cateaton Street, purporting to be meetings of "the merchants, bankers, manufacturers, traders, and other inhabitants of the city of London;" in order to take into consideration the propriety of making a declaration to the public, that they have had no concern in the proceedings and resolutions of those meetings; but that, on the contrary, they are of opinion it has become necessary for parliament to adopt some temporary measures for the more essential support of peace and good order.

Another meeting was afterwards held on the 2nd of December, when Samuel Bosanquet, esquire, again appeared in the chair; and the same description of people, resolved "to support, by every means in their power, the ancient and most excellent constitution of Great Britain, and a government by king, lords, and commons, and to exert their best endeavours to impress on the minds of those connected with them, a reverence for, and a due submission to, the laws of their country, which have hitherto preserved the liberty, protected the property, and increased the enjoyments of a free and prosperous people."

Nothing remarkable occurred in the speeches for and against the usual addresses, on his majesty's speech to both houses, on the 29th of October. The necessity of a continued war was strongly urged by one party, and by the other a negociation as strongly recommended. Mr. Fox censured the king's speech for giving a partial view of the situation of affairs, but the minister, as usual, defended its propriety.

The chancellor of the exchequer, on the 30th, moved in the commons for a committee for the extension, during another twelvemonth, of the bill of the last session, allowing the importation of corn duty free. But upon some further conversation upon the subject, Mr. Ryder moved for leave to bring in a bill to alter the existing laws relative to the price of bread, to prohibit the manufacture of starch from wheat or other articles of provision, and to lower the duties upon its importation; for continuing the prohibition of distilling from articles of grain; and for removing all obstructions to the free passage of grain within the kingdom; which was carried unanimously.

On bringing up the report of the select committee respecting the high price of corn by Mr. Ryder, it appeared, from the fullest information which the committee had been able to procure, that, except in the article of wheat, the crops had been abundant; so that, by the proper mixture of different grains, a considerable alleviation of the evils of the present scarcity might be made; and this was the more necessary, as from different causes, the price of grain in America, the Mediterranean, and the northern parts of Europe, was exorbitantly dear, and an adequate supply could not be depended upon. After full consideration of the means of obtaining a supply, the committee thought proper to leave the trade perfectly open, and to grant a bounty upon the importation. This bounty was twenty shillings upon every quarter, and fifteen shillings upon every barrel, imported from the Mediterranean, till three hundred thousand quarters should be imported. The bounty upon corn imported from America was fixed at fifteen shillings the quarter, and ten shillings the barrel, till five hundred thousand quarters should be imported. A bounty of five shillings a quarter, and three shillings a barrel, rel, upon Indian corn or meal, till five hundred thousand quarters should be imported.

The committee to consider of the high price of corn, in the mean time, entered into an engagement to reduce the consumption of wheat in their own families one-third, by every possible expedient. This measure, which provided no legislative remedy for an evil of such magnitude, was pointedly animadverted upon by lords Lauderdale, Lansdowne, and Thurlow, as "silly, futile, and even ridiculous." The engagement was, however, signed, not only by the committee, but by several members of both houses of parliament.

Many important regulations were made by the committee, respecting weights and scales, the tolls of millers, &c. which formed the basis of succeeding acts of parliament. Sir John Sinclair about the same time brought forward a motion, founded upon resolutions of the board of agriculture, for the cultivation of the waste lands. In consequence, therefore, of recommendations from the board, several inclosure bills passed the house in the course of the session.

On the 7th of December, the minister thought proper to open the budget. He said, upon this occasion, that he thought it necessary to give the general state of receipt and expenditure, as it would tend to prove that the finances of this country were equal to every emergency; and that Great Britain could furnish the means for carrying on the war for years, if necessary, without burthening its people, or injuring its trade. He then proceeded to state the particulars, and specify the ways and means for raising the sum adequate to the necessary supplies; the total amount of which was twenty-seven millions four hundred and eighty-five thousand pounds.

The business of the loan (which amounted to eighteen millions) created long and animated debates in the house of commons; both as to the manner of its negociation, and the allowance made to the contractors.

Mr. Fox, and several members in the opposition, reprobated the loan as not only disgraceful in itself, but as it would be a pernicious precedent in future times. The house, after much opposition, agreed to go into a close committee, which all members who pleased were allowed to attend. This committee, after sitting a considerable time, and examining several witnesses, completed their report, which was brought up by Mr. W. Smith, who moved a string of resolutions, establishing the principle of an open competition—that the loan was bad and improvident—and that the minister, in adjusting the terms, had been guilty of a departure from his own principles, and of a breach of his duty.

Arguments respecting the budget, and the distribution of the consequent loans, are generally considered as momentary. Calculations, accurate as well as erroneous, are brought forward; and undue influence, or corruption, is always sure to be alledged, as matters almost of course. A little irregularity appeared in this business respecting the antedating of some bills, and dating them from Hamburg, but no fraud appeared in the transaction. Mr. Long, therefore, moved the previous question.

Sir William Pulteney vindicated the whole transaction. It had been asserted, that the bill had been drawn on unstamped paper; he observed, that had they been stamped, government must have been paid. It was only saving government the trouble of paying with one hand, and receiving with the other.

The previous question, which had been moved by Mr. Long, was carried by a majority of eighty-five. On the second resolution, the ayes were eight, noes one hundred and eight.

It is remarkable that, during the discussion of the two coërcive bills, each house received a message from the king, in which he signified his inclination to meet any negociation on the part of the enemy, with a desire to give it the speediest effect in producing a peace.

On the following day, Mr. Pitt moved an address in reply. He observed, that the sentiments expressed in the message, were conformable to those delivered from the throne at the commencement of the session, with a view to the formation of a government in France, with which a secure and honourable peace might be concluded. He renewed those sentiments as applicable to the present French government, the recent successes of our allies, and the embarrassment of the enemy's financial system.

Mr. Sheridan, in reply to Mr. Pitt, on the import of his majesty's message, insisted on the propriety and necessity of not considering any particular form of government in France as necessary for the establishment of peace. If the present circumstances in France only were admitted as a ground for negociation, any change might be considered as a ground for discontinuing any treaty which was begun: he hoped the form of government in France might be no bar to negociation, whenever a peace could be safely effected; and that his majesty would be pleased to order an immediate negociation to commence.

Mr. Grey stated that several continental powers had concluded treaties with the French, which had never been violated. Upon the whole, he wished ministers to be enjoined really to negociate by the terms of the amendment, which declared the government of France no bar to this business.

The chancellor of the exchequer contended, that, if the amendment, and the advice of its promoters, was adopted, the discretion of government would be entirely taken away, and the responsibility doubled.

Mr. Fox in reply, contended that the amendment did not go beyond the extent of the message: it only declared that there were no impediments to treating, in the form of the government in France. In supporting the amendment, he was far from arguing against the address; he was, in fact, supporting it by what gave it meaning and force. On every account, Mr. Fox said, he thought it necessary to bind ministers to make peace. It was an erroneous opinion, that it was constantly disadvantageous to a power at war to be the first to offer terms of peace: the experience of history proved the reverse; and were peace offered to the French on reasonable terms, it would not be in the power of the directory, or the council of ancients, nor the two houses joined together, to refuse the terms. The people would force them to agree to them. Mr. Fox particularly observed, that a better season for treating than the present, might not occur for a very long period of time.

Mr. Pitt wished this affair might be left to the discretion of the ministry; and the allies of Great Britain ought to be consulted on such a measure. Steps, he said, had already been taken to ascertain the disposition of the enemy; and, if there should be a prospect of an honourable peace, the opportunity would be readily embraced. After a few observations from general Smith in favour of the amendment, and a short reply from Mr. Sheridan, the amendment was negatived without a division, and the address carried.

A few days after the address was carried in the house of commons, his majesty's message was brought down to the lords by lord Grenville, who moved the address to the same import with that voted by the house of commons, and, after a short debate, a great majority determined in its favour, and it was, according to the usual forms, presented to his majesty.

On the 7th of January, 1796, the princess of Wales was happily delivered of a princess, at Carlton House. The duke of Gloucester, the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord chancellor, the lord president, the duke of Leeds, the duke of Devonshire, the lord chamberlain, the master of the horse, the prince of Wales, lord Thurlow, and the ladies of her royal highness's bed-chamber were present. This event was made known by the firing of the Tower guns, and other demonstrations of joy in London and Westminster (u).

On

(u) As the following transaction reflects honour on the feelings of the prince of Wales, it claims the attention of our readers. On the 6th of February, at a court of common council of the city of London, the lord mayor rose to state to the court, a conference he had had with the prince of Wales, on the subject of not receiving the congratulatory address of the city on the birth of a princess, in the usual form; observing, that in a matter of so delicate a nature, he had thought it his duty to commit the purport of this conversation in writing, which, with the leave of the court, he would wish to be read. The communication was as follows:—'In consequence of a letter from lord Cholmondeley, dated January 31, 1796, stating that his royal highness the prince of Wales wished to speak to me at Carlton House, and to give me a private audience, I had the honour of waiting on his royal highness, who addressed me, by saying, "that he had seen with concern in the public papers, a statement of what had passed in the court of common council, on Thursday last, respecting a letter written by lord Cholmondeley, at the command of his royal highness, and sent to the city remembrancer, conveying his sentiments on the intended address of congratulation to their royal highnesses, which sentiments he conceived had been mistaken or misunderstood; or at least a very different construction had been given to them than he meant, or was intended to be conveyed by that letter. His royal highness said, that he thought it incumbent on him to preserve a consistent

On the first of February, their majesties were grossly insulted on their way from Drury Lane Theatre to Buckingham House, by a banditti of ruffians. One of these misguided men, in Covent Garden, opposite Southampton Street, threw a stone, brick, or some other hard substance, which struck, with great violence, one of his majesty's servants standing behind the carriage; and, as it was passing along Pall-Mall, a second stone was thrown by one of the ruffians, which broke one of the glasses, and fell into the lap of lady Harrington, who was then lady in waiting.

The indefatigable Mr. Grey speedily brought forward another debate. He declared, in the house of commons, that he thought it his duty to observe, that from the message delivered from his majesty, a general expectation of the return of peace had been excited, and a general desire of knowing whether that much wished event was still at a distance, or whether we were still to prosecute the war? As the chancellor of the exchequer said he did not think it incumbent on him to answer such a question at present, Mr. Grey proceeded to give notice of his intended motion for peace, which he accordingly brought into the house on the 15th of that month. Prefatory to his motion, Mr. Grey observed, that, contrary to the hopes that had been rationally formed, no negociation for peace had taken place, but that ministers appeared determined to prosecute the contest to extremity: the expedient was now recurred to of deluding the people with the hopes of peace, while they were determined to persevere in the system of warfare. He enumerated the disasters which had arisen in the different campaigns, and the repeated motions which had been submitted to the house, for the purpose of promoting a negociation with the enemy. Another campaign was about to take place, and the emperor was to have another loan. He concluded with moving, that an humble address be presented to his majesty, stating, that it is the wish of this house, that his majesty may be graciously pleased to take such steps as to his royal wisdom shall appear most proper, for communicating directly to the executive directory of the French republic, his majesty's readiness to meet any disposition to negociation on the part of that government, with an earnest desire to give it the fullest and speediest effect.

The chancellor of the exchequer said, that however he might be disposed to favour the object which the motion appeared to have principally in view, he could not concede to the grounds on which it had been followed up. The state of the country was very different from that held out, and no temporary reverse in the fortune of the war, no internal pressure had yet produced that humiliation which he suggested. He said, the progress of measures which were necessary in the present situation of affairs, could, however, only be left safely to the conduct of the executive government. He farther observed, that it was important for the supporters of the motion, to consider, whether the measures which they might wish to recommend, were such as might oblige the country to give up the chance of a successful peace altogether, or to make it on terms inconsistent with the honour of the nation. An honourable peace, he contended, could only be had by perseverance in the vigorous conduct we had hitherto pursued.

Mr. Fox concluded a very eloquent speech upon this occasion, in the following emphatic terms: let us manifest to the world a spirit of moderation, and this night address his majesty to commence a negociation with the republic of France. I say, republic, for there is more in names than we can imagine. He concluded by declaring, that he wished not for a dishonourable peace, or peace on any other terms than such as were worthy the character and situation of the country, but such it was his decided opinion might be obtained. On the division of the house, there appeared for Mr. Grey's motion, fifty; against it, one hundred and eighty-nine.

In the month of April, the house of commons was engaged in a warm debate relative to the expedition in the West Indies. Several motions were made and negatived, and others carried; and thus terminated, for the present, after long uninteresting debates, this political contest, without effecting the purpose for which it was brought on the tapis.

Colonel John Fenton Cawthorne, of the royal Westminster regiment of militia, was found guilty (by a court martial assembled at the Horse Guards) on the 24th of March, 1796, of receiving and applying to his own use, the marching guineas allowed by the militia act, and of several acts of peculation; particularly of receiving money to excuse persons from serving in the militia, and putting it in his own pocket, without providing substitutes, &c. On twelve charges he was adjudged to have acted in a scandalous and infamous manner, unbecoming the character of an officer and a gentleman; he was therefore sentenced to be cashiered, and declared incapable of ever serving his majesty in future. In consequence of this sentence, colonel Cawthorne was afterward expelled from the house of commons. His sentence, by his majesty's order, was read at the head of every militia regiment in the kingdom.

Intelligence was received in London, on the 28th of March, that the Dædalus transport, from Port Jackson, in New South Wales, on her passage home, touched at Otaheite. There, to the astonishment of the captain and crew, they found nine of their countrymen married, settled, and living in the greatest ease and comfort; who, being asked how they came there, informed them, that they sailed from England, in a South Sea whaler, belonging to Messieurs Calvert and Co. called the Amelia, which had the misfortune to bulge upon a rock. Finding it impossible to save the ship, or any part of the stores, they got into the boat, committed themselves to the mercy of the waves, and were safely wafted to the shores of Otaheite. The natives, not unaccustomed to the colour of their skin, or the sound of their language, received them with every token of affection and joy; assigned them lands, and servants to cultivate them; adopted them into the order of nobility, and, as a proof of the insignia of their elevation, tattowed them from top to bottom.

In the beginning of May, the general conduct of administration came under discussion in the house of lords, on the motion of the marquis of Lansdowne, respecting some government papers, for the production of which he had previously moved. His lordship reminded the house, that so long ago as the 15th of December, 1779, and the 8th of December, 1780, he had proposed two motions, in order to suggest that system of public operations with which it was his wish that the resolutions then to be brought forward, should be followed. In this system he had been supported by many of the present administration, who appeared to have since abandoned it. He therefore wished to afford them an opportunity of shewing whether they still adhered to their former resolution, "that the influence of the crown was increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished;" or, if they had apostatized, that the public should be in possession of documents upon which to form an impartial estimate of their character. He said he wished to draw the attention of the house to some very interesting particulars; which having enumerated, he observed, that time would fail him in mentioning all the measures which had been introduced and sanctioned by the present administration, and he was tired with inspecting the red book, that register of corruption. Yet all this had taken place under the conduct of some noble lords, who came into office abetting the principle "that the influence of the crown had increased, was increasing, and ought to be diminished." The marquis further said, that perceiving no effectual steps taken to realize those measures of reform, for which ministers at their entrance into office stood pledged, or those recommended by commissioners appointed by parliament, it was necessary to inquire into so extraordinary an omission, as well as whether any new offices had been created?—Whether any old salaries had been increased on slight pretences?—Whether any salaries had been granted for special purposes, and continued when the reason for them ceased?—Whether any warrant for beneficial grants had been directed?—And, on the whole, whether the public expences had increased beyond the supplies annually granted by parliament?

consistent character; that as his establishment, for certain reasons, had been reduced, and that the necessary state appendages attached to the character and rank of prince of Wales, did not in consequence exist, his royal highness conceiving he could not receive an address in state, and particularly from the corporation of the city of London, for which he entertained the highest veneration and respect. His royal highness therefore thought it would appear disrespectful to the first corporate body in the kingdom, to receive the members of it inconsistently with their character and his own dignity."

The prince of Wales, on the 7th of February, received in private the congratulatory compliments of both houses of parliament, presented by committees, in consequence of his royal highness, from having reduced his establishment, being unable to receive them with the proper dignities of his rank.

liament? His lordship proceeded to censure the war as bloody and profuse beyond example, and our situation on the whole as calling for the most accurate investigation; and concluded with moving for an enquiry into the several abuses which he had pointed out.

The arguments and motion of the noble marquis were supported by the earls of Lauderdale and Moira, and opposed by lords Auckland, Hawkesbury, and earl Spencer. Lord Auckland entered into an elaborate statement of the difference of our prosperity in the years 1783 and 1795, to prove the great advantages on the side of the latter. When the house divided, there appeared for the motion of the marquis of Lansdowne twelve, against it one hundred and four!

On the 6th of May, Mr. Grey brought several accusations against ministers, on which he grounded a motion for impeachment. He observed, that the power of the purse was the best security for the liberty of the people; and this the house would not allow to be incroached upon without betraying a most sacred trust, and violating a most valuable privilege. This duty was still more important from the magnitude of expence which they had to superintend. It was, he stated, his intention to confine his motion to three plain and simple considerations; first, that ministers had violated the express stipulations of the appropriation act, by applying grants to different services than those for which they had been voted; secondly, that they had presented false accounts to the house to conceal this infraction; and, thirdly, that they had violated another law for regulating the office of paymaster-general of the army. He desired the house to consider, that there was an act passed every sessions, after the grants for the year were made, appropriating certain sums to certain purposes respecting the different articles in the army. By a paper on the table, he would, however, shew that this act had in many instances been violated. He said, that if a necessity for such a violation had existed, ministers were bound to come to parliament for an act of indemnity as speedily as possible, and to state the reasons for such a necessity. They, however, had acted on the contrary. They had endeavoured to conceal the infraction of the law from the eye of scrutiny by a confused account, and thus afforded additional ground for the severest censure. By papers on the table it appeared, that to the 21st of August, 1795, for the quarter preceding, eight millions of the grants of the current year had been expended, and still these arrears remained due. The premier acknowledged that some irregularities had occurred; but nothing criminal had been wilfully committed. Upon a variety of instances which he adduced, Mr. Grey formed fifteen resolutions, the last of which stated, that "in the instances mentioned, his majesty's minister had been guilty of presenting false accounts, calculated to mislead the judgement of the house, of a flagrant violation of various acts of parliament, and a gross misapplication of the public money."

Mr. Pitt ably replied to the several allegations of Mr. Grey; he cited many precedents, and endeavoured to exculpate ministers from the charges exhibited against them by the Whigs. Mr. Steele moved the previous question, when there appeared two hundred and nine votes against thirty-eight, in favour of the minister.

On the 10th of May an important motion was made in both houses of parliament, respecting a change of measures in regard to external politics. That in the house of lords was moved for by the earl of Guildford, who, after reciting a variety of instances to prove the misconduct of ministers in carrying on the war, moved for an address at great length, concluding with declaring, that the house thought itself bound in duty to his majesty, to profess they saw no rational hope of redeeming the affairs of the kingdom, but by the adoption of a system radically different from that which had produced the present calamities.

The same motion which had been introduced by the earl of Guildford in the house of lords, was brought forward on the same day by Mr. Fox in the house of commons, and with the same effect. He satirized the rashness which had driven the nation into a war, and the incapacity manifested in the progress of it. In the former there appeared, upon a division for the question, ten against one hundred and ten! In the latter, the ayes for the motion were forty-two against two hundred and sixteen!

The minister at this period seemed to be driven to his wit's end for money; therefore, in April, two strange political phœnomena presented themselves; these were a second budget, and a second loan in the same session. The subject of the second budget produced a long debate, in which Mr. Grey took the lead on the opposition to the minister. Mr. alderman Newnham made some pointed observations on the partial manner in which the business of the loan had been conducted; but when the resolutions were put, they were agreed to without a division; and the new tax bills which the minister brought forward in consequence of his second budget, were all passed into laws, without any further alteration, a few days before the conclusion of the session.

Mr. Wilberforce, according to annual custom, again moved for the abolition of the slave trade. He observed, that the first of January, 1796, was the period allotted by the house for the abolition of this infamous and detestable traffic. The motion was opposed by general Tarleton, Mr. Dundas, and a considerable number of members; but it was ably supported by Mr. Pitt, Mr. serjeant Adair, and Mr. Fox. To the regret of the friends of humanity, the narrow views of interest and policy prevailed over every consideration of religion and justice. The house would not even receive a bill proposed by Mr. Francis for improving the condition of the slaves in the British West India islands.

The session was closed as usual by a speech from the throne, on the 19th of May, in which his majesty announced his intention of giving immediate directions for calling a new parliament, extolled the regard both houses had paid to the safety and welfare of his people, in the provisions they had made for suppressing sedition and civil tumult, and for restraining the progress of principles subversive of all established governments. He signified the greatest satisfaction in observing the difficulties arising to his subjects, from the high price of corn, being in a great degree removed; and thanked the commons for their very liberal supplies. On the following day the parliament was dissolved by proclamation; and thus terminated a parliament, concerning whose transactions a more impartial account may be expected from posterity, than from the writers of the present age.

During the time that the belligerent powers on the Rhine were collecting their forces to open the campaign of 1796, as soon as the time limited for the armistice should expire, the civil war in the western departments of France was hastening to a conclusion: after several defeats of the different rebel armies, and the capture and death of their leaders, Charette (v) and Stoflet, the remainder of the insurgents, classed under the names of Chouans and Vendeans, harassed on every side, submitted to the forces of the republic, or to the magistrates of the several communes, and peace was finally restored to that desolated department.

The campaign opened in Italy on the 9th of April this year. The republican armies had hitherto only scaled the vanguard of the Alps, from whence also they had been driven, after having viewed in perspective the immense difficulties they had to encounter, before they could succeed in achieving the conquest of Italy. They had possession of the coast from Nice to Genoa; but the passage into Italy was blockaded by the Austrian and Sardinian armies, who had apparently taken the most effectual measures to prevent the further progress of the enemy. The army of Italy, having received considerable reinforcements, was intrusted to the command of general Bonaparte, a young Corsican of the most daring courage, and the most enterprising ambition; but an officer of whose military skill no mention had been hitherto made during the course of the revolution (w).

The

(v) The following account of the Vendean general, Charette, appeared in the Parisian papers:

"Entirely defeated by the republican army—his troops dispersed, and incapable of being collected again and rallied—himself closely pursued, Charette assumed the dress of a peasant, with the hope of eluding the strict search that was making after him. He wandered for some time among the fields alone, and was at length discovered and pursued by a republican patrole. His strength being at last exhausted, he sunk upon the ground, and was taken by two grenadiers, who carried him on their shoulders to the next post, from whence he was conveyed to Angers. At Angers he was tried, and sentenced to be shot. The sentence was immediately carried into execution."

(w) It is remarkable, that when this extraordinary person first figured in the grand theatre of the world, he called himself Buonaparte, according to the Italian orthography; but when he thought he saw a distant glimpse of the honours which awaited him, he gallicised his name, and

The first action of the campaign we are recording occurred near Savona, on the shores of the Mediterranean, where the French general Bonaparte was attacked by the troops under the Austrian general Beaulieu, and driven back to the lines near Savona. Presuming on their success, the Austrians advanced in hopes of cutting off the retreat of the division which they had repulsed; but Bonaparte, who had foreseen his retreat, had strengthened his post on the flanks of the Austrians, who were advancing, but who had been held in check by the forces which occupied the post of Montenotte, lying between Voltri and Savona. The possession of this post was absolutely necessary to cutting off the retreat of the division of the French, whom they had previously defeated; and as it appeared probable that the Austrians would renew the attack, Bonaparte sent a division, under general Massena, to take advantage of the night, and gain the rear of the Austrian army. General Beaulieu, having reinforced his army, began the attack at break of day. The success was various, and the victory remained undecided, until the division under general Massena, who had been sent round by Bonaparte, appeared on their left and rear. Unable to withstand this shock, the Austrian army was thrown into confusion, and being completely routed, was pursued by the French to Cairo. Their loss amounted to three thousand five hundred men, of whom two thousand were prisoners.

The victory at Montenotte was immediately followed by one more signal and decisive at the village of Millesimo over the united Austrian and Piedmontese forces, and which proved more fatal to our allies.

After these successes, Bonaparte having made dispositions to march forwards to Mondovi, the Piedmontese general, count Colli, apprehending the issue of a contest where he might easily be surrounded, and his retreat cut off, withdrew during the night to that place. At break of day the French attacked him at the entrance of Vico; the redoubt, which covered the centre of the Piedmontese army, was taken; and Mondovi itself on the same day, upon the further retreat of the Piedmontese, fell into the hands of the French, so that, finding it now impossible to withstand the republican army, the Piedmontese retreated towards Turin, from whence the French were distant but twenty-four miles, while general Augereau was about to pass the Tanaro on the right flank of the retreating forces.

The three battles which the French had just won were decisive of the fate of Sardinia (x); for the aged monarch then seated on the throne, was under a necessity of dispatching his minister to Paris, who concluded a treaty with the republic on the 17th of May. As Piedmont lay entirely at the mercy of the conqueror, the king was compelled to submit to such conditions as were proposed to him. The king of Sardinia ceded the duchy of Savoy and the county of Nice to the French republic.

By this treaty, his Sardinian majesty agreed to withdraw himself in the most unequivocal manner from every alliance, offensive or defensive, formed with any of the powers in the coalition against the French republic; to renounce both for himself and his successors for ever, all title to Savoy, Nice, and the country now forming the department of the Maritime Alps; to determine the limits of the respective countries by new demarcations advantageous to the republic; and to grant a full and entire amnesty to all those of his subjects who had been or were prosecuted for their political opinions.

Bonaparte was ably supported in these arduous enterprizes by the zeal of his generals, each of whom led on his respective division with that alertness which could alone have ensured success in a war among the Alps.

The Austrians, defeated in several attempts, retreated to Lodi on the river Addi, where marshal Beaulieu had concentrated his forces. To pass the bridge in the face of the Austrian army, advantageously posted, was incurring certain destruction to numbers; the judicious and enterprizing Bonaparte, however, full of confidence in his soldiers, gave peremptory orders that the attack should be made by the bridge. Accordingly a battalion of grenadiers bore down all before them, and reached the bridge of Lodi, exclaiming, "Vive la Republique!" i. e. "Long live the Republic!" but the dreadful fire kept up by the enemy having stopped their progress, the generals Berthier, Massena, and Cervoni rushed forward; yet even their presence would have been ineffectual, had it not been for the intrepidity of Bonaparte himself, who, snatching a standard from the hand of a subaltern, placed himself in the front, and animating his soldiers by his actions and gesticulations (for his voice was drowned in the noise of cannon and musquetry) they rushed on with impetuosity, seized the Austrian artillery, broke through the lines, and throwing the whole into disorder, ended the contest.

and has ever since called himself Bonaparte, judiciously omitting the (u). The following memoirs of Buonaparte, as far as they extend, are averred to be authentic:

Napoleone Buonaparte was born in the town of Ajaccio, in Corsica, in 1767, is the son of Charles Buonaparte, and Lætitia Raniolini. His father, who was also a native of Ajaccio, was bred to the civil law at Rome, and took part with the celebrated Pascal Paoli, in the ever-memorable struggle made by a handful of brave islanders, against the tyrannical efforts of Louis XV. and the Machiavelian schemes of his minister, Choiseul. He not only laid aside the gown upon this occasion, but actually carried a musquet as a private sentinel. On the conquest of the island by France, he wished to retire with the gallant chieftain who had so nobly struggled for its independence; but was prevented by his uncle, a canon of the church, who exercised a parental authority over him. In 1773, a deputation from the three estates was sent to wait on the king of France; and on this occasion, Charles Buonaparte was selected to represent the nobles. He was soon after promoted to the office of procuratore reale of Ajaccio, where his ancestors, supposed to have been originally from Tuscany, had been settled nearly two hundred years. The family of Charles Buonaparte was numerous, for he had seven children, four sons and three daughters. The sons were, Lucien, Napoleon, Joseph, and Louis. It was his good fortune, however, to be cherished by the French; and both he and his family lived in the greatest intimacy with M. de Marbœuf, the governor, who received a revenue of sixty thousand livres a year, on condition of doing nothing! An intendant was paid nearly as much; and a swarm of hungry leeches, engendered in the corruption of the court of Versailles, at one and the same time sucked the blood of the Corsicans, and drained the treasure of the mother country; in short, like the conquests of more recent times, the subjugation of that island seems to have been achieved for no other purpose than to gratify avarice, and satiate rapacity.

On the death of his friend Charles Buonaparte, M. de Marbœuf continued to patronize his family, and placed his second son Napoleone, the subject of these memoirs, at the Ecole Militaire, or Military Academy. The advantages resulting from this seminary, which has produced more great men than any other academy of a similar description in Europe, were not lost on young Buonaparte; he then re-applied himself, with equal assiduity and address, to mathematics, and studied the art of war as a regular science. Born in the midst of a republican struggle in his native land, it was his good fortune to burst into manhood at the moment when the country of his choice shook off the chains with which she had been manacled for centuries. There was also something in his manners and habits that announced him equal to the situation for which he seems to have been destined: instead of imitating the frivolity of the age, his mind was continually occupied by useful studies; and from the Lives of Plutarch, a volume of which he always carried in his pocket, he learned, at an early age, to copy the manners, and emulate the actions, of the heroes of antiquity. With this disposition, it is but little wonder that he should have dedicated his life to the profession of arms.

In the winter of 1796, general Buonaparte was united to Madame Beauharnois, a beautiful French woman, who had experienced a variety of persecutions during the tyrannical reign of Robespierre. Her former husband had attained the rank of general in the service of the republic, and had always conducted himself as a friend to liberty. On that memorable day when Louis XVI. and his family repaired to Paris, M. de Beauharnois sat as president of the national assembly, and exhibited great dignity of demeanour. He fell a victim, however, to the terrorists, who, joining the narrow ideas of sectarists to the ferocious character peculiar to themselves, persecuted all whose opinions were not exactly conformable to their own standard. M. Barras, at length, luckily for her, extended his protection to the widow, who was afterwards the wife of his friend.

As to his person, Bonaparte is rather small of stature, but admirably proportioned. He is of a spare habit of body, yet robust, and calculated to undergo the greatest fatigues. His complexion, like that of all the males of southern climates, is olive; his eyes blue, his chin prominent, the lower part of his face thin, and his forehead square and projecting. The large whole length Italian print, published in London by Sestolini, exhibits a good likeness; but the best portrait ever taken of him was at Verona, in consequence of the solicitations of an English artist, who applied to him for this purpose, by means of a letter from a relation, now in London.

With respect to his mind, his very enemies allow that he possesses uncommon attainments. He converses freely, and without pedantry, on all subjects, and writes and speaks with fluency and eloquence.—Above all things he has attempted, and in a great measure obtained, the mastery over his passions. He is abstemious at his meals, and was never seen in the slightest degree intoxicated; he possesses many friends, but has few or no minions; and preserves an inviolable secrecy, by means of a rigorous silence, far better than other men do by a loquacious hypocrisy. He has, however, like a sound politician, shewn great attention to those generals who have exerted themselves in his service.

His mother, the beautiful Lætitia Buonaparte, is still alive, as are also his two sisters. They were taken prisoners by an English armed vessel, during their passage from France to Corsica; but were restored to their country and their friends.

The above account of Napoleon Bonaparte and his family may be considered by some in the light of panegyric and adulation; but let such remember that it is not the part of a faithful historian to calumniate the character of this great man, because others have done so, but to adhere to truth.

(x) The king of Sardinia died in October, soon after the signing of the treaty, aged seventy, and his son Charles Emanuel succeeded him.

While

While one part of the republican forces pursued Beaulieu towards Mantua, the rest entered Milan on the 18th of May, without further resistance; and the French armies gained possession of the whole of Lombardy. Bonaparte, having alarmed the pope by an invasion of his territories, granted the favour of a truce to him, and proceeded to cover the siege of Mantua.

In Holland, after several contests between the various parties respecting the convocation of a conventional assembly, the two provinces of Friezeland and Zealand, which had been most averse to the proposition, assented to the wish of the majority; and the national assembly was installed on the first of March, 1796. One of the first acts of this assembly was a declaration of war against England, which had deprived the republic of almost all its colonies both in the East and West Indies.

Official dispatches from Bombay, dated the 9th of November, 1795, and received in England the 2nd of March, 1796, announced the capture of the island of Ceylon (y), with its valuable settlements of Malacca, Cochin, and Jaffnapatam. Malacca was taken by major Brown; Cochin, on the Malabar coast, by a detachment of the Bombay forces; and Jaffnapatam, on the island of Ceylon, by admiral Rainier and colonel Stuart.

On the 11th of March, Mr. Joddrell made a motion in the house of commons, for extending anatomical dissection to persons guilty of burglary, or highway robbery; but, upon finding the sense of the house against the measure, he withdrew it.

On the 8th of March, the English cabinet, by the agency of its ambassador to the Helvetic states, had communicated to the government of France, by their ambassador at Basle, a series of propositions relative to a general pacification. The apparent motive of this communication was to ascertain whether there was any disposition in France, to open a negociation with the king of England and his allies, for that purpose: and whether it would be agreed to appoint a congress to arrange and adjust the terms? The directory, anxious to evince its disposition for pacific measures, declared it was its sincere desire to make peace, and detailed the conditions on which it was prepared to offer it; of which one was indispensible, namely, that of retaining the provinces in the Low Countries, which by the constitutional act had been united to the French republic. These propositions, however, were declared by the English ministry to be utterly inadmissible.

On the 10th of May, the Executive Directory sent a message to the Legislative Body, announcing that a conspiracy was to have burst forth upon the morrow at daybreak. The Legislative Body, the Directory, and the chiefs of the army of the interior, were to have been massacred; pillage and slaughter at once extending their ravages throughout the great city of Paris. The conspirators arrested on this occasion were Drouet, Babœuf, Antonelle, Riccard, Rossignol, Laignelot, Chastes, Germain, Darthez, and the secretary Joseph Lebon. Vadier and Amar made their escape.

The armistice on the Rhine, terminated on the 31st of May, and the campaign opened immediately after that date. General Moreau had been appointed, by the Directory, to the command-in-chief of the French army of the Rhine and Moselle, as successor to general Pichegru, who was nominated ambassador to the court of Stockholm.

The first operations of the French were successful; general Kleber forced the passage of the Sieg, surprized the van of the Austrian army at Altenkirchen, under the prince of Wirtemberg, and totally defeated it, with the loss, on the part of the Austrians, of two thousand four hundred killed and wounded, and three thousand taken prisoners.

But the republicans were not so fortunate in an engagement near the Lahn; yet they afterwards reduced Frankfort, Wurtzburg, and other considerable towns. They were, however, defeated in several actions in the autumn, and found it expedient to re-cross the Rhine.

General Moreau, the commander in the Upper Rhine, took the fort of Kehl, and made great ravages in the enemy's country. At Rewhen, the Austrians fled before him, and he was completely victorious at Rastadt. He compelled the duke of Wirtemberg to decline all opposition to the French cause, and even to sue for peace. He entered the Bavarian capital, and exacted large contributions from the elector as the price of a truce. But, receiving intelligence that the emperor had augmented his forces, he meditated a retreat, which he accomplished with great address. He encountered many difficulties in his perilous march from the Lech to the Rhine, the relation of which astonished all the world.

In Italy the French prosecuted the war as successfully as they had commenced the campaign. Bonaparte attacked the Austrians at Mori, where they were strongly entrenched; and, after a severe contest, on the 4th of September, they were defeated, and compelled to take refuge in Trent. To cover this city, the Austrians had rallied at the pass of Calliano, and had taken positions which appeared impregnable. The address and courage of the division under general Massena surmounted every obstacle; and, after a long and obstinate conflict, in which the French made six thousand prisoners, and took twenty pieces of cannon, this general victoriously entered the city. Bonaparte, instead of continuing his march into the Tyrol, directed his course to the right, and followed Wurmser to the valley of Brenta. Pursuing his march along the river of this name, he defeated the Austrians on the 8th of September, in four successive engagements, forced general Wurmser from Bassano, where he had established his head-quarters, and pursued him so vigorously, that he was obliged to retreat towards Trieste.

Bonaparte intended to have prevented him from penetrating into Mantua, and had taken measures to surround him, and oblige him to surrender, but Wurmser's marches were so rapid, that he was unable to carry his plan into execution. The Austrian general met with resistance in his march; but as he had to contend with inferior forces, he succeeded in making good his retreat to Mantua, where the French attacking and obtaining, after great slaughter, the posts of Favorito and St. George in the suburbs of that city, and not having artillery to form a siege, turned the whole into a blockade. In this attack it is supposed the Imperialists lost twenty thousand men; and this was the third Austrian army which the French had destroyed in the course of this campaign, in attempting to reduce Lombardy once more under the Austrian yoke.

Bonaparte, to shew that it was not his intention to arrest the progress of the arts and sciences, in the parts of Italy which he had lately conquered, addressed two letters to the astronomer Oriani, and the municipalities of Milan and Pavia, in one of which are inserted the following words—"The sciences, which do honour to the human mind; the arts, which embellish human life, and transmit illustrious actions to posterity, should be peculiarly respected in all free governments. All men of genius, all those who have obtained a distinguished rank in the republic of letters, are Frenchmen, whatever may be the country in which they were born (z)."

In the beginning of the year, general Nichols recommenced

(y) Ceylon is a large island in the East Indies, about two hundred and fifty miles long, and two hundred broad. The air is very good, and the country full of mountains, but interspersed with fertile vallies. It is remarkable for producing excellent cinnamon. In some places are rich mines of sapphires, rubies, topazes, and cats'-eyes, besides other stones of less value. There is also plenty of wood for dying, and all other uses. The animals are cows, buffaloes, goats, hogs, tigers, monkies, &c. They have large elephants, and monstrous serpents, which are very dangerous. The island is also infested with ants, which do incredible mischief. It lies from 78 to 82 degrees of E. longitude, and from 6 to 10 degrees of N. latitude. The conquest of this island was the first attempt of Albuquerque, the celebrated Portuguese admiral. He found it well peopled, and inhabited by two different nations, the Bedas inhabiting the northern, and the Cinglasses inhabiting the southern parts. The former were very barbarous, but the latter a great deal more polished. The Portuguese tyrannized over the natives to such a degree, that they assisted the Dutch in expelling the Portuguese from the island, which was accomplished, after a bloody and obstinate war, in 1658. All the Portuguese settlements fell into the hands of the Dutch East India company, and the island continued to belong to the Dutch till it was wrested from them by the English, as above related. At the time when the English conquered the island, the Ceylonese were in a most miserable situation: they might be said to have been in a state of total inactivity, living in huts without any furniture, and subsisting upon fruits. Those who were more affluent had no other covering than a piece of coarse linen wrapt about their waists.

(z) On the 25th of October, 1795, the French minister of war pronounced the following inflated speech, descriptive of the victories of the republican army in Italy, on his presenting to the Executive Directory citizen Marmont, aid-de-camp to general Bonaparte. This is the same gentleman who lost his arm at Salamanca in Spain, in the battle which was fought in June, 1812, between the French forces and those of the Anglo-Portuguese army under the command of the marquis of Wellington. "The army of Italy, always triumphant, present to you the trophies of new victories. The enemy vanquished at Castiglione, received considerable reinforcement; they prepared a fresh attack in the hopes of repairing their defeats; but they were met by an army accustomed to conquest, and the battle of Saint George's, put a period to their efforts.

menced active operations in the West-Indies, and having received some reinforcements, attacked the French at Port Royal in Jamaica, once without success, and with considerable loss, but in a second and more desperate attempt, he carried their works by storm. After this signal defeat the insurgents were every where discomfited, and compelled to submit (a). The reduction of the island of St. Lucia under the British government, was effected in May by the troops under general Abercrombie, but not without considerable resistance on the part of the French. At length, a capitulation was agreed upon for the whole island, and the garrison, to the amount of two thousand men, surrendered prisoners of war. The fate of St. Vincent's depended greatly upon that of St. Lucia, and as the opponents to the British forces were chiefly a herd of undisciplined savages, they became an easy conquest, and were in a short time subdued. By the indefatigable zeal and activity of general Walpole, the Maroons were brought to submission; the greater part of them laid down their arms, and soon after the remainder surrendered. They were removed with their families in the month of June, to Lower Canada, where lands were provided for them by the legislature of Jamaica.

Though every power in Europe had felt in some degree the force of the French arms; England had hitherto, except in the accumulation of debt, and the derangement of her finances, suffered the least inconvenience from the war. It was therefore suggested, that the most effectual mode of opposing England since the naval force of France could not injure her commerce, was to shut out her manufactures from every port in Europe. The proclamation issued by the English minister, permitting the exportation of goods to the Netherlands and the United Provinces, induced the Dutch convention to issue a counter proclamation, forbidding, under severe penalties, the entry of such goods into the Dutch republic, and restraining them from engaging in this commerce with England.

This new system of warfare was adopted throughout the greatest part of Europe. The English manufacturers found no entrance into any port from the Elbe to the Adriatic, except those of Portugal. Spain, by the declaration of war, had entered partly into the plan. Genoa, after repeated struggles to keep her neutrality respected, placed unfortunately in the midst of three great powers, those of England, Austria, and France, and her territory violated successively by each, was compelled to yield to the urgent remonstrances of the French republic, and by a formal treaty (on the 9th of October) agreed to shut up her ports against the English. Leghorn was in possession of the republican troops, and the English found themselves confined in the Mediterranean to the possession of the island of the Elbe, before Leghorn, to which they retreated when expelled from that city. Their Italian allies, the pope and the king of Naples, were by the conditions of the armistice with the French republic, circumscribed in their means of affording assistance. Corsica was also at this period evacuated by the English, who having taken possession of it when the tyranny of the jacobins had subjected France, had found the less resistance in re-establishing the forms of monarchical government. The Corsicans scarcely waited the withdrawing of the English troops, before they formed themselves into primary assemblies to send deputies to the commissioners in Italy, to divest themselves of their title of subjects to the king of England, and "swear allegiance to liberty, as citizens of the French republic."

While these transactions were carrying on, the inhabitants of the countries south of the Po, which had been conquered by the French, adopted measures for the formation of new governments, under the protection of the French republic. The cities of Bologna, Ferrara, and Reggio, were leagued in the confederation, and proceeded to the formation of its respective governments, in each of which similar regulations took place. Among others, the privileges and even the name of noble was abolished, and the various ensigns and blazonry of the order were not sufferred to remain.

The vast superiority of the naval forces of Great Britain was universally acknowledged in almost every part of the globe, yet the dexterity of the French completely eluded their vigilance, and succeeded in an expedition to Newfoundland, where they destroyed British property to a very large amount; but this loss on the part of the English was compensated soon after, by the advantages gained over the Dutch at the Cape of Good Hope, where admiral Lucas, with his squadron consisting of seven ships, were captured, or rather delivered into the power of the English, by the defection of the crews under that admiral's command. This squadron had escaped the watchfulness of the English, by effecting a passage early in the spring, and was to have been joined by a French squadron of sufficient force to accomplish the purpose for which the expedition was destined—the recapture of the Cape. The French squadron were to have been equipped at the expence of the Dutch, who could obtain this aid upon no other conditions; the money was regularly paid to the French government; but the squadron was never prepared; and the Dutch, after uselessly soliciting for several months, instead of recovering their possessions, were compelled to submit to the loss of the forces which they had sent to retake that important place.

General Bournonville, in the beginning of October, had been dispatched from Holland to replace general Jourdan, and to reinforce the army of the Sambre and the Meuse, with the division of the army under his command. In addition to the post opposite Huninguen, and the village of Kehl, the French kept possession of Neuweid, on the right side of the Rhine, a few miles below the fortress of Ehrenbreitstein. The Austrians, in order to possess themselves of this important place, crossed the Rhine, to divert the attention of the republican general from the attack which they had meditated, from the island, one side of which still communicated with the fort, as the bridge was unbroken in that part, and from the main land, where the regular batteries were already established. This expedition was planned for the capture of the whole garrison; but the French general, anticipating the design of the Austrians, made his dispositions to receive them at the true point of attack, and, after an obstinate conflict, repelled them with incredible loss.

During this period, the emperor had assembled a fourth army to liberate general Wurmser, who was shut up with his troops in Mantua. This army, commanded by generals Alvinzi and Davidovich, having received great reinforcements, the latter expelled the French from the Trent and the Tyrolese. General Alvinzi was attacked on the 7th of November with the utmost fury, near the village of Arcola by the republican army, commanded by Bonaparte: night alone terminated the battle, during which the French fell back on Verona. The battle of Arcola was singularly fatal to the French generals, by whose distinguished efforts of bravery, victory was taken out of the hand of fortune. Bonaparte escaping himself with difficulty, lost both his aids-du-camp, who fell by his side. The result of this bloody conflict, which was fought for eight successive days, was the loss on the part of the Austrians of twelve thousand men, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, besides four flags and eighteen guns. Their loss in this battle was so considerable, that Alvinzi was compelled to retire behind the Brenta with the remainder of his forces, to await the arrival of another army, and leave Mantua once more to its fate. But on the 14th the republican army, commanded by general Vaubois, was attacked by the Austrian general Davidorich, on the heights of Rivoli, and defeated, by which the blockade of that city was raised.

On the 7th of December, an armistice took place on the Lower Rhine, and the generals of both armies agreed to certain articles, subject to a future ratification. The convention was signed by generals Kray and Kleber, and the troops, in consequence, went into winter quarters.

Posterity will hardly credit the evidence of history, that in one campaign ALL ITALY was conquered; that three armies were successively destroyed; that upwards of fifty stands of colours remained in the hands of the conquerors; that forty thousand Austrians laid down their arms: In fine, that thirty thousand Frenchmen, under a warrior of twenty-five years of age, performed all these prodigies. The army of Italy has more triumphs to obtain: a career to run still more glorious and astonishing: to restore victory to the army of the Rhine, and convince an enemy, ready to pride itself on ephemeral advantages, that Frenchmen are every where the same, and that whilst they combat for liberty, nothing can resist their courage."

(a) The French newspaper, entitled L'Eclair, was forged in London about this time, to answer a stock-jobbing purpose. It announced that a preliminary convention for peace between France and the emperor had been signed at Basle. An action was afterwards brought by the proprietors of the Telegraph, against the proprietors of the Morning Post, for imposing the above paper on them for publication, knowing it to be forged. The cause was tried in the court of King's Bench, and a verdict was given in favour of the plaintiff.

Among the variety of negociations which in the course of the year occupied the French government, that which England proposed to open excited particular attention. On the 22nd of October lord Malmesbury, appointed minister-plenipotentiary from the court of London, for the purpose of negociating a peace with the executive government of France, arrived in Paris. His lordship was met by an immense concourse of people at a league distance from the capital, who were with difficulty restrained from taking his horses from the carriage, for the purpose of drawing him into the city.

On the 24th, the British minister delivered to the executive government, through the hands of Mons. Delacroix, the French minister for foreign affairs, a memorial, in which, after stating the desire which his Britannic majesty entertained for peace, he proposed the establishment of some general principle on the opening of the negociation, to serve as a basis for a definitive settlement; observing, that the first object of a negociation was generally that of restoring what had been taken from the respective parties during the war. The memorial stated, that as Great Britain, far from having any restitution to demand from France, had by a series of uninterrupted success, acquired colonial conquests of inestimable value; and as France had made continental conquests on the allies of his Britannic majesty, it was proposed, that the negociations should turn on the compensations to be made by France by proportional restitutions, the nature of which might be discussed, when the principle was admitted.

The negociation was agitating from the 24th of October to the 19th of December, when, as the grand principle respecting the restitution to be made to the allies of Great Britain, could not by any means be admitted by the executive government of France, (nor did it appear that lord Malmesbury had sufficient powers from the allied courts to stipulate for their respective interests,) the negociation ended; for on reading the memorials received on the 17th, of December, the directory ordered the minister to write to lord Malmesbury on the 18th, the day previous to the explanatory and expostulatory communication made by his lordship, as his last letter was dated on the 19th of December, that they could hear of no proposition contrary to the constitution, and the laws and treaties by which the republic was engaged; observing, moreover, that as his lordship found himself obliged to have recourse to his court on every communication, and as the part he had to act in this negociation was purely passive, his lordship's residence in Paris was unnecessary and inconvenient; and, therefore, enjoined him to leave it in forty-eight hours; observing, that if the British cabinet was really desirous of peace, the negociation might be carried on by messengers from the respective parties. After a long conference on these points, lord Malmesbury received a note, requiring the delivery of an ultimatum within twenty-four hours. He opposed this arbitrary preclusion from deliberate negociation, and requested a contre-projet on the part of the Directory, that the proposals might be duly considered, and mutually discussed with conciliatory candour. The answer to this request, was a determined refusal of restoring any country, which had been constitutionally annexed to the republic. Lord Malmesbury immediately demanded the necessary passports, quitted Paris with his suite in the time prescribed, and arrived in London the 29th following.

The British government issued a declaration against France, in consequence of the abrupt and arrogant dismissal of lord Malmesbury from Paris, on the 27th of December. Several other official papers relative to the mission of that noble lord, for the purpose of negociating a peace with the French republic, were also published at this time, under the sanction and direction of the British government (b).

There were other projects of hostility which the French had meditated against Great Britain, among which engaged their principal attention was the invasion of Ireland; for on the 31st of December, intelligence was received at the admiralty with dispatches from admiral Kingsmill, at the Cove of Cork, stating that seven French ships of the line, with two ships armée en flute, frigates, and transports, making in the whole seventeen sail, had reached the southern coast of Ireland, and had actually anchored in the Bay of Bantry on the 24th. Soon after their arrival, they sent a boat towards shore, with an officer and eight men, but the peasantry appeared on shore, and convinced the enemy that they were determined to lose their lives, or repel any attempt to invade the country. The boat was captured in sight of the French fleet, and the prisoners were conveyed to Cork, from whence they were sent to Dublin, for the purpose of undergoing an examination before the privy council (c). The greatest loyalty was displayed on this occasion by the people of Ireland.

When a suspension of arms, agreed on by the generals on the Lower Rhine, had finished the dreadful campaign in that quarter, the Upper Rhine was still deluged with the blood of the contending armies in the attack and defence of the fortress of Kehl, which on the 25th of November, was invested by the archduke Charles. On the first onset, a cannonade began, which continued without intermission fifteen days, during which the Austrians were repulsed with considerable loss; but the obstinate resistance of the French, with the severity of the season, relaxed the operations of the archduke for some time; till on the renewal of the attack, on the 25th of December, the cannonade was redoubled on both sides, and Kehl was in a few days reduced to a heap of ruins. A capitulation was then proposed by general Desaix, who waited person-

(b) The following memorial, delivered by lord Malmesbury, on the principal objects of restitution, compensation, and reciprocal arrangement, was the pretext of his dismissal:

"The principle already established, as the basis of the negociation, by the consent of the two governments, is founded on restitution to be made by his Britannic majesty to France, in compensation of the arrangements to which that power may consent, in order to satisfy the just pretensions of the allies of the king, and to preserve the political balance of Europe.

"In order to accomplish these objects, in the manner the most complete, and to offer a fresh proof of the sincerity of his wishes for the re-establishment of general tranquillity, his majesty would propose that there should be given to this principle, on each side, all the latitude of which it may be susceptible.

"I. His majesty demands therefore,

"1. The restitution, to his majesty the emperor and king, of all his dominions, on the footing of the Status ante Bellum, [i. e. the situation they were in before the war.]

"2. The re-establishment of peace between the Germanic empire and France, by a suitable arrangement, conformable to the respective interests, and to the general safety of Europe. The arrangement to be negociated with his Imperial majesty, as constitutional head of the empire, either by the intervention of the king, or immediately, as his imperial majesty shall prefer.

"The evacuation of Italy by the French troops, with an engagement not to interfere in the internal affairs of that country; which should be established, as far as possible, upon the footing of the Status ante Bellum."

In the course of the negociation a more detailed discussion was to be entered into of the further measures which it might be proper to adopt, respecting the objects of these three articles, in order for the providing more effectually for the future discussion of their respective limits and possessions, and for the maintenance of general tranquillity.

"II. With regard to the other allies of his Britannic majesty, his majesty demands that there be reserved to her majesty the empress of all the Russias, a full and unlimited power of taking part in this negociation, whenever she may think fit, or of acceding to the definitive treaty, and thereby returning to a state of peace with France.

"III. His majesty also demands, that her most faithful majesty may be comprehended in this negociation, and may return to a state of peace with France, without any cession or burthensome condition on either side.

"IV. On these conditions, his majesty offers to France the entire and unreserved restitution of all the conquests which he has made on that power in the East and West Indies, proposing at the same time that a mutual understanding should be established as to the means of securing for the future the tranquillity of the two nations, and of consolidating, as much as possible, the advantages of their respective possessions. His majesty offers, in like manner, the restitution of the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, and of the fishery of Newfoundland, on the footing of the Status ante Bellum.

"But if in addition to this, his majesty were to wave the power given to him by the express stipulations of the treaty of Utrecht, of opposing the cession of the Spanish part of St. Domingo, to France, he would then demand, in return for this concession, a compensation, which might secure, a least, in some degree, the maintenance of the balance of the respective possessions in that part of the world.

"V. In all cases of cessions or restitutions, which may come in question in the course of this negociation, there should be granted on each side, to all individuals, the most unlimited right to withdraw with their families and their property, to sell their land and other immoveable possessions; and adequate arrangements should also be made, in the course of this negociation, for the removal of all sequestrations, and for the satisfaction of their just claims, which individuals on either side may have to make upon the respective governments."

The executive directory also published a note on the dismissal of lord Malmesbury.

(c) The republican society of united Irishmen had applied to the Directory, to convince them how easy it was to excite a general insurrection against the government. Deluded by their specious representations, the French sent out a fleet, and gave the command of the troops to general Hoche. A part of the armament cast anchor at Bantry Bay, where they continued for several days without attempting to invade the country. Having waited in vain for the rest of the fleet, the ships sailed away: others indeed made their appearance; but a continuance of stormy weather defeated the views of the enemy.

ally on prince Charles; but the prince would not agree to the conditions which were proposed. Desaix refused to make any alteration, and observed that he should make use of his last resource. "What resource have you left?" replied the archduke. The French general observed, that he had so many men, and such a quantity of powder remaining; and that rather than submit to a dishonourable capitulation, he would blow up the Austrian camp, and both armies should perish in one common ruin. The archduke instantly signed the capitulation, and left the French twenty-four hours to transport to the other side the remainder of the stores and artillery, which had been employed in the glorious resistance which this fortress had made.

By the surrender of the important fortress of Kehl the campaign of 1796 was terminated on the Rhine:—a campaign which had effected in a few months, more than has been generally achieved during the continuance of the longest war; which had shaken Europe to its foundations, rendered it one vast theatre of carnage, and crimsoned with blood every river, from the frontiers of Holland, to the Adriatic Gulph.

The new parliament of Great Britain met on the 27th of September, pursuant to prorogation, and, upon the motion of lord Frederic Campbell, the house of commons re-elected Mr. Henry Addington for their speaker.

On the 9th of October, his majesty repaired to the house of peers, and opened the session, as usual, with a speech from the throne; in which he informed both houses, of his intention to send a person to Paris to negociate a peace; but enjoined them not to relax in their efforts, at a moment when the enemy had manifested a design of attempting a descent on the shores of these kingdoms. He expressed his satisfaction in reviewing the exertions of the navy, the operations in the East and West Indies, and the general conduct of the British forces: highly extolling the intrepidity, discipline, and invincible spirit of his Austrian allies, under the auspicious direction of the archduke Charles, which had lately given so favourable a turn to the course of the war on the continent, as to inspire a well-grounded confidence of future success. He noticed the hostile disposition of the court of Madrid; expressed reliance on the zeal and public spirit of the commons for the necessary supplies, and assured his parliament of his hearty desire to concur with them in every effort to defeat the designs of the enemy, and restore to his people the blessings of a secure and honourable peace. Addresses were moved and carried on the occasion in both houses, by a great majority (d).

On the 18th, the commons took into consideration that part of his majesty's speech which related to the enemy's design of invading these kingdoms; on which occasion the minister proposed measures for augmenting both the sea and land forces, and moved for a bill for that purpose (e).

The ground of the motion was contested by Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Fox, who were of opinion, that there was not sufficient cause for apprehending the danger of an invasion, though in the present stage of the bill they did not oppose it; and several resolutions were carried to further the intentions of the minister, which were essentially promoted by the passing of a bill, a few days after, for raising sixty thousand supplementary militia, consisting both of infantry and cavalry.

On the 13th of December, in the upper house, lord Grenville moved the order of the day for taking into consideration a message from his majesty. The message being read by the clerk, his lordship said, he confided in what he had to propose to the house, that he should meet with the greatest unanimity. In the course of his present majesty's reign, the court of Spain had three times declared war against this country, without the least provocation, and always for the purpose of interfering in the concerns of the French. In every one of these instances, they had proceeded upon the most frivolous pretences, and the court of Great Britain had done every thing in its power to maintain peace. Whatever might have influenced the conduct of the court of Madrid on former occasions, they might fairly be said in the present case to be still more frivolous than any that had preceded it. His majesty had taken every possible step to maintain peace between two great nations. He had endeavoured to bring the matters in dispute, trivial as they appeared to be on the face of the declaration, to an amicable conclusion, by a cool and friendly treaty; but in this he had been prevented by an abrupt and unprovoked declaration of war on the part of the court of Madrid. Thus situated, he could not suppose for a moment that any one who feels for the honour and dignity of the crown, and the dearest interests of the British empire, would have the least objection to what he had to move, which was, that an humble address be presented to his majesty, thanking him for his communication, and assuring him, that their lordships would give him every assistance in support of a war, against the unprovoked attack and declaration of the Spanish monarch. The address was carried nemine dissentiente.

On the same day, in the house of commons, Mr. Dundas made a similar motion to that of lord Grenville in the house of lords, which was also carried nem. con.

On the 14th, Mr. Fox brought forward a motion for a vote of censure upon ministers, for sending money to the emperor, without the authority of parliament. After having briefly recapitulated the sums, and the different times at which they were transmitted to the emperor, and deprecated the strides the crown was making on the privileges of that house, and on the liberties of the people, in consequence of the vast increase of the revenue—the creation of new species of treason—the cruel punishments of the courts—and the enormous military establishments—he said, if to all these engines of power the executive government could add the command of the appropriation of the public money, we had no longer a security left for preserving our once boasted constitution. He therefore moved, "That his majesty's ministers, having authorised and directed, at different times, without the consent, and during the sitting of parliament, the issue of various sums of money, for the service of his imperial majesty, and also for the service of the army under the prince of Condé, have acted contrary to their duty, and to the trust reposed in them, and have therefore violated the constitutional privileges of this house!" Mr. alderman Combe, at the request of his constituents, in common hall assembled, seconded the motion.

Mr. Pitt, the chancellor of the exchequer, said, that the practice now complained of had been pursued by all his predecessors, and he quoted a number of precedents on the journals that bore analogy to the present case, in which the most eminent ministers in all the reigns from king William to his present majesty, had, when necessity urged, adopted without censure, measures similar to that for which he was now so violently arraigned. He said it was on precedents such as these, arising from a zeal for the public service, that he rested his defence; and after entreating the house to view the subject in the aggregate, and with all its concomitant circumstances, threw himself upon its candour and justice, declaring, that he had rather sink under its censure, than suffer the painful reflection of having sacrificed, through timidity, the interests of his country.

The chancellor of the exchequer was vindicated by Mr. Bragge, who moved the following amendment:—"That the measure of advancing the several sums of money, which appear, from the accounts presented to the house this session of parliament, to have been issued for the service of the emperor, though not to be drawn into precedent, but upon occasions of special necessity, was, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, a justifiable and proper exercise of the discretion vested in his majesty's ministers by the vote of credit, and calculated to produce consequences which have proved highly advantageous to the common cause, and to the general interests of Europe."

The aldermen Curtis, Lushington, and Anderson, (the other three members for the city) said they should not, like their colleague (alderman Combe) be guided by the resolutions of the common hall of livery that day, which meeting, they remarked, did not consist of one-sixth part of the liverymen; but they would vote according to their own sentiments, for the amendment. The amendment was warmly opposed by several members; but, on a division, it was carried in favour of the amendment by a majority of two hundred and four.

On the 19th Mr. Pitt, in consequence of a message from (d) In the month of October, 1796, a circumstance occurred at the mayor's dinner at Bath, which reflects much honour on the police of that city, and the prudent conduct of its inhabitants. Great quantities of meat being taken away untouched from the tables, some gentlemen were observing what a feast it would be to the poor people in the prison: but the mayor assured the company that he had the day before made enquiry at the gaol, and found the keeper its only inhabitant, there being not a single felon or debtor in it.

(e) On the 17th of November, 1796, Catherine II. empress of Russia, died of an apoplexy, in the sixty-seventh year of her age, and the sixteenth of her reign; on which event her son, the great duke Paul Petrowitz, was proclaimed emperor.

his majesty, respecting the expediency of the nation being prepared for a vigorous prosecution of the war, in case of failure of the negociation for peace; moved in a committee of supply, that a sum not exceeding five hundred thousand pounds should be granted to his majesty, to enable him to remit, from time to time, to his Imperial majesty, such sums as might be thought necessary for the prosecution of the war, should another campaign be rendered unavoidable.

After alluding to the late supply to the emperor, and the manner in which the minister disposed of the public money, Mr. Fox said, it was a delusion any longer to suppose that house had influence or direction over its distribution. Mr. Fox, sir William Pulteney, and Mr. Sheridan, proposed different amendments, to destroy the effect of the motion, but they were all negatived without a division, and the motion was consequently carried.

In the house of lords, the following day, lord Grenville, in consequence of his majesty's message, moved that an humble address should be presented, promising to assist his majesty, conformable to the purport of the message. The noble lord said a few words on the propriety of assisting the emperor with a loan.

On the 21st, the order of the day being read for the commencement of the loan bill, the duke of Norfolk said, he reproached himself for suffering the bill to proceed so far without some comment on the conduct of ministers, who had not even thought it necessary to communicate to the house a single syllable, on a bill, that added eighteen millions to the debt of the nation. In his opinion, the terms of the loan were disadvantageous to the public. He therefore moved an instruction to the committee, to empower the lords of the treasury to postpone the payments of the loan till the three per cents. were at seventy-five. It was opposed by lord Grenville and negatived.

The last debate which took place in both houses of parliament, in 1796, was on the subject of lord Malmesbury's mission to negociate a peace with the French republic, in consequence of a message from his majesty relative to that momentous affair. On the 30th of December, in the house of lords, lord Grenville, in a very able manner entered into the correspondence between lord Malmesbury and M. de la Croix, and concluded by moving an address to his majesty. The earl of Guildford moved an amendment, reflecting on the conduct of his majesty's ministers in the late negociation; and assuring his majesty that the house would proceed with unremitting diligence to investigate the causes of our present calamities, and to offer such advice as the critical and alarming circumstances of the nation may require.

Lord Fitzwilliam disapproved the original motion and amendment, and moved to recognize the principle of the war, agreeable to the resolution of the house in 1794. The duke of Bedford and lords Abingdon and Derby were in favour of the first amendment. Lords Kinnoul, Spencer, and the lord chancellor, opposed it; and on a division, the numbers were—contents eighty-eight, non-contents eight—majority against the amendment eighty. Lord Fitzwilliam's motion was negatived without a division.

In the house of commons, Mr. Pitt having entered into a general review of all the circumstances attending the overtures which had been made in order to a pacification; and commented on the confidential memorial delivered on the peace with Spain and Holland, and also on lord Malmesbury's conversation with the French minister for foreign affairs on this subject; moved an address to his majesty to the usual effect.

Mr. Erskine rose to oppose the address, and was entering into a detail of the history of the war, when he was taken suddenly ill, and found himself unable to proceed.

Mr. Fox then rose, and after discussing a variety of subjects, insisted upon the absurdity and imbecility of lord Malmesbury's mission; who was sent to treat on subjects on which he had no power to conclude any terms, and with powers to come to a definitive conclusion on subjects of which he was not empowered to treat. The terms proposed to France left her nothing, and were not such as the allies were justified by their comparative circumstances in demanding. He said the minister excelled in artifice and sophistry; but these were not the qualities now wanted to give repose to Europe. He concluded by moving an amendment, similar to that proposed by the earl of Guildford in the house of lords.

Mr. Dundas said, the proposed amendment went to record a proposition tending to strengthen the hands of the enemy, and weaken our own country. He animadverted severely on the conduct of Mr. Fox, whom he represented as the advocate of France, rather than of Great Britain.

The house divided on Mr. Fox's amendment, when the numbers were, for the amendment, ayes thirty-seven—noes two hundred and twelve—majority one hundred and seventy-five.

The first business of importance which demanded the attention of parliament in 1797, was in consequence of a message from his majesty, on the 27th of February, 1797, when lord Grenville presented to the house, by his majesty's command, a copy of the order of the privy council, signifying that, upon the representation of the chancellor of the exchequer, stating, that from the universal demand for specie made upon the metropolis, in consequence of ill-founded alarms in different parts of the country; it was the unanimous opinion of the board, that it was necessary for the public service, that the bank of England should forbear issuing any cash (f) in payment, till the sense of parliament could be taken on that subject. The duke of Norfolk expressed surprize that so extraordinary a measure should have been taken upon the representation of the chancellor of the exchequer only; and moved, "that an humble address be presented to his majesty, humbly soliciting him to prevent any further exportation of gold or silver in coin, or gold or silver in bullion, for the use of the emperor, or any other foreign power, until the sense of parliament should have been taken on the subject, after a full view of the cause of the public exigencies, on which his majesty has been this day advised to issue a most extraordinary proclamation." A number of lords here called out it was no "proclamation;" upon which his grace substituted instead of it, "order of council." The motion was negatived, and a secret committee of nine was appointed to enquire into the finances of the bank, and make their report to the house accordingly.

On the same day, the chancellor of the exchequer, in the house of commons, stated the necessity of proceeding to the appointment of a secret committee, for the same purpose as that for which a motion was carried in the other house; and on the following day he moved, "that a secret committee be appointed, to ascertain the amount of the outstanding debts of the bank, and the means of answering them." Mr. Fox expressed infinite concern at the embarrassment in which the country was involved by ministerial misconduct; censured the order of council as unconstitutional, and recommended a minute investigation of the affairs of the bank. Mr. Sheridan moved, that the committee should enquire into the causes which had produced the order. Mr. Dundas, however, opposed this suggestion, as tending to delay, and it was exploded by a majority of one hundred and fifty-eight (g).

On the 3rd of March, a bill to enable the bank of England to issue notes under five pounds, passed the house of lords; a bill to the same effect having been carried in the house of commons, on the first of the same month. Motions were also made in both houses, for the appointment of committees to enquire into the causes of the order of council, and long debates ensued, but the motions were negatived by great majorities; by which a restriction on the bank from payment in cash for a stated time was likewise confirmed.

At first this measure created much popular alarm, but the public mind became soon reconciled to it, from a conviction of its necessity. The issuing of twenty-shilling notes, and Spanish dollars, at the rate of four shillings and nine pence each, from the bank, contributed much to dissipate their fears.

(f) The frequent remittance of cash to foreign princes, and the practice of individuals to withdraw their money from banking houses, for the purpose of preserving it, had diminished the circulation of coin to an alarming degree; in consequence of which an order against the issue of cash from the bank was enforced; a circumstance which did not demonstrate, though it created in timid minds, a dread of national bankruptcy.

(g) The great point of dispute on this occasion was, whether the enquiry proposed by the chancellor of the exchequer, should be extended to the causes which produced the necessity of the order in council, or should be confined, in the present instance, merely to the stability of the bank, to answer every demand upon them. Mr. Pitt and the other ministers contended, that the occasion called for immediate decision upon the latter subject. Mr. Fox and the gentlemen in opposition urged, that a fair, full, and open enquiry was absolutely requisite to calm the minds of the people, and to re-establish public credit. However, both parties admitted the perfect solvency of the bank to be a fact beyond dispute.

On the 21st, earl Moira brought forward a motion, in the house of lords, on the state of Ireland. He set out with admitting the apparent delicacy of the question; he allowed the propriety of the separate and independent legislatures of both kingdoms adhering to the constitutional bounds prescribed to them in particular cases, and was aware of the allowable jealousy which, on such occasions, should be entertained by either; but such a line of reasoning, he contended, could not apply to the present occasion. He said, that, when an urgent necessity arose, when circumstances took place in which the general welfare of both kingdoms were involved, it was necessary, that either the one or the other should boldly step forward, and with manly openness, avow its sentiments, in such a manner as to evince to the public the purity of its motives, and that it was on great and obvious grounds of public utility alone that its interference was offered. His lordship then moved, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, imploring his paternal and benevolent intervention to remedy the discontents which unhappily prevail in his majesty's kingdom of Ireland, and threatened seriously to affect the dearest interests of the British empire."

On the question being put, lord Grenville declared, that he deemed the proposed call upon his majesty to be at least highly superfluous; there was no need, he said, of imploring his paternal intervention; the whole tenor of his conduct towards Ireland shewed there was no necessity for urging him. He concluded by observing that he would trouble their lordships no farther than to say, he deemed it his duty to give the motion his decided negative. At length, the question being called for, the house divided, when it appeared that the majority against it was seventy-one.

A few days after, the earl of Oxford made a motion for a negociation for peace, which was negatived by a great majority.

On the 27th of the same month, the earl of Suffolk made a motion in the house of lords, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, praying that he would be graciously pleased to remove from his councils his minister, namely, the first lord of the treasury, who by his misconduct had forfeited the confidence of the people." Preparatory to his motion, his lordship adverted to the conduct of ministers in general. He said, their whole system was to govern by influence; they had libelled the loyalty of the people, and branded every man with the epithets of Jacobin and Democrat who opposed their measures. In tracing them through every court on the continent, from the treaty of Pilnitz to the present moment, duplicity, incapacity, and corruption were discernible in all their measures. Lord Grenville very ably replied to the charges in the noble earl's address. He said that, with regard to the tenor of the motion, he must say he never knew any instance of the kind, where such a motion was brought forward without any one specific charge alledged, of misconduct or malversation against the person in question; it was therefore unnecessary to dwell on that head. He thought it necessary, however, to say, that one part of the noble lord's accusation had no foundation in truth. The treaty of Pilnitz, he asserted, was not only entered into without the participation, but even without the knowledge of the British government.

A long debate ensued, at the conclusion of which a division took place: contents eighty-six, proxies eighteen; non-contents fifteen, proxies two; majority eighty-seven.

A second budget was opened by the chancellor of the exchequer on the 26th, when he took occasion to propose the taxes for paying the interest of the money raised by loan, and brought forward a string of resolutions which were agreed to.

On the resolution for an increased duty on newspapers, a division ensued,—ayes one hundred and fifty-one, noes forty-three—majority one hundred and eight.

Mr. W. Smith observed, that if the marriage of the princess royal took place, a further sum would be necessary to provide for her dower of eighty or one hundred thousand pounds: to this was to be added four hundred thousand pounds at least for the increased pay of the seamen, and the additional bonus to the subscribers of the loyalty loan would amount to about three hundred thousand pounds more, making together a further sum to be provided for of eight hundred thousand pounds. Mr. Pitt making no reply, the question was put, "That the resolutions be read a second time," and carried. The opposition members then rose and left the house in a body. The resolutions were read and agreed to, and bills ordered to be brought in for carrying them into effect.

On the 3rd of May was presented to the house of lords a message from his majesty, similar to that delivered to the house of commons on the same day, respecting the intended marriage of the princess royal to the hereditary prince of Wirtemberg. An address was moved to his majesty, in answer to his gracious message, which was prefaced by an observation, that the utmost unanimity must pervade the house on such an occasion, and that all their lordships must feel happy in expressing their congratulation at an event which produced such an advantageous alliance, and contributed to the domestic happiness of his majesty's royal family.

The address was then read, which, after thanking his majesty for his most gracious communication, faithfully echoed the message, and expressed the concurrence of the house in the warmest and most affectionate language. The question was then put, and the address voted nem. dis. A similar motion was put and carried in the house of commons.

On the 15th, the motion for the abolition of the slave trade was made, as usual, by Mr. Wilberforce, and debated on with warmth and ability by its advocates and opponents; when, on a division, there appeared to be a majority of eight against the motion.

Mr. alderman Combe, soon after moved, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, praying that he would dismiss from his presence and councils his ministers, as the most likely means of obtaining a speedy and permanent peace." Sir W. Milner seconded the motion. After a long and vehement debate, there appeared, for the motion fifty-nine, against it two hundred and forty-two.

About the same time, the duke of Bedford moved in the house of peers for an address to his majesty to remove his ministers; but this motion was negatived by a majority of seventy-seven. His grace, and many of the peers who voted with him, also expressed their intention, as they found their efforts to save their country were in vain, not to trouble the house any more upon public business.

On the 20th of July, his majesty repaired to the house of peers, and prorogued the parliament, after having delivered a speech from the throne, expressing his approbation of their measures, returning thanks to the commons for their liberal supplies, and assuring both houses, that nothing should be wanting on his part, to bring the important negociation for peace, in which he was engaged, to a successful termination, on such conditions as might be consistent with the security, honour, and essential interests of his dominions (h).

The campaign of 1797, opened under auspicious circumstances

(h) On the 16th of December, 1796, a letter was sent to each of the admirals and captains, whose names were mentioned in the Gazette by earl Howe, as having signalized themselves in the action of the first of June, 1794, accompanying the medal which has been presented to them.

"My Lord, or Sir,

"The king having been pleased to order a certain number of gold medals to be struck in commemoration of the victory obtained by his majesty's fleet, under the command of earl Howe, over that of the enemy, in the actions of the 29th of May, and the first of June, 1794, I am commanded by his majesty to present to your lordship one of the medals above-mentioned, and to signify his majesty's pleasure that you should wear it when in your uniform, in the manner described by the directions, (which together with the medal and ribband belonging to it) I have the honour to transmit to you.

"I am also commanded by his majesty to acquaint your lordship, that, had it been possible for all the officers, on whom his majesty is pleased to confer this mark of his approbation, to attend personally in London, his majesty would have presented the medal to each of them in person; but that being from various causes, at this time, impossible, in order to obviate all further delay, he has, therefore, been pleased to direct them to be forwarded in this manner.

"Allow me to express the great satisfaction I feel in being made the channel of communicating to your lordship so distinguished a mark of his majesty's approbation. I have the honour to be, &c.

"Spencer."

Admiralty, Nov. 30, 1796.

The admirals to wear the medal suspended by a ribband about their necks; the captains to wear the medal suspended to a ribband, but fastened through the third and fourth button-hole, on the left side. The colour of the ribband blue and white.

It is worthy of remark, that rear-admiral Caldwell, a brave and meritorious officer, whose unremitting services, whose persevering activity, zeal, cumstances for France, as well as Spain, who was now in alliance with her. Sardinia acted a subordinate part under her controul: Tuscany obeyed her requisitions; and Naples had concluded a separate peace. Thus circumstanced, the court of Vienna, and indeed all Europe, turned its eyes to the archduke Charles, who was said to inherit the military talents of the house of Lorraine. It was accordingly determined that this young prince should be appointed commander-in-chief; and that the hero of Kehl should oppose the hero of Italy.

A variety of operations took place in the month of January. At the beginning the archduke was successful in compelling the French to surrender the Tête-du-Pont of Huninguen to the Austrians. By the terms of capitulation, the French were allowed four days to evacuate the fort, and the Austrians engaged not to fire upon Huninguen during the war, unless the French effected the passage of the Rhine.

The fortune of war, however, soon turned in favour of the victorious Bonaparte, who gained great advantage over the Austrians in five battles on five successive days. These were the battles of St. Michael, Corono, Anguira, Rivoli, and La Favorite. In the last of these actions, he took seven thousand prisoners, with standards, cannon, all the baggage of the army, a regiment of hussars, and a considerable convoy of grain and cattle, which the enemy was endeavouring to convey into Mantua. General Wurmser attempted a sortie to attack the left wing of the French army, but was received with such resolution, that he was obliged to return: Thus in the short space of three or four days, the fifth army of the emperor was totally destroyed. The French took twenty-three thousand prisoners, among whom were one lieutenant-general, and ten generals; six thousand men were killed or wounded, and about twenty-four standards taken. All the battalions of the volunteers of Vienna were made prisoners: the standards carried by whom had been embellished by the hands of the empress.

Mantua surrendered on the 2nd of February, the inevitable consequence of the total defeat of the Austrian armies on the above successive days. The terms were honourable, the garrison were made prisoners, but marched out with military honours; and the veteran general Wurmser, then upwards of seventy years of age, was excepted from the humiliating condition of appearing as a prisoner of war (i). On this occasion upwards of five thousand horses were taken by the French.

On the 22nd of the same month, the victorious army of Italy attacked and defeated the enemy in the Tyrolese; and, on the other side, a column of the army entered the territory of the pope.

The van-guard of general Victor's division, commanded by general of brigade Lesne, in which were the grenadiers of the legion of Lombardy, attacked the army of the pope on the Cenio, turned it in fording the river, and the enemy was assailed and routed in the same moment. The grenadiers of Lombardy carried the batteries with fixed bayonets. The pope lost in prisoners one thousand men, and twenty-six officers; in killed, from four to five hundred men, eight stand of colours, fourteen pieces of cannon, and eight caissons. The seventh regiment of hussars, commanded by the aid-de-camp Junot, pursued the papal cavalry for ten miles, but could not overtake it.

His holiness's army having experienced such signal defeats, he found himself again disposed to make overtures to the enemy, and peace was accordingly concluded between him and the French, in consequence of a letter from him to general Bonaparte (k).

From such a series of victories obtained by the republican forces over the imperial armies, the French, by the 28th of March, became entire masters of the provinces of Carniole and Carinthia, the district of Trieste, and the whole of the Tyrol; and fixed their head quarters at Vilnach, within sixty leagues of Vienna. At length, from a succession of unfortunate events, the emperor thought it prudent to enter into a negociation; a message from the directory was therefore communicated to the council of five hundred, respecting the preliminaries of peace between France and the emperor, announcing that hostilities throughout Germany had ceased. The basis of these preliminaries, approved by the executive directory, were the cession of Belgium by the emperor and king; the acknowledgement of the limits of France, such as they have been decreed by the laws of the republic; the establishment and the independence of a republic in Lombardy. The emperor recognized the independence of the Batavian republic. He received as an indemnification, a part of the Terra Firma of Venice; Venice was to receive in exchange the legations of Bologna and Ferrara: and there was to be a congress at Berne, to regulate the definitive articles. The two powers were to invite their allies to be present at the congress to treat for a general pacification. Mantua was to be restored to the emperor.

The war on the continent might now be considered as terminated. An emperor and a pope humbled; the imperial crown reduced to little more than an empty name, and the pontifical tiara held at the will of the conqueror; two kings subjected—one to humiliation, and the other to unconditional submission;—Corsica restored to France without an effort—and a new and formidable republic erected in that country which had beheld the overthrow of five armies appertaining to its ancient master; such is the summary of the political efforts and martial achievements of general Bonaparte, who had scarcely attained the thirtieth year of his age (l).

The British arms under general Abercrombie and admiral Hervey, were successful in the West Indies. A resolution was formed by those two officers to attack Trinidad, a considerable island to the southward of Tobago. The arrival of part of the convoy from England, enabled them to proceed with confidence in their operations. So soon as the troops could be collected from the different islands, which were ordered to rendezvous at Curaçao, the admiral sailed from Martinique, which island he left with his squadron on the 12th of February. The precision with which the admiral had given his orders to assemble the ships of war and transports, would not admit of a moment's delay. On the 15th, in the morning, the fleet sailed from Curaçao. The next day it passed through the Bocas, or entrance into the gulf of Paria, where they found the Spanish admiral, with four sail of the line and a frigate, at anchor, apparently ready for sailing, under cover of the island of Gaspagrande, which was fortified. The British squadron came to anchor opposite, and almost within gunshot of the Spanish ships. The frigates and transports were ordered to anchor higher up in the bay, and at the distance of nearly five miles from the town of Port d'Espagne. The disposition was immediately made for landing at day-light zeal, and courage, had never, for a long series of years, been once sullied by the breath of calumny or suspicion, was, with three or four other officers, omitted in the honourable mention made by lord Howe, in his official dispatches, of those whom he thought entitled to "his particular thanks" for their exertions upon this occasion. We shall not, however, presume to animadvert on this extraordinary omission. Naval Chron. xi. 8. But on the 14th of February, 1799, he was elevated to the rank of admiral of the blue squadron.

(i) Bonaparte, in addressing the executive directory, thus expresses himself: "I have endeavoured to display the generosity of a Frenchman towards general Wurmser, who is seventy years of age, to whom fortune has been particularly cruel during this campaign; but who has never ceased to manifest a constancy and a courage which history will record. Surrounded on every side, after the battle of Bassano, and having lost at one blow, a part of Tyrol and of his army, he yet dared to hope that he should be able to take refuge at Mantua, from which he was at the distance of four or five days journey; he passed the Adige, routed one of our advanced guards at Cerea, crossed the Mulinella, and arrived at Mantua. Shut up in this city, he made two or three sorties, all of them unfortunate, though he himself commanded every time. But besides the very considerable obstacle which our lines of circumvallation presented to him, augmented by tracts of country which he was obliged to surmount, he could only act with soldiers discouraged by many defeats, and weakened by the pestilential sickness which prevailed in Mantua. That numerous body of men, who always make a point of calumniating the unhappy, will, however, doubtless, load Wurmser with calumny."

(k) The pope's letter, and the general's answer are admirable specimens of hypocrisy.

The pope, in his epistle, calls the general his dear son, and concludes as follows: "Assured of the sentiments of good will which you have manifested, we have abstained from removing any thing from Rome, by which you will be persuaded of the entire confidence which we repose in you. We conclude by assuring you of our most perfect esteem, and in giving you the paternal apostolic benediction."

Bonaparte replies, "Most holy father, I ought to thank your holiness for the obliging things contained in the letter, which you have taken the trouble to write to me.

"The peace between the French republic and your holiness is just signed: I felicitate myself in having been able to contribute to your personal safety."

(l) In the treaty which Bonaparte concluded with the pope, his holiness renounced all connection with the coalition of crowned heads; engaged to disband the troops which had been raised for the support of the war, and to shut his ports against all the powers at war with the republic. He also ceded Avignon and Venaissin to the French, and consented to pay the conquerors thirty millions of livres, (about one million three hundred and twelve thousand five hundred pounds sterling,) with sixteen thousand horses.

next morning, and for a general attack upon the town and ships of war (m).

At two in the morning of the 17th, they perceived the Spanish squadron to be on fire; the ships burned with great fury, one line of battle ship excepted, which escaped the conflagration, and was taken possession of by the English; the enemy at the same time evacuated the island, and abandoned the district in its vicinity.

The troops under sir Ralph Abercrombie landed without opposition; and as the chief town was not defended, the governor readily resigned the whole island. The Spanish troops laid down their arms, and the whole colony passed under the dominion of his Britannic majesty.

Lieutenant-colonel Simcoe was also successful in repulsing the enemy who made an attack upon the Grand Anse; and other advantages were obtained by the British troops in the island of St. Domingo, on the 30th of May and the 2nd of June.

The operations of the English navy were prosecuted this year with great zeal and courage. Our frigates and smaller cruizers captured vast numbers of the enemy's privateers, which infested our coasts; but on the 14th of February, a most signal victory was obtained by the unparalleled exertions of admiral sir John Jervis.

The British squadron amounted to no more than fifteen sail of the line, four frigates, a sloop of war, and a cutter; of these six were three-deckers, eight were of seventy-four guns, and one of sixty-four. The Spanish fleet consisted of twenty-seven sail of the line, one of which was a four-decker, and carried one hundred and thirty-six guns; six were three-deckers, of one hundred and twelve guns each, two of eighty-four, and eighteen of seventy-four. The gallant and experienced officer had been for some time cruizing, with fifteen sail of the line, off Cape St. Vincent, in hopes of falling in with the Spanish fleet. On the evening of the 13th his hopes were confirmed, by distinctly hearing the report of their signal guns, and by intelligence by sea from captain Foote, of his majesty's ship Niger, who had kept company with them for several days, on the prescribed rendezvous (which from the strong south-east winds, the fleet had never been able to reach), and that they were not more than three or four leagues distant. The admiral anxiously awaited the dawn of day, when being on the starboard tack, Cape St. Vincent bearing east by north eight leagues, he had the satisfaction of seeing a number of ships extended from south-west to south, the wind then at west by south. At forty-nine minutes past ten, the weather being extremely hazy, Le Bon Citoyenne, made the signal that the ships seen were twenty-seven sail of the line. His majesty's squadron formed in the most compact order of sailing, in two lines. By carrying a press of sail, the admiral got in with the enemy's fleet before a regular line was formed to oppose him. Now, confident in the skill, valour, and discipline of his officers and men, as well as judging that the honour of his majesty's arms and the circumstances of the war in those seas required a considerable degree of enterprize; sir John Jervis felt himself justified in departing from the regular system; and passing through their fleet, in a line formed with the utmost celerity, tacked, and thereby separated one-third from the main body, after a partial cannonade, which prevented their re-junction till the evening. The intrepid Nelson and Troubridge, in the Captain and Culloden, greatly distinguished themselves in this action. For a considerable time their ships were engaged with six of the Spanish vessels. At length they were supported by the Blenheim; and the exertions of captain Collingwood, in the Excellent, were highly instrumental in saving them from capture. When commodore Nelson's ship was disabled, he prepared to board the San Nicolas, and his orders for that purpose were instantly obeyed. The cabin door was forced by some marines; and, rushing upon the quarter-deck, he perceived that captain Berry was nearly master of the ship. All opposition being subdued in this vessel, the San Josef was boarded; when the Spanish officers delivered up their swords to the commodore. Though the conflict was partial, some other ships besides those we have particularised, had a share in it (n). By the exertions of those which had the good fortune to come up with the enemy on the larboard tack, four of their ships were captured, viz. the Salvador del Mundo of one hundred and twelve guns; the San Josef of one hundred and twelve guns; the San Nicolas of eighty-four guns; and the San Ysidor of seventy-four guns. The action ceased about five o'clock in the evening. In the squadron under the command of sir John Jervis, seventy-three were killed, and two hundred and twenty-seven wounded: total three hundred. In the captured vessels upwards of six hundred are said to have suffered. The gallant admiral was honoured with the thanks of both houses of parliament, and rewarded with a peerage and a pension.

Equal honour was reflected on the British flag by admiral Duncan, commander-in-chief of the fleet stationed in the North Sea, to watch the motions of the Dutch squadron which had been all the summer in the Texel. Admiral de Winter sailed out with a view of reinforcing the French, and flattered himself with being able to elude the observation of the English. Finding, on the 10th of October, that they had come out of harbour, the admiral placed his squadron in such a situation, as to prevent the enemy from returning to the Texel, without falling in with them. At nine in the morning of the 11th, he got sight of captain Trollope's squadron, with signals flying for an enemy to leeward; he immediately bore up, made the signal for a general chace, and soon got sight of them, forming in a line on the larboard tack to receive our fleet; the wind at N. W. As the fleets approached, the British commander made the signal for the squadron to shorten sail, in order to connect them; he soon after saw the land between Camperdown and Egmont, about nine miles to leeward of the enemy, and finding there was no time to be lost in making the attack, made the signal to bear up, break the enemy's line, and engage them to leeward, each ship her opponent, by which he got between them and the land, whither they were hastily approaching. The signals were obeyed with great promptitude, and vice-admiral Onslow, in the Monarch, bore down on the enemy's rear in the most gallant manner, his division following his example, and the action commenced about forty minutes past twelve o'clock. The Venerable (admiral Duncan's ship) soon got through the enemy's line, and began a close action, with his division on their van, which lasted near two hours and a half, when all the masts of the Dutch admiral's ship was observed to go by the board. The ship occupied by De Winter, contended at one time with two, and afterwards with three of our vessels. About two hundred and fifty of her men were killed or wounded. She was, however, gallantly defended for some time, but being over-pressed by numbers, her colours were struck, and admiral De Winter was soon brought on board the Venerable. The ship bearing the vice-admiral's flag was also dismasted, and surrendered to vice-admiral Onslow. Many more of the Dutch at this time, had also struck. One of the (m) On the first of February in this year, colonel Frederic, son of the late Theodore, king of Corsica, shot himself in the west porch of Westminster Abbey. The coroner's inquest pronounced the crime an act of insanity. The remains of this unfortunate gentleman were afterwards interred in the church-yard of St. Anne's, Soho, near the body of his father: about an hour before interment, the following character was placed upon the church-wall at the head of his grave: "Here lie the mortal remains of colonel Frederic, son of Theodore, king of Corsica; in his deportment he was a gentleman; in honour, honesty, and truth, he was princely; he was poor in circumstances, rich in the possession of the most liberal heart; and the greatest distress he laboured under was the want of abilities to relieve the distress of others—God be with him!"

(n) On the 28th of December, 1797, admiral Nelson received, at the office of Mr. Wilkes, (who was then chamberlain of the city of London,) a gold box value one hundred guineas, voted him for his bravery and conduct in the British service. The chamberlain thus addressed him on the occasion:

"Rear admiral sir Horatio Nelson, I give you joy, and with true satisfaction I return you thanks, in the name of the lord mayor, aldermen, and common-council assembled, who have unanimously voted you the freedom of the capital, for your distinguished valour and conduct in the favourite service of the navy, and particularly against a very superior force of the enemy off Cape St. Vincent, on the 14th of February last. Many of our naval commanders have merited highly of their country by their exertions, but in your case there is a rare heroic modesty which cannot be sufficiently admired. You have given the warmest applause to your brother officers, and the seamen under your command; but your own merit you have not mentioned even in the slightest manner; and the relation of the severe and cruel wounds you suffered in the service of your country, is transmitted by your noble commander-in-chief. May you long live to enjoy the grateful benedictions of the country, which you honour and protect."

Sir Horatio Nelson's answer.—"Sir, Nothing could be more gratifying to me (as it must be to every sea-officer) than receiving the high honour this day conferred upon me, in becoming a freeman of the great city of London; and I beg you to believe, and to assure my fellow citizens, that my hand and head shall ever be exerted, with all my heart, in defence of my king, the laws, and the just liberties of my country; in which are included every thing which can be beneficial to the capital of the empire. I beg leave, Sir, to return you my sincere thanks for the very flattering expressions you have honoured me with on this occasion."

enemy's ships caught fire in the action, and drove very near the Venerable; but it was extinguished, and she was one of the ships in possession of the victors. The British squadron suffered much in their masts, yards, and rigging, and many of them lost a number of men; though not in proportion to that of the enemy. The carnage on board the two ships which bore the admirals' flags, was beyond all description; they had no less than two hundred and fifty men killed and wounded on board of each ship. The loss on board our fleet amounted in killed and wounded to upwards of seven hundred and fifty. Nine of the enemy's ships were taken in this memorable action; more of them struck, but taking advantage of the night, and being so near their own coast, they made their escape, and some of them were seen going into the Texel, the next morning.

Admiral Duncan received the thanks of parliament for the valour and skill he had manifested on this memorable occasion, and was gratified with a peerage and pension. Even the British ladies were so captivated with the valour of the North British commander, that they decorated their heads and bosoms with plaid ribbons, in honour of the country which gave birth to so illustrious a hero. A most liberal collection was made for the widows and orphans of such of the seamen and marines as fell, or were wounded in the action (o).

Success continued to crown the exertions of our fleets stationed on the coast: between the 17th of July, and the 6th of September, the squadron under the command of sir John Borlase Warren, took one French frigate and sixteen trading vessels, and destroyed five armed ships and six trading vessels (p).

Our naval achievements, however, were tarnished by desperate mutinies in our fleets. In February, petitions were sent from all the line of battle ships at Portsmouth to lord Howe; but being all apparently written by one person, and couched in the same language, it was supposed they were only the productions of a few factious individuals, who were thought too contemptible for notice; the petitions were therefore thrown aside, and no answers returned to them. This, on the return of the fleet to port from the last cruize, occasioned an epistolary correspondence to be kept up through the whole fleet; till at length it was unanimously agreed, that no ship should lift an anchor till a redress of grievances was obtained. In this state matters remained till the 15th of April, when admiral Bridport ordered the signal for the fleet to prepare for sea: but, instead of weighing anchor, three cheers were given from the Queen Charlotte, as a signal for disaffection, which was followed by every ship in the fleet. The officers were astonished, and tried various means to bring the men to a sense of their duty; but without effect. The next day a boat from each ship was demanded, and two men from the crew of each were appointed delegates to represent the whole; and lord Howe's cabin was deemed the most proper place for their deliberations. On the 17th every man in the fleet was sworn to support the cause in which he had embarked. Their next procedure was the reeving ropes, in terrorem, at the fore-yard-arm, and turning all those officers out of the fleet who had given them any offence. The chief assertor of these demands was said to be Richard Parker, a person of a bold and enterprizing spirit, who was appointed president of the council of delegates.

On the 18th, the lords of the admiralty arrived there, and in the course of the two following days, several propositions were made by them to reduce the fleet to obedience, but without effect. On the 21st, admirals Gardner, Colpoys, and Pole, went on board the Queen Charlotte, to confer with the delegates, who informed the admirals, that it was the determination of the crews not to agree to any thing that should not be sanctioned by parliament, and guaranteed by the king's proclamation; which so irritated admiral Gardner, that he seized one of the delegates by the collar, and swore he would have them all hanged, with every fifth man throughout the fleet. This circumstance so exasperated the crew against the admiral, that it was with much difficulty he escaped from the ship with his life.

The delegates from the Royal George returned to their ship, and informed the crew of what had happened, who, after some consultation, resolved on summoning all the delegates on board their ship, which was done by hoisting the red or bloody flag, which struck terror through the fleet (the signal not being generally understood), and particularly to the officers, who trembled for the consequences, fearing that something dreadfully hostile was intended. At this moment, lord Bridport's flag was struck, with a resolution never to display it again, which drew tears from almost all the officers. The fleet then proceeded to load all their guns, ordered a watch to be kept the same as at sea, and put every thing in a state of defence, keeping every officer to his respective ship. On the 22nd, the men were in some degree pacified, and caused two letters to be written, one to the lords of the admiralty, stating the cause of their conduct on the preceding day; the other to lord Bridport, in which they stiled him their father and friend, and avowed no intentional offence to him. This had a proper effect; for on the 23rd, the admiral returned to his ship, and re-hoisted his flag; and, after a short address to the crew, informing them that the painful business of the last week would be the means of hurrying him shortly to his grave, he assured them that he had brought with him a redress of all their grievances, and his majesty's pardon for the offenders, which, after some deliberation, were accepted, and every man returned to his duty.

The mutiny, however, which was supposed to be happily terminated, in consequence of the liberal concessions of administration, broke out on the 7th of May, with greater violence than ever; occasioned, it has been said, by a misrepresentation of parliamentary discussion on the subject; and by an idea that the concessions granted to the seamen, would not be adhered to. It was renewed at Spithead. The channel fleet refused to put to sea, under pretext that government did not mean to fulfil their promises. The delegates re-assembled, and sent a deputation to the London, admiral Colpoys' ship, at Portsmouth, whom the admiral refused to admit on board, and enforced his authority, by ordering the marines to fire on the boat. This conduct was resented by the crew of the London, (o) In beginning the repairs of Worcester cathedral, in 1797, the tomb which stood in the nave, near the chancel, to commemorate the interment of king John, was proposed to be removed to a more convenient place; but, to the astonishment of the workmen, a stone coffin was discovered at the bottom, level with the floor, which, on carefully examining it, was found to contain the remains of the king. From the great length of time the body had been deposited, (so long since as the year 1216,) nothing but conjectural ideas could be formed respecting the vestments, &c. Part of the robe was firm in its texture, but of what colour, could not be ascertained. What was discovered of the body, appeared to be nearly in the same position as the figure on the top of the tomb-stone, and, from the length of the coffin, measured five feet six inches and a half: part of his sword was lying by his left side, which time had much mouldered; and the leather sheath was nearly in the same state: the most perfect part was towards the bottoms of the legs and feet, on which appeared a kind of half-boot. The robe had the appearance, in some parts, of having been embroidered, particularly on the right knee: no bones of the fingers were to be found. One point ascertained is, that the body certainly was deposited here, and not in the more eastern part of the church, as was supposed: and the extraordinary circumstance of there being no memorandum or record of the place of interment in the archives of the cathedral, is now obviated. The tomb is to remain sacred to the ashes of the king, and will doubtless be preserved with additional care and attention. The dean and chapter gave orders that the curiosity of the people should be gratified as far as could be done consistently with safety; but, the concourse from all parts becoming so great, it was deemed proper to inclose the tomb again in a few days. From the London Gazette, 1797.

(p) A letter from sir John Jervis, to Evan Nepean, esquire, furnishes an additional laurel to the brow of rear-admiral Nelson. It is dated, Ville de Paris, off Cadiz, July 5th. It begins thus,—"Sir, I desire you will acquaint the lords commissioners of the admiralty, that the Terpsichore, with the Thunder bomb, having a detachment of artillery on board, and the Urchin gun-boat, from Gibraltar, joined on the second instant, and the night following, rear-admiral Nelson having made his dispositions, the bomb, covered by the gun-boat, launches, and barges of the fleet, was placed near the tower of San Sebastian, and fired some shells into the town, when an attempt was made by the gun-boats, and launches of the enemy, to carry her. The rear-admiral, who is always present in the most arduous enterprizes, with the assistance of some other barges, boarded and carried two of the enemy's gun-boats, and a barge launch of one of their ships of war, with the commandant of the flotilla. In this short conflict, eighteen or twenty Spaniards were killed, the commandant and several wounded; he and twenty-five made prisoners: the rest swam on shore. This spirited action was performed with inconsiderable loss on our part. The launch of the Ville de Paris was sunk by a raking shot from the enemy's gun-boats; but, by the active and intelligent mind of captain Troubridge, got up yesterday morning, and repaired on board the Culloden. Rear-admiral Nelson's actions speak for themselves: any praise of mine would fall very short of his merit. I am, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

"J. Jervis."

Admiral Nelson was not so fortunate in attacking the town of Santa Cruz, in the island of Teneriffe, on the 27th of July, though he declares that more daring intrepidity was never shewn than by the officers and men under his command.

who

who immediately deposed the admiral, struck his flag, and hoisted the ensign of defiance. In this affray, several seamen were wounded, some of whom died soon after of their wounds. The next day, the London joined the mutinous fleet at Spithead, and several officers were sent on shore by their crews.

Two days after, the seamen at Spithead, agreed to permit admiral Colpoys to go on shore; and the same day an act for advancing the pay of seamen passed both houses of parliament, which, together with a general pardon, was immediately transmitted to Portsmouth. This communication seemed to give perfect satisfaction to the sailors, and they immediately agreed to put to sea.

A few days afterwards, rear-admiral Curtis arrived at St. Helen's, from Torbay, and the crews of several of the ships immediately declared themselves in a state of mutiny, and sent several of their officers on shore; but on receiving information from the delegates of the channel fleet, that government had complied with their demands, they returned to their duty.

Shortly after, several of the lords of the admiralty set off for Sheerness, followed by a messenger with his majesty's proclamation, offering his most gracious pardon to such men, as, having been seduced from their duty, should return to it again.

An admiralty board having been formed at the commissioner's house, the delegates were sent for, and introduced to lords Spencer, Arden, &c. One of the seamen, named Parker (q), the principal delegate, was the advocate for himself and for his colleagues, who amounted to about a dozen. They stood behind Parker, forming a kind of half circle, and the lords of the admiralty several times urged them to speak, but none of them would engage in the discussion, except Parker, who being the premier chief of the delegates, was called the port-admiral. Lord Spencer addressed himself to the delegates. He informed them they should have every indulgence that had been granted to the seamen at Portsmouth, and with which they had been contented; and his lordship expressed a hope, that the seamen at Sheerness would be also satisfied with those indulgences. The seamen said they had other grounds of complaint, and presented a list of them, amounting to eight articles; the first and principal of which was, the unequal distribution of prize money. The lords commissioners assured the delegates they could grant nothing of themselves, but they would mention their demands to those who must finally decide upon them. In the course of the conversation, lord Spencer asked them, rather peevishly, "What do you want?" To this Parker is said to have replied, "You are a man of sense, and you know what is due to us; you know what we want."

On Thursday, the delegates sent on shore to the admiral a declaration, stating their intention of blocking up the river Thames. They said, they had heard that the Dutch fleet was on the point of sailing; and as they were determined to have their grievances settled, they would bring things to an extremity at once. Accordingly the Standard, Inspector, Brilliant, and Swan, got under weigh, and moored at equal distances across the mouth of the Thames. Soon after, several vessels standing down the river, were obliged to come to an anchor near the ships of the mutineers. The Monmouth at the same time moved her birth.

On the 7th of June, the earl of Northesk, who had been long confined on board the Montague, arrived in town from the Nore, with some resolutions adopted by the mutinous delegates, to be presented to the king; but previous to his departure from the mutineers, he received the following paper to ratify his credentials.

"Sandwich, June 6, 3 P.M.

"To Captain Lord NORTHESK,

"You are hereby authorised and ordered to wait upon the king, wherever he may be, with the resolutions of the committee of delegates, and are directed to return back with an answer to the same, within fifty-four hours from the date hereof.

"R. PARKER, President."

No answer being given to the application of the mutineers, shortly after divisions took place in the rebel councils. A proclamation was now published, declaring the crews of the ships at the Nore in a state of rebellion; and prohibiting all intercourse between them and his majesty's faithful subjects.

After several remonstrances of the delegates, and an attempt to negociate through the medium of lord Northesk, the mutineers were given to understand, that nothing but unconditional submission would be accepted. At length the dread of the vigorous measures intended to be taken by government, produced dissatisfaction and altercation among the mutineers. The moderate part of the crews, endeavoured to emancipate themselves from their mutinous brethren, and the more violent were confounded and dismayed. But there was an obstinate struggle before the loyal party triumphed.

On the 15th of June, the Repulse, one of the ships that had been in a state of rebellion, made for Sheerness, and the Leopard went up the Thames. Other vessels, particularly the Nassau, also attempted to leave the mutineers, but they were prevented. The Repulse ran aground, and in that helpless situation, was fired upon by the Monmouth, the vessel which followed her close. A lieutenant lost his leg, and another man was wounded by a splinter. This was very remarkable, as many hundred shot were fired at her, and they were seen in great numbers to strike the water close to the Repulse. The Ardent afterwards, in the dark escaped, and, in passing the Monmouth, fired at her, by which it was said some few were killed or wounded. Next day, the delegates, finding it impossible to effect their purpose, made various propositions, but discord had got footing among them. It was then that the red flags were struck, and that the trade was allowed to pass up the Thames; it was then that distrust of each other, and despair of succeeding in their demands, took possession of the seamen's minds, and that every ship was suffered to follow her own course. In this state they remained on the 17th, in hopes of a general pardon; but finding that government was decided in refusing it, and that the most vigorous preparations were making to force them to submission, they resolved to allow every ship to do the best for itself, and no longer to oppose the desertion.

On the 18th, the Nassau, the Standard, and others, made off a little way up the Thames, and next morning the five ships sailed up the river to Gravesend, with a flag of truce flying. On the 19th, in the afternoon, the Champion sailed in under the guns of Sheerness, and at night the Monmouth, regarded as the most desperate ship of all, came into the Little Nore, under the guns of the fort, to surrender; but so little faith was placed in her apparent intentions, that every preparation was made to compel her to submit. The guns at the fort were ready to fire on her, and the Ardent drew up on the opposite side, so that she would then have been between two fires, if she had attempted to resist. When she first came in, it was with difficulty the crew of the Repulse could be restrained from acts of hostility against her.—The same night, the Brilliant and some others came into Sheerness, and the Lion and a frigate went up the Thames. About three o'clock next morning, the Sandwich came under the guns of the fort. The Grampus arrived in the course of the forenoon, and the Director arrived off the fort about half past four o'clock. The Swan sloop of war arrived in the evening. She was nick-named the Little Inflexible, to distinguish her for her violence; the Inflexible being regarded as the most outrageously mutinous, and the most obstinate of the whole fleet.

The apprehension of admiral Parker was considered as a service of danger. Several of the officers of the Sandwich were on deck, and but few of the men appeared. As soon as Parker heard that a boat was come for him, he surrendered himself to four of the ship's crew, to protect him against the outrages of the other seamen, whose vengeance he feared. Admiral Buckner's cockswain informed the officers on deck of the nature of his business, and claimed their assistance. The lieutenant drew his sword, and the party, consisting of eight or ten, went down below, where Parker was surrendered into their hands. They tied his hands together behind, and the officers quietly conducted him into the boat, which had eight or ten rowers, and a party of the West York militia seated at the head, with their faces towards the stern, and their muskets held upright in their hands ready charged. Parker was seated in the stern part, and before him sat the lieutenant of the Sandwich, holding a drawn sword over him. In this situation, the boat left the ship, and the rowers pulled with extraordinary vigour. The top of the stairs and the surrounding parts were crowded with spectators, principally soldiers. Parker being landed, was marched through the dock-yard by a party of the West York militia, and imprisoned in one of the cells under the chapel of the garrison; where, having remained for several hours, he was conducted to the commissioner's house, to be examined, and then committed to Maidstone gaol. Many of the delegates and committee-men were afterwards brought on shore, the principal of which were from on board the Sandwich. They were all guarded and lodged in the cells of the prison.

(q) Richard Parker, who became so conspicuous on this occasion, descended from a respectable family in Exeter, Devon. He obtained a good education, was bred in the navy, and, about the conclusion of the American war, was an acting lieutenant in one of his majesty's ships. He soon came into the possession of a considerable sum of money, and, shortly after he arrived in Scotland, he married a farmer's daughter in Aberdeenshire, with whom he received some property. At this time, being without employment, he soon dissipated his money, which involved him in debt; on account of which, he was imprisoned in the gaol of Edinburgh, where he was at the time the counties were raising seamen for the navy. He then entered as one of the volunteers for Perthshire, received the bounty, and was released from prison, on paying the incarcerating creditor a part of his bounty. He was put on board the tender then in Leith Roads, commanded by captain Watson, who carried him with many others to the Nore. On the passage, captain Watson distinguished Parker, both by his activity and polished address.

Order and subordination being now restored, government instituted an enquiry into the conduct of those delegates who were taken into custody. Accordingly, the trial of Parker, by a court-martial, commenced on the 22nd of June, on board the Neptune of ninety-eight guns, and lasted till the 26th, when he was found guilty of various acts of mutiny, and disobedience of orders; in consequence of which, sentence of death was passed upon him by the court-martial.

Parker, with a degree of fortitude and composure, which astonished every one, thus addressed the court:—"I have heard your sentence—I shall submit to it without a struggle—I feel thus, because I am sensible of the rectitude of my intentions. Whatever offences may have been committed, I hope my life will be the only sacrifice—I trust it will be thought a sufficient atonement. Pardon, I beseech you the other men—I know they will return with alacrity to their duty." The prisoner was then taken on board the Sandwich, the ship destined for his execution.

On the 29th, the prisoner, who had taken his usual repast in the birth allotted him in the gun-room, and passed the night in great composure, was awaked a little after six o'clock, from a sound sleep, by the martial provost, who, with a file of marines, composed his guard. He rose with cheerfulness, took his breakfast, and then prepared for the approaching aweful solemnity. At half past eight he was informed that the chaplain was ready to attend him to prayers on the quarter-deck, which he immediately attended uncovered, and recited some verses out of one of the penitential psalms. At nine o'clock the preparatory gun was fired, which he heard without the smallest emotion. Ascending the scaffold, he asked the captain, "whether he might be permitted to speak?" and immediately apprehending his intention might be misconceived, he added, "I am not going, sir, to address the ship's company!—I wish only to declare, that I acknowledge the justice of the sentence under which I suffer, and I hope my death may be deemed a sufficient atonement, and save the lives of others." He then requested "a minute to collect himself," and knelt down alone about that space of time; then rising up, said, "I am ready." The halter being adjusted, and the cap being drawn over his face, walking by firm steps up to the extremity of the scaffold, he dropped the handkerchief, and submitted to his fate on the yard-arm of the ship which had been the chief scene of his power.

After the execution of Parker, who was considered as the ringleader of the mutiny, it was thought expedient by government to exhibit exemplary justice in the punishment of the other most atrocious offenders; many of whom were accordingly hanged at the Nore, and other places, after having been convicted upon substantial evidence of their guilt. Some of them were only scourged for their offence; and a free pardon was granted to many of those who received condemnation.

In the mean time, the French, determined to persevere in their plan of alarm, landed to the amount of about twelve hundred miserable wretches, on the coast of Wales, in the month of April; but they met with so warm a reception from the loyal inhabitants, that they were compelled to surrender at discretion; and after being detained as prisoners till August, were embarked at Milford, to be transported to their own country. They are said to have consisted of galley-slaves, and other criminals from Brest; and the object was supposed to be to create an alarm on the British coast, and to rid the French republic of a number of desperate fellows. They were without artillery, and almost without accoutrements. As two of the ships which brought them over were returning into Brest harbour, they were captured by the St. Fiorenzo and Nymph frigates (r).

On the 30th of June, lord Malmesbury and the honourable H. Westley, his secretary, set out for Lisle, to negociate a peace with the plenipotentiaries of the French republic. The negociation was continued till September; on the 11th of which it was terminated, in consequence of the following order from the French executive directory: "The executive directory order that citizens Trielhard and Boniere, commissioners to negociate a peace with England, shall transmit, on their first conference with lord Malmesbury, plenipotentiary minister of the king of England, a note, the object of which shall be to know, 'whether this minister has sufficient powers to restore to the French republic and its allies, all the possessions which have fallen into the hands of the English, since the commencement of the war.' The plenipotentiaries will require his answer within the day. The executive directory further order, that if lord Malmesbury shall declare that he has not full powers to establish this basis, which the laws and treaties that bind the republic render indispensible, or if within a space prescribed he does not return an answer, he shall depart, within twenty-four hours, to his court to obtain them."

The English minister refusing to comply with the requisition of the directory, instantly quitted Paris with his suite, and on the 20th, arrived in London. In October, an official declaration was published, relative to the rupture of the negociation with the French republic.

The spirit of party continued to prevail throughout Great Britain in general, and the metropolis in particular. At a common hall of the livery of London, held on the 23rd of March, a motion was made, "That an humble address and petition be presented to his majesty, upon the present alarming state of public affairs, and praying him to dismiss his present ministers from his councils for ever, as the first step towards obtaining a speedy, honourable, and permanent peace;" which was carried in the affirmative, as were also several other resolutions, tending to carry that into effect. The following day, the sheriffs of London went to St. James's in state, to know the king's pleasure when he would receive the address of the livery of London, voted at the common-hall; they were not admitted to the presence as usual, his majesty sending out a message by the duke of Portland, that he never received addresses on the throne, but from the corporation of the city of London.

On the first of April, another numerous meeting of the livery was held at Guildhall; when the sheriffs, having reported that his majesty declined receiving upon the throne, their address for the removal of ministers; the following resolution was passed by the meeting with only one dissenting voice: "That the answer given to the sheriffs, when they attended to know his majesty's pleasure as to the time of receiving their petition, was given by the third secretary of state, one of the persons for whose removal they petitioned; that the sheriffs do again attend at St. James's, and request a personal audience of his majesty, at which, if granted, they do represent to the king, that it is the privilege of the livery to present petitions to the sovereign on the throne; and that the sheriffs do make a report of this application to a future hall." The sheriffs attended according to the above resolutions, when his majesty in person confirmed the message before delivered by the duke of Portland.

To counteract the measures of that party of the citi-

(r) About this time, the prince of Wirtemberg arrived in London, and was presented to the princess royal of England, his intended bride. His serene highness proceeded a few days after on a tour to Bath, Bristol, Birmingham, Oxford, Portsmouth, and other places, and was gratified by the loudest acclamations of the people. On his return, the marriage was performed with the usual ceremony and magnificence, and on the 2nd of June, the prince, with his royal consort, set out for Germany: and on the 21st, arrived at Stutgard, the capital of the duke of Wirtemberg's dominions.

zens of London, who were averse to the proceedings of ministers, and therefore wished their removal; another party, attached to them, and desirous of their continuance in office, caused to be drawn up and signed, a declaration of a very opposite tenor.

Murmuring, however, still prevailed among a very numerous body of the people; and on the 3rd of July, a meeting convened by the corresponding society, was held in an open field near the Veterinary College, St. Pancras. At two o'clock, near five thousand people were assembled. Three tribunes, as they were termed, were erected in different places. Before the first tribune sir W. Addington presented himself on horseback, attended by an escort of constables. Other magistrates attended and took their stations before the different tribunes. Among the populace who surrounded them were many persons of respectability and fortune.

At two o'clock, the president at the first tribune came forward, and read the advertisement by which the meeting was convoked. On the meeting being declared illegal by the Bow Street magistrates, a person was deputed to wait on them, and to enquire in what consisted its illegality; and to say, that if their proceedings were considered as trenching on the late Convention Bill, they should avoid the investigation of those points. Mr. Justice Ford replied, "that he did not consider himself as obliged to give any explanation of the law; and if they proceeded, the London corresponding society and the Bow Street magistrates should be at issue." On receiving this general answer, the persons who assumed the title of the executive committee, did not hold it incumbent on them to forbid the meeting which had been summoned.

The address being received with some small tokens of applause, the same person proceeded to read a petition and remonstrance to the king, which, he said was to be followed by the moving of a certain resolution. Here the reader was interrupted by an assertion, that the proclamation for dissolving the assembly as illegal had been read. Mr. Ferguson, a barrister at law, who occupied one of the tribunes, then addressed the meeting, and conjured them quietly to separate; and, to prevent mischief, to depart to their several homes. He said, the question was now really at issue, and it remained to be seen, whether the magistrates of Bow Street were to be regarded as the interpreters of the law of England. Sir William Addington then gave orders that Mr. Ferguson, and others, should be taken into custody. The populace did not attempt to hinder the constables from executing their orders, and indeed the persons who were arrested, were earnest in deprecating any interference in their behalf. They were ushered into a hackney coach, and escorted by a party of constables to Bow Street.

In the evening, they were brought before sir William Addington, at the public office, charged with having aided and assisted in certain illegal proceedings respecting the above meeting. Evidence was called to prove the charge, which being established to the satisfaction of the bench, they were ordered to find bail to answer the complaint at the next sessions, themselves in one hundred pounds, and two sureties in fifty pounds each. The charge against Mr. Ferguson, was supported by a Mr. John Smith, who deposed, that he heard Mr. Ferguson address the people from one of the tribunes, after the proclamation had been read, in nearly the following words:—"Citizens, I beg of you to disperse, and not stay here to be butchered; we shall hereafter see, whether or not the Bow Street magistrates are the interpreters of the law." Mr. Ferguson strenuously denied the whole of the charge, but declared he was ready to give bail, which was accordingly executed in the usual form.

About this time disturbances took place in different parts of Scotland, to oppose the ballotting for persons to serve in a militia, it being its first introduction into that country: a very unpleasant circumstance occurred at Tranent in particular, on one of these occasions. On the arrival of the deputy-lieutenants and magistrates in that place, they were insulted and abused in the grossest manner, by multitudes of people whom they found assembled. The women were particularly clamorous, and for some time seemed to take the lead: for the men, either ashamed of the business, or wishing to conceal their strength, at first thought proper to keep out of sight. The deputies desired that the cavalry should be drawn up at the east end of the town, as they were anxious that the constables only, if possible, should be employed in keeping off the crowd from the door of the house which they had entered. In about half an hour, a squadron of the Pembrokeshire cavalry arrived, and soon after great numbers of people, chiefly colliers and salters, assembled from all parts of the country, armed with immense bludgeons. As soon as they had collected their forces, they sent up to the deputy-lieutenants, a most insolent and threatening paper, (that they denominated a petition,) which the deputies received, but told the person who presented it, that it would not prevent them from going through with their business, and doing their duty. The mob then began to press extremely on the house where the deputy-lieutenants were assembled: a shower of pieces of brick soon demolished the windows, while the concussion on the walls and roof was dreadful, and made them believe they should instantly be demolished. All attempts to remonstrate were in vain. The officer who commanded the cavalry, addressed himself to the crowd, and begged them to desist, for if they proceeded to extremities, and the military were ordered to act, a great many of them would suffer. At this time, the soldiers received many severe blows from the stones which were thrown from the tops of the houses, and the street. The commanding officer was in imminent danger; and a serjeant of the Cinque Ports cavalry, at this time received so severe a blow on the head from a stone, that his life was despaired of.

Several other attempts were made to keep possession of that part of the street which was opposite to the door, but they were all equally ineffectual: the men were completely driven off; and had not orders been at last reluctantly given to fire, the military would doubtless have been defeated, and the magistrates and deputies seized and murdered. On these orders being given, some of the Pembrokeshire cavalry were directed to fire with their pistols, at the men on the tops of the houses, which they did for a considerable time, without the smallest effect: the men on the houses treating the pistol-firing with contempt. An officer of the Pembrokeshire observing this, took a party of the Cinque Ports, (who had carbines), from the right, and went to the rear of the house, on the north side of the street, and dismounted them. They now fired with considerable effect, which speedily brought them down from the tops of the houses, and enabled the military to get the better of them. The magistrates then interposed, and many of the rioters were apprehended, and sent to Haddington gaol; which terminated this alarming affray.

The national thanksgiving for the three great naval victories of lord Howe, St. Vincent, and Duncan, took place on the 19th of December; his majesty, attended by both houses of parliament, went in state to St. Paul's, where the colours which had been taken in the different engagements, were deposited.

The preliminaries of peace between the court of Vienna and the French republic, were now signed by Bonaparte, in the name of the French republic, and by the Neapolitan minister, on the part of the emperor. Among other articles, the Netherlands and the duchy of Luxembourg were ceded to France, the independence of the new Italian republics, and the navigation of the Rhine were acknowledged. By a secret article, the French, it is said, undertook to indemnify the emperor by a part of the Venetian territories, and by secularizing some of the ecclesiastical states of Germany (s).

In Ireland the prospect now became extremely gloomy. In the northern parts of that island, the peasants rose in large bodies, and committed such depredations, that general Lake, in the beginning of March, published a proclamation, requiring every person in the northern district to deliver up their arms of all kinds to the military, and declaring the whole district in a state of insurrection. The coërcive measures adopted by government were strenuously opposed in the Irish parliament, as tending to defeat the very purposes for which they were avowedly adopted;

(s) Amongst the events of this year, we deem it necessary to record the death of two very singular characters—Edmund Burke and John Wilkes; they both possessed eminent talents, and were long zealous champions in the cause of liberty: but as versatility is almost inseparable from frail mortals, the ardour of the latter degenerated into a total indifference respecting the interests of the common weal; and the pen and eloquence of the former, were employed in the decline of life in the support of principles evidently repugnant to those they had so ably maintained in its meridian: and we have only in candour to observe, that "it is the lot of humanity to err." Mr. Burke's invectives were so severe, that they seemed to manifest a malignity of disposition, though they rather proceeded from an irritability of temper.

but as they were declared to be expedient, and even indispensable, by a great majority in both houses, they were pursued with vigour, and very disastrous consequences followed.

On the 25th of May, Mr. W. Ponsonby moved in the house of commons, for a reform in that house, which was negatived by one hundred and seventeen to thirty; on which Mr. Grattan and the leaders of opposition seceded from parliament, which was dissolved on the 11th of July.

The number of insurgents who had assumed the title of United Irishmen, increased so greatly, that the whole kingdom of Ireland was put under martial law. Many actions took place between the king's troops and the rebels; which, though generally terminating in favour of the royalists, rather increased than diminished the number of the disaffected; and such was the prevalence of party rancour and animosity, that the inhabitants of this unhappy country were exposed to the most dreadful outrages, both from the military and the insurgents. Several trials occurred for treason and conspiracies, some executions ensued, and other punishments were inflicted on convicted persons; and in this perturbed state was the sister kingdom at the close of the year 1797 (t).

With respect to the affairs of the continent, warlike operations were now suspended by consent of both parties; so that the only occurrence worthy of notice, is the detection of a league formed in Paris, in consequence of which Barthelemy, one of the executive directory of France, general Pichegru, nine of the council of ancients, and forty members of the council of five hundred, with many other leading men, were seized and confined on a charge of having entered into a conspiracy to restore monarchy, and destroy the republic, for which they were afterwards banished to Cayenne, in South America.

To spread alarm throughout this country, the executive directory ordered, in the month of October, that an army should be assembled on the French coasts, to be called the "Army of England," and to be commanded by general Bonaparte, for the purpose of invading England; and the merchants of Paris voluntarily offered to subscribe to a loan for the completion of the avowed design. The event, however, proved that the destination of this armament, was far more remote than was generally apprehended. Every preparation was made on the part of the English government, to counteract the project: military associations were formed, and the people, waving political prejudices, embarked in every measure for the defence of their country; but fortunately there was no necessity for the exertion of those services (u).

The British parliament met on the 2nd of November, pursuant to prorogation, when the session was opened by a speech from the throne, in which his majesty expressed his concern for the failure of his endeavours to restore to his subjects the blessings of peace, on secure and honourable terms; assuring them that the rupture of the negociation was solely to be ascribed to the inordinate ambition, and inveterate animosity of the enemy. He assured them of his firm reliance on the wisdom and vigour of their counsels, and on the zeal, magnanimity, and courage of a great and free people. He extolled the public spirit displayed by the army and navy, and made honourable mention of the victory lately obtained by his fleet under the command of admiral lord Duncan. He exhorted the commons to an animated exertion, and stated the necessity and importance of supporting effectually public credit, in order to convince the enemy of the ability of the nation to support with vigour an arduous contest as long as necessary, for the safety, honour, and independence of these kingdoms.

The address to his majesty on this occasion, was moved in the house of lords by the earl of Glasgow, and seconded by lord Gwydir: an amendment was moved by earl Fitzwilliam, who declared his opinion, that this country could never obtain a secure peace from France, until her monarchy was restored, and with it, the reign of hereditary law, morality, and religion in that country.

Lord Grenville differed from the noble earl in his inference, that under no circumstance an adequate peace could be made with the present government of France. He allowed it was a consideration of a most momentous nature, and the question of peace with such a country should be regarded with all possible cautionary attention. His lordship then expressed his disapprobation of the noble earl's amendment. The question upon earl Fitzwilliam's motion was then put and negatived, and the address carried in its original form. The noble earl entered a protest.

A similar motion was made and carried on the same day in the house of commons, but not without some pointed observations on the side of opposition. The thanks of the house were voted to lord Duncan, for the signal victory he had lately obtained over the Dutch fleet.

In the house of commons, Mr. Tierney submitted a proposition on a subject which he represented as highly offensive and derogatory to the honour and independency of the house. The subject he alluded to was the creation of the office of a third secretary of state, in the person of Mr. Dundas, in contravention to an express act of parliament for the abolition of certain useless places, and to preserve the honour and independence of parliament against the influence of the crown. To this third department was attached, he said, patronage and salary, amounting to thirteen thousand pounds per annum, which, added to the emoluments of the other two, out of which it had sprung, amounted to a sum exceeding forty thousand pounds a year. He concluded by moving, "That the office of secretary of state for the war department, was an addition to the other two, and that the right honourable Henry Dundas, having accepted that office, was incapacitated from sitting in that house."

The only question on view of this subject was, said Mr. Dundas, Whether he was bonâ fide the secretary of state described in the act? To make it appear that he did not come within the description, he mentioned that he delivered up the seals which he had in custodia to his majesty, who transferred them to the duke of Portland: other seals were entrusted to him. With the appointment he had no new patent, no new salary. He remained, he said, "one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state," and this description applied equally to the three. According to the legal import of the act, it did not prohibit the creation of a third secretary of state, it merely interdicted a third secretary sitting in the house.

Mr. Pitt vindicated the appointment of a third secretary of state. The act, he contended, did not restrain generally: it merely says, that the office of third secretary should not be tenable with a seat in the house.

After some further debate, a division took place, when there appeared, for the motion, eight; against it, one hundred and thirty-nine—majority, one hundred and thirty-one.

In the house of lords, the lord chancellor, in consequence of a previous motion, communicated personally to lord Duncan the thanks of that house, for the signal victory he had lately obtained; and congratulated his lordship on his accession to the honour of a distinguished seat in that house, to which his meritorious professional conduct had deservedly raised him. His lordship made an appropriate reply.

The house then entered into a discussion of his majesty's declaration, together with the substance of a variety of papers, relative to the late negociation. On this occasion lord Grenville adverted to a variety of circumstances relative to the belligerent powers, for some time previous to the negociation. His lordship detailed several circumstances in the conduct of the French government, more immediately connected with the negociation; and vindicated the steps taken on the part of this country during the (t) Gold seven-shilling pieces were ordered to be received as the current coin of this kingdom, on the 2nd of December, 1797.

(u) On the 16th of November, this year, Frederic William the Second, king of Prussia, died at Potzdam; in consequence of which, his successor sent the following letter to the executive directory of France:—

"Frederic-William the Third, by the grace of God, king of Prussia, margrave of Brandenburgh, arch-chamberlain, and elector of the Holy Roman Empire, &c.

"To the French republic, and in its name to the citizens who compose the executive directory.

"Mighty and dear Friends,

"Providence having disposed of the days of the king my father, deceased on the 16th of this month, and having called me to the throne of my ancestors, I hasten to announce to you these two events, persuaded that you will take a part in the loss I have sustained, and that you will feel yourselves interested in my accession to the regency of the Prussian states. I shall take the greatest care to cultivate and cement the harmony which I find happily established between the two nations; and for that purpose, I pray God, high and dear friends, to have you in his holy keeping.

"Your good friend,

"FREDERICK-WILLIAM."

"Berlin, Nov. 17th, 1797."

negociation, which he contended were open, fair, and manly, and such as would best conduce to the attainment of a safe and honourable peace. He would not, he said, enter into a discussion of what particular terms would or would not be proper for this country to accede to in a definitive treaty; but he insisted that the idea of giving up all our acquisitions as a preliminary, could only be regarded by the ministers of this country as the height of madness and folly. Under these impressions, expressing a confidence that their lordships must coincide with him, he moved an address to his majesty, the general substance of which was, "That their lordships had taken into their serious consideration the various papers relative to the late negociation for peace, which his majesty ordered to be laid before them; and that they beheld with regret and indignation, the inordinate ambition and unwarrantable pretensions of the enemy, by which his majesty's endeavours to attain an adequate peace were frustrated;" and concluded with assurances of support to his majesty, in the warmest and most affectionate language. The address was passed unanimously.

The same subjects were introduced into the house of commons, on the day following, and Mr. Dundas proposed the question for the adoption of the address transmitted from the lords for the concurrence of the house, which was passed nem. con.

The state of Ireland was recommended to the consideration of the house of lords by earl Moira, who, said lord Grenville, seemed disposed to accuse government of being hostilely inclined towards the sister kingdom, and eager to keep up in it a system of coërcion.

The lord chancellor declared, he thought an interference in the British parliament, in an affair of internal regulation in Ireland, as a very serious consideration. It will be in effect a breach of the solemn compact made with Ireland—of that renunciation of all controul whatever over the legislative concerns of that country, which was deliberately made by the parliament of Great Britain. Such a proceeding, he said, he could never silently suffer to be called a mere matter of form. And thus the matter rested.

On the 24th, the chancellor of the exchequer proposed to raise seven millions, as part of the supplies for the year, by doubling, trebling, &c. of the assessed taxes, estimating, thereby, to take a tenth part of every man's income, who had or acquired more than sixty pounds a-year. This proposition occupied the attention of the house at intervals, by adjournment from this day to the 5th of January following, during which very interesting debates took place; though it would be superfluous to repeat them in this place.

The produce of the augmented assessments being inadequate to the expectations of the proposer of the tax, he resolved to enforce the payment of large sums, not by the criterion of expenditure, but by that of INCOME. By the former impost very few paid so much as a tenth of their income; but by the new scale every one was required to contribute at least a tenth part of their revenue. It was now proposed, that no person whose annual income did not amount to sixty pounds, should be obliged to contribute more than the taxes which he already paid; but those who had an income exceeding that amount, should be additionally burthened according to the regulations of the following table:

Where the said annual income shall appear to be not less than (v)

(v) This being the first avowed tax upon income, though many indirect imposts have had a similar operation, we have deemed it expedient to state the particulars of its origin, introduction, and proportional operation; but though the project, after having been abandoned for a time, has experienced a renovation, accompanied with more rigorous clauses, we hope it will be enforced no longer than the exigencies of the times will be thought a sufficient apology for the exercise of so burthensome a measure.

And where the annual income shall appear to be not less than two hundred pounds, every person shall be entitled to such an abatement of the additional duty now granted as may be necessary to reduce the same, to a sum not exceeding one-tenth part of the said income.

That evasions and fraudulent statements might be prevented, it would be required of the party applying for relief to give in his declaration upon oath, and also that his statement should be open for inspection, the better to detect false returns. Commissioners were to be appointed in different parishes and districts, to conduct the business, with a small compensation for their trouble.

Persons with large families, he thought, were fair objects of modification or exemption. The committee might think it most desirable to fix the scale according to the number of children. Those who had no family he thought should be rated higher in proportion to their income. Having gone through this statement, Mr. Pitt recurred to the principle on which his scheme was founded. It was not, he said, free from objections on the first view; but he challenged any gentleman to produce a scheme for raising so considerable a sum in a mode so universally comprehensive, equal, and more susceptible of modification and abatement. He also wished to remind them that the burthen would not be permanent; and that though it would be too much for ordinary occasions, the present was one which imperiously demanded it. He concluded with moving a series of resolutions founded upon the above statement.

Sir William Pulteney approved of the principle, and said, that he did not think its operation was sufficiently extensive. Mr. Nichols deprecated the system as oppressive and unjust. The secretary at war spoke in favour of the scheme, and vindicated the conduct of ministers. Mr. Pierpoint said, he thought it would be a great improvement of the plan, if the royal family offered their contributions.

Mr. Tierney opposed the scheme in a speech of some length, after which a division took place, when there appeared for the resolutions moved by the minister, two hundred and fourteen; against them, fifteen; majority, one hundred and ninety-nine!

The following day, on the question being put for the reading of the resolutions a second time, Mr. Wigley said, that on a subject so novel and important, the minister ought to allow an interval for deliberation. It was also he said of that alarming and oppressive nature, that members should have an opportunity of consulting their constituents. Mr. Hussey said, he disapproved of the plan, not from a desire to throw obstacles in the way, but because he thought a better might be adopted. The resolutions were then read the second time, and bills ordered pursuant thereto.

The chancellor of the exchequer, desirous of bringing this important business to a conclusion before any recess of parliament should take place, brought up a bill for trebling the assessed taxes on the 7th of December, and after the first reading, immediately put the question for its being read a second time. After being strenuously opposed by Mr. Wilberforce Bird, and censured by Mr. alderman Lushington, for bearing too hard on the lower classes of the community, the question was put and carried.

The debates on the assessed tax bill being resumed, in the house of commons on the 14th, the order of the day for the second reading being read, Mr. Wigley supported the arguments that had been used in behalf of tradesmen, and the middling class of the people; and contended that the tax ought to bear in a greater proportion on those who were in a higher station in life.

Mr. Henry Thornton said, he was instructed by the unanimous voice of his constituents, to oppose the bill.

Mr. Yorke urged the second reading of the bill; a more practical criterion of property, he said, could not be found than that of expenditure. Mr. Nichols alledged that the principle of the bill went first to destroy the lower and midling classes of society, and next to destroy the capital of the country.

Mr. Sheridan observed, that it was a penalty upon the retrenchments of œconomy, an encouragement of perjury, and a commission of bankruptcy against the whole nation. The principle of the bill was, he said, a fiscal contribution, it went to establish in every parish a fiscal inquisition, to report the profits of every individual—a most enormous proceeding in a free commercial country. By this inquisitorial act, a tradesman, whose income might fall from two hundred to one hundred and fifty pounds, must either disclose his circumstances, which would still more reduce his credit, or be guilty of perjury, and defraud his creditors by paying the abominable tax with their money.

Mr. Pitt said, that after the most accurate inquiry in his power, every objection which had been made against this bill did not affect its principle, but might easily be obviated in a committee, without altering the general principle, or defeating the tendency of the measure. The house then divided, when there appeared a majority for the bill of one hundred and twenty-five!

On the 18th, several modifications in the bill were offered to the house, by the chancellor of the exchequer, who also brought up the scale of payment, as proposed by the committee on the bill, which, with other particulars became the subject of future consideration, until the 3rd of January, 1798, when very interesting debates took place, on the motion for the third reading of the bill, which were continued on the 4th and 5th.

Mr. Sheridan said, it was not his wish to withhold the supplies. Whoever was in administration, and whether the war was just and necessary or not at the commencement, our fleets and armies must be supported. It had been asked, "Can you devise any better mode of raising the supplies?" Though it did not fall within his department to bring forward schemes of finance, he felt no hesitation in declaring, that the only constitutional mode was to persevere in the old way, by loan, with the payment of interest, with a sinking fund kept inviolate and inalienable. Mr. Fox expatiated fully on the pernicious tendency of the bill, and said, that he had that night attended in consequence of the request of his constituents; but he still retained his opinion, that a general attendance upon that house would be of no service to the country, and therefore he should decline attending in future.

Mr. Pitt having replied to Mr. Fox, animadverted on the secession of the leaders of opposition, and said, as he was unable, at that late hour, to enter into a long detail upon the bill, he should leave it to the decision of the house, which, he said, would, he was sure, be confirmed by the voice of the country. After a desultory conversation, rather than a debate, Mr. Pitt's original motion was put; which was carried by a majority of one hundred and eighty-five! On the motion for the further consideration of the assessed tax bill, the question was put and carried, and the house proceeded to receive clauses by way of riders. After the amendments were read, the bill passed.

The assessed tax bill was brought into the house of lords on the 9th, when, after a short debate, the house divided, and there appeared for the bill fifty, proxies twenty-three—seventy-three; against it, six—majority, sixty-seven.

The earl of Oxford and lord Holland entered a protest against the bill.

On the 3rd of April, in the house of commons, Mr. Wilberforce, in pursuance of notice, moved for leave to bring in a bill "for the abolition of the slave trade, at a time to be limited." After some debate, a division took place, for Mr. Wilberforce's motion, eighty-three; against it, eighty-seven; majority, four.

The most important subject which now claimed the attention of parliament, was the proposition from the chancellor of the exchequer, for the redemption of the land-tax, which he opened in the house of commons on the 2nd of April. Having premised that the object of the measure he had to propose was to invigorate public credit, to facilitate the means whereby we were to continue the struggle with a most implacable enemy, and to animate the spirit of the people, by shewing the strength of our resources; he said, his proposition was to convert the land-tax into a perpetual annuity, which should be equally destined to the public service, and in making this conversion to produce a large pecuniary advantage to the public. He wished, he said, by diminishing the quantity of stock in the market, to remove the pressure which, of all others, was most sensibly felt. This ill-adjusted and unequal tax was so plausibly introduced, that the bill for that purpose was enacted, in defiance of many strong objections from different members.

This bill came under the consideration of the house of lords on the 11th and 12th of the same month, passed on the 12th, and was ordered back to the commons. A protest was entered against it, on the journals of the house, by several noble lords.

On the 29th of June his majesty came to the house of peers, and after having delivered, from the throne, a speech to both houses, the lord chancellor, by his majesty's command, prorogued the parliament.

The spirit of rebellion in Ireland, was about this time, productive of every species of evil that can annoy society, or bring destruction on mankind, collectively or individually. Such were the outrages committed on persons and property in the villages, that the inhabitants who had any possessions in them, were under the necessity of relinquishing their homes, and taking shelter in the great towns; in consequence of which Queen's County, and the County of Tipperary were in the month of May almost totally deserted; and this emigration had come to such a height, that in the latter county, a proclamation was issued, charging persons with cowardice for leaving their houses, and desiring such emigrants to return within forty-eight hours.

The king's troops assisted by the yeomen of Ireland, having greatly repressed the audacity of the rebels, their leaders perceived their cause was losing ground, and that they must either hazard an insurrection, or resign their hopes. The arrest of the Leinster provincial committee, and several other leading members of the union, on the same day, tended so much to disclose the guilt of the party, that the conspirators resolved, without delay, to make one desperate effort. Their intention was to surprize Dublin, the camp at Loughlingstown, and the artillery station at Chapelizod, on the same night. The insurrection being commenced near the metropolis, (the signal for announcing which, was to be the detention of the mail coaches,) it was supposed that the north and south would also rise. The lord lieutenant was to be seized, and all the privy council, separately in their own houses; and the night of the 23rd of May was resolved on for the execution of this design.

The government informed of the purpose of the conspirators, caused several of the leaders to be apprehended on the 19th and 21st of May; and on the 22nd, the lord lieutenant sent a message to both houses of parliament, informing them of the intended insurrection. Notwithstanding many military precautions, it took place in the neighbourhood of Dublin, on the night appointed, and every possible effort was made by the disaffected within the town, to co-operate with those without; the party in the provinces using, at the same time, every exertion, to incite the people into action.

The measures adopted in the metropolis prevented any movement whatever; but acts of open rebellion were committed in the counties of Dublin, Meath, and Kildare. About half past two, on the morning of the 24th, a regular attack was made by a rebel force upon the town of Naas, where lord Gosford commanded, with part of the Armagh militia, and detachments of the fourth dragoon guards, and Ancient Britons. The rebels consisted of about one thousand men, armed with musquets and pikes, and made their attack with great regularity, but were repulsed by the Armagh militia, with the loss of near two hundred men; they made another unsuccessful attack the next day, and had almost an equal number slain. There was also an attack made on a party of the ninth dragoons, which suffered much, but after some time, general Dundas was enabled to come up with a considerable body of the rebels, near the hills of Kilcullen, where they were entirely routed with considerable loss. Several bodies of rebels collected in the course of the night, in different parts near Dublin, which were attacked and dispersed with some loss; and some prisoners and horses were taken. A party of them, however, assembled on the border of the county of Dublin, near Dunboyne, overpowered some constables, and took the baggage of two companies, guarded by a small party of fencibles; and having committed many outrages, several of them were killed, but as the body remained undispersed, the lord lieutenant issued a proclamation, directing, that all persons, acting, aiding, or assisting in the rebellion, should be punished according to martial law. The insurgents appeared in the neighbourhood of Baltinglass to the amount of four or five hundred; a party of the Antrim militia were sent to attack them; and while these troops were advancing upon them, in the town of Stratford, captain Stratford appeared at the other end of the town, with part of his corps. The rebels being thus attacked on both sides, were completely routed, having upwards of one hundred killed, and many wounded. Near Hacketstown, three hundred were left dead on the field, and about four hundred to the north of Dublin, on the hill of Taragh, among whom was the commanding officer, in his uniform.

In the beginning of June the insurrection broke out in great force in the county of Wexford, and the rebels assembled in considerable numbers; it was supposed at least four thousand, and many of them mounted. Colonel Campbell, at Athy, had partial engagements with the rebels; and many of them were defeated at Monastereven and Carlow, with considerable loss. Near Kildare, three hundred, and near Newton-Ards five hundred were slain, who had descended from Vinegar-hill (w).

A victory was obtained over them by sir James Duff, who with infinite alacrity had opened the communication with Limerick, and arriving at Kildare, while the rebels had possession of it, completely routed them, and became master of the place.

A proclamation was now issued by the principal Roman catholic inhabitants, exhorting the deluded people to return to their duty and allegiance; and declaring their determination to stand or fall with the present existing constitution; in consequence of which, the rebels on the Curragh of Kildare, surrendered their arms, and delivered up a number of their leaders.

On the 18th of June major-general Lake was fiercely attacked by the rebels in his position at New Ross; but after a contest of several hours, they were completely repulsed, with great loss. Lord Mountjoy fell in the beginning of the contest. A party of rebels, consisting principally of protestant dissenters, took possession of Antrim, which, however, they soon lost. At Balinah-Inch, about four thousand men were routed, by fifteen hundred under major-general Nugent; and the northern insurrection was speedily suppressed.

In these encounters the king's troops sustained considerable loss in killed and wounded, among whom were some officers of distinction; and, particularly lord viscount O'Neil, governor of the county, who died of a wound with a pike, from his own park-keeper.

Shortly after their expulsion from Antrim, the insurgents quarrelled, and out of two thousand who were in arms, the commander could only retain fifty; the rest having left the camp, destroyed their arms, and declared that they never would again carry an offensive weapon against his majesty or his loyal subjects.

About the time of the last engagement in the north, general Needham was opposed to a great body of rebels, near Arklow. On the 10th of June they made their approach in two large columns, while the whole intermediate space, embracing his entire front, was crowded by a rabble, armed with pikes and musquets, and bearing down without any regular order. The general's position was very strong: as soon as they were come within a short distance, he opened a heavy fire of grape shot, which continued for two hours and a half, when the enemy fled in all directions, after the fall of about three hundred and fifty of their associates. The Durham fencibles were much applauded for their intrepidity and firmness on this occasion.

On the 20th, marquis Cornwallis arrived in Dublin, in the capacity both of commander-in-chief, and lord lieutenant of Ireland. The public virtues of this distinguished nobleman; his military talents, and also the peculiar moderation and mildness of his character, are well known.

The following day, the great rebel camp, near Wexford, was attacked by the king's troops, under colonel Moore, and vanquished after an action of an hour and a half. The rebels fled with precipitation, and left several pieces of cannon behind them. Colonel Moore then pushed on to Wexford, which had been in possession of the rebels, and entered it so opportunely, as to prevent its being laid in ashes, and hinder the massacre of the remaining prisoners by the rebels, who on the preceding day, had murdered upwards of seventy of them in cold blood, and thrown their bodies over the bridge. The rebels having fled from Wexford, on the approach of colonel Moore, sent a proposal to general Lake, commander-in-chief of the king's troops, importing that they were ready to lay down their arms, and return to their allegiance, provided their persons and properties were duly guaranteed; on which conditions, they would endeavour to induce the people of the country to return to their duty. To this proposal general Lake replied, that he could not attend to any terms offered by rebels in arms against their sovereign; but, to the deluded multitude, he promised pardon, on delivering into his hands their leaders, surrendering their arms, and returning with sincerity to their allegiance.

Various actions took place from this period to the close of August, in some of which his majesty's troops experienced partial defeats; but the rebel party were generally routed with great loss. Many of the leaders of the conspiracy, now despairing of their cause, consented to make a voluntary confession of all the circumstances within their knowledge; and it is from their own account, given on oath, that we are enabled to state the rise and progress of this rebellion, and the correspondence carried on with France. On condition of a full disclosure of what they knew, they were permitted to migrate to some country to be agreed on between them and government, giving security never to return to Ireland without permission of his majesty's ministers; and thus this formidable rebellion was quelled in a considerable degree, but not entirely.

A great deal of information was given by the principal leaders; as it appeared from the examinations of Dr. M'Nevin, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Neilson, counsellor Emmet, and many others, that an executive directory of the Irish union was instituted at an early period of the discontents, of which lord Edward Fitzgerald, Dr. M'Nevin, Arthur O'Connor, and Mr. Emmet, were members; that in the year 1796, lord Edward Fitzgerald and Mr. Arthur O'Connor, set out for Paris, in order to negociate with the executive directory of France, for the invasion of Ireland by a French force; but that fearful of a discovery of their intention, they proceeded no farther than the Rhine, where they met general Hoche, to whom they communicated the object of their mission; that that officer formed arrangements with the executive directory; that a fleet with general Hoche and a formidable army on board, was, in consequence of those arrangements, sent to Ireland in the month of December following: but not being expected by the directory of the union, till the spring of 1797, the people were not prepared to receive the enemy when they arrived at Bantry Bay. That Dr. M'Nevin afterwards went to France on a similar mission, and succeeded in obtaining a promise from the directory, that another attempt should be made; that a fleet was accordingly fitted out in the Texel, and several thousand men embarked on board of it, for the purpose of invading Ireland; that the troops, after remaining some time on board were disembarked; that the fleet, which was under the command of admiral De Winter, put to sea without the troops (probably for the purpose of giving battle to the British squadron, and with the hope of clearing the way for the transports to come out); and that the result was, the glorious victory achieved by admiral Duncan on the 11th of October. It appears also from the report, that the real object of the union had all along been the accomplishment of a revolution, and the separation of Ireland from Great Britain; that parliamentary reform and catholic emancipation had been used as mere delusive veils to cover their designs; that the French directory, between whom and the directory of the union, a regular correspondence for some time had been kept up, on being applied to for a loan to enable the promoters of the rebellion to effect the proposed revolution, refused to comply with the request, unless they were permitted to send an army of sufficient force to take possession of the country as a conquest to their arms; and, finally, that there was at that moment, an agent from the united Irishmen residing in Paris. These were the leading points of the report of the secret committee, and which left no doubt of the real designs of the chief actors concerned in the rebellion.

In the month of September, when the faint sparks of the rebellion could hardly be perceived, about a thousand French troops and general Humbert (x) landed from three frigates in the Bay of Killala, and succeeded in taking possession of the town of that name, and the palace of the (w) Vinegar-hill, near Enniscorthy, was, for several weeks, the chief station of the southern revolters, and the scene of their vindictive barbarities.

(x) The design of the French in conjunction with the united Irishmen will appear evident from the following orders signed by general Humbert.

"LIBERTY, EQUALITY—ARMY OF IRELAND.

"At the head-quarters at Castlebar, 14 Fructidor, the 6th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

"General Humbert, commander in chief of the army of Ireland, orders as follows:

1. "The

the venerable bishop of the diocese, in which he and his family were confined as prisoners: but the French general was obliged to submit to the king's troops under the command of general Lake, who being greatly superior in number, obtained a complete victory over them in the battle of Ballinamuck with a very trifling loss; while that of the enemy must have been very considerable, as no less than twenty-four principal officers were taken prisoners; and a great number of subalterns, the whole amounting, according to the estimate of their own Chéf de Brigade to eight hundred and forty-four. The enemy, in their retreat before the king's troops were compelled to abandon nine pieces of cannon, which they had taken in former actions with his majesty's forces.

In the morning of the 16th, a French national brig called the Anacreon, having on board general Rey, and the notorious James Napper Tandy, Chéf de Brigade, appeared off the little town and island of Rutland, on the north-west coast of the county of Donegal, a place so utterly unnoticed, except for its convenience for the herring-fishery, as not to be defended by a single soldier. When the crew of the brig, who were principally Irish, made good their landing, they solicited information respecting the French army which had landed at Killala. Nothing could equal their dejection when they were informed that the whole French force had been destroyed, and that they had been joined by comparatively very few of their Irish rebel friends. The Anacreon was laden with many stand of arms to supply those who were willing to join the French army; but such was the caution or the terror of the country people, that as soon as the French appeared, they retired to the mountains. Napper Tandy and his friends were now fully convinced that the inhabitants of Rutland were not disposed to further their designs; they deemed it most prudent to reimbark, and thus ended this rash attempt (y).

Frustrated in their plans of invasion by the French, and defeated in their own efforts to effect a revolution in their country, the united Irishmen now considered their cause as truly desperate. They continued, however, to commit depredations, and perpetuate their usual cruelties; sallying forth occasionally, and skirmishing with parties of the king's troops under a leader of the name of Holt; but being always repulsed in their attempts, their constant resource was to flee to the bogs, mountains, and recesses, and thereby escape the vengeance of their pursuers. But all their hopes were defeated, by the capture of a French fleet, by sir John Borlase Warren, which had sailed from Brest, with a formidable armament for the purpose of a more powerful invasion than had been previously attempted; and which, had a landing been effected, would probably have revived the rebellion, and perhaps have been the means of going near to effect the designs of the enemy in severing that island from the British empire; but by the capture of this fleet, the rebels received their final overthrow.

The hostile armament of the French was composed of a ship of the line and eight frigates, with a military force, and a great quantity of stores. Sir John successfully engaged and captured the principal ship and six frigates. Wolfe Tone, one of the establishers of the seditious society, being taken with the French, was tried by a court martial, and sentenced to die the death of a felon, an ignominy which he thought proper to avoid by being his own executioner.

Having given a full account of the rise and overthrow of the Irish rebellion, we must now advert to the affairs of the continent. Holland was completely revolutionized, the principles of the new constitution, according to late decrees, were to be the abolition of the respective sovereignty of the provinces, and of the feudal system; the exclusion of the Orange party, and the enemies of the sovereignty of the people, from the right of voting for ten years after the acceptance of the constitution; a plan of a new system of finance, founded on the relative abilities of individuals; the abolition of provincial quotas; the separation of the legislative, executive, and judicial powers; an annual responsibility for the public expenditure; a strict alliance with the French republic, &c.

The Batavian constituent assembly established its new government on a variety of constitutional bases: the last and most important of which was, "That there shall be a strict union between the French and the Batavian republics, in such a manner, that the latter, though considered as completely free, can entertain no political or commercial connection with the enemies of France; and that, in future, the two republics shall consider the cause of either as a common cause."

It appeared by authentic accounts, about this period, that the war in Switzerland might be considered as terminated. The cantons of Berne, Zurich, Basle, Fribourg, and Soleure, having been forced to yield, the smaller cantons were following their example. Uri, Lucerne, Schaffhausen, Underwalden, Glaris, and the town of Winterther, had now declared in favour of the French system of liberty and equality. Lucerne, which seemed the most resolute in opposition, seeing itself deserted by the other cantons, would make no further attempts to resist the French, but merely guard its own frontiers. The loss of the Swiss, in the late different engagements, was estimated at seven thousand, among whom were about four hundred women. The Swiss fought with a bravery worthy their ancestors; and many of them refused to accept quarter. The whole of the Swiss cantons had now indeed declared, that they were willing to accept the plan of a constitution prepared for them at Paris.

In Italy, the French pursued their revolutionary system in the same manner. Early in the month of February, the pope left Rome with an escort suitable to his age and dignity, and proceeded to Florence, where he took up a temporary residence. On the 15th, the people repaired in great crowds to the place Campo Varino. There they proclaimed their liberty with shouts, that the Roman republic was resuscitated by an act signed by several thou-

1. "The government of Connaught shall reside at Castlebar, till further orders.
2. "It shall be composed of twelve members, to be nominated by the commander in chief of the French army.
3. "Citizen John Moore is appointed president.
4. "Provisions are required for the French and Irish armies.
5. "Eight regiments of infantry and four of cavalry shall be raised.
6. "The government will declare rebels and traitors all those who, having received arms or cloathing, shall not join the army in twenty-four hours.
7. "Every individual, from sixteen to forty, is called upon to repair to the French camp, to march in a mass against the English."

(y) The following are copies of two proclamations which they issued: they are each headed by an harp surmounted by the cap of liberty, and bearing the motto Erin go Bragh: that is, Ireland for ever.

LIBERTY OR DEATH.

Northern Army of Avengers.

Head Quarters, the First Year of Irish Liberty.

"UNITED IRISHMEN,

"The soldiers of the great nation have landed on your coast, well supplied with arms and ammunition of all kinds: with artillery worked by men who have spread terror amongst the ranks of the best troops in Europe; headed by French officers, they come to break your fetters, and restore you to the blessings of liberty.

"James Napper Tandy is at their head. He has sworn to lead them on to victory or to die. Brave Irishmen! the friends of liberty have left their native soil to assist you in reconquering your rights. They will brave all dangers, and glory at the sublime idea of cementing your happiness with their blood.

"French blood shall not flow in vain: To arms!—Freemen, to arms! the trumpet calls; let not your friends be butchered unassisted; if they are doomed to fall in this most glorious struggle, let their death be useful to your cause, and their bodies serve as footsteps to the temple of Irish liberty.

"GEN. REY,
"In the name of the French officers and soldiers now on the coast of Ireland."

LIBERTY OR DEATH!

Northern Army of Avengers!

Head Quarters, the First Year of Irish Liberty.

GEN. J. N. TANDY to his COUNTRYMEN.

"United Irishmen!

"What do I hear? The British government have dared to speak of concessions! Would you accept of them?

"Can you think of entering into a treaty with a British minister; a minister too, who has left you at the mercy of an English soldiery, who has laid your cities waste, and massacred inhumanly your best citizens—a minister, the bane of society, and the scourge of mankind. Behold, Irishmen . . . he holds in one hand the olive of peace; be aware, his other hand lies concealed, armed with a poniard. No, Irishmen, no!—you shall not be the dupes of his base intrigues. Unable to subdue your courage, he attempts to seduce you; let his efforts be vain.

"Horrid crimes have been perpetrated in your country. Your friends have fallen a sacrifice to their devotion for your cause. Their shadows are around you, and call aloud for vengeance.

"It is your duty to avenge their death. It is your duty to strike on their blood-cemented thrones the murderers of your friends.

"Listen to no proposals, Irishmen; wage a war of extermination against your oppressors, the war of liberty against tyranny, and liberty shall triumph!

"J. N. TANDY."

sands of the citizens. The tree of liberty was afterwards planted before the capitol, and in several of the public places. But this afterwards appeared to be rather the effect of the phrenzy of the moment, than a deliberate act founded on a rational conviction of its propriety.

On the 4th of May, general Bonaparte set out from Paris; and on the 19th embarked at Toulon, on board admiral Brueyès's ship l'Orient, (formerly the Sans Culottes,) a three-decker. The fleet set sail with a favourable wind. The transports, with the infantry and cavalry, got under weigh at day-break, with eight frigates. This formidable armament, which was intended for the invasion of Egypt, consisted of fifteen ships of the line and eighteen frigates. The transports, to the number of four hundred, were off Hieries. An immense number of infantry, with artillery, vast quantities of mortars, howitzers, furnaces, bombs, grape and cannister-shot, and other ammunition, were put on board. Men of letters, astronomers, geometricians, and artists of every sort, also embarked. The convoy from Genoa consisted of thirty-eight sail, with ten thousand men on board. Kleber, Berthier, and other generals, had also embarked.

The general-in-chief, Bonaparte, harangued the officers and soldiery, previous to their embarkation, in the following spirited terms:—"Soldiers! you form one of the wings of the army of England; you have braved the perils of war on mountains, on plains, and in sieges. There now only remains a naval war, in which you are equally to signalize yourselves. The Roman legions, whom you have sometimes imitated, but whom you have not yet equalled, alternately fought Carthage on this same sea; and, on the plains of Zama, victory never deserted them, because they uniformly evinced themselves courageous, patient of fatigue, disciplined, and united among themselves.—Soldiers! Europe has its eyes fixed on you. You have a high destiny to fulfil, battles to engage in, dangers to brave, fatigues to encounter. You will perform more than you have hitherto done for the prosperity of the country, for the happiness of mankind, and for your own glory.—Soldiers, sailors, infantry, cavalry, artillery! be firm and united; and do not forget that in the day of battle, you will stand in need of each other's help. Military seamen, (soldats matelots,) you have hitherto been neglected; but at present the republic has nothing more anxiously at heart than your welfare. You will, no doubt, shew yourselves worthy of the army of which you form a part. The Genius of Liberty, which rendered the republic, from its very birth, the arbitress of Europe, intends also to make it the arbitress of the seas, and of the most distant countries!"

The fleet arriving at Malta on the 9th of June, a request was made by the French general for water, which was refused by the grand-master, who declared ironically, he could admit but two ships into the port. On the 10th, the French were on shore early in the morning, and Malta was invested, and the town cannonaded in all quarters. The besieged made a sally, in which general Marmont, at the head of the nineteenth brigade, took the standard of the order. On the 11th, the knights surrendered the town and port, as well as their property in the island, to the French republic. The victors found at Malta two vessels, one frigate, four gallies, twelve hundred pieces of cannon, and forty thousand muskets.

After the French fleet had quitted Malta, no intelligence was received concerning it till the 31st of August, when a letter arrived at the East India House, from Mr. Tooke, the company's agent at Constantinople, dated July the 23rd; stating from the report of the captain of the port of Alexandria (z), who had escaped from thence to Cyprus, from whence he had forwarded a dispatch to Constantinople, that Bonaparte actually disembarked at Alexandria, on or about the 8th of July, from fifteen to twenty thousand men. Bonaparte's fleet, ships of war, and transports, were stated to be near three hundred sail.

The French directory, flushed with success, had meditated a chimerical plan of extending their arms to the wilds of Arabia, subjugating Egypt, and, as many conjectured, of pursuing their passage to the East Indies, where they indulged an idea of ransacking all the territories of the English company, and returning home with an enormous quantity of plunder.

In consequence of the landing of the French troops, the Grand Signior, enraged at the insolent conduct of the directory, issued a memorial, which was delivered to all the foreign ministers (a). The memorial was followed by a declaration on the part of the Porte against the French, and an imperial decree was issued for pursuing the most vigorous measures to attack them by sea and land.

In the spring an expedition was undertaken, to annoy the possessors of the Netherlands. When planned in the British cabinet, it was entrusted to captain Popham of the royal navy, and major-general Eyre Coote, as commander-in-chief of the land forces, who, in conjunction, had it in charge to repair with a squadron of ships, and a select number of troops, to Ostend, in order to destroy the gates and sluices of the canal of Bruges, by which means their communication with the Netherlands would be very materially obstructed. The squadron reached Ostend on the morning of the 19th, and through the judicious management of captain Popham, and the exertions of the officers and seamen under his command, the greater part of the troops were speedily disembarked, the sluices were completely destroyed, and the object of the expedition thereby attained, with the loss of only five men killed and wounded. The commander-in-chief then sent a summons to the town of Ostend, to surrender, and received for answer from the French commandant, that it was the unanimous resolution of the council of war sitting on the occasion, not to surrender the place till they were buried under its ruins. The British troops, on their return to the beach the next day, found, that from an increase of wind and surf, their communication with the fleet was nearly cut off, and that it was impossible to re-imbark the troops. Thus perilously situated, every effort was made for annoying the enemy in their approach to an attack. About four in the morning, two strong columns of the enemy advanced on their front, with several other columns on their flanks. A severe conflict was maintained for two hours, till the British troops, being overpowered by numbers, their left and right flanks were completely turned; and, at the moment that general Coote had put himself at the head of the eleventh regiment, to regain the advantageous ground from which they had retreated; at that very critical period, he received a very severe wound in his thigh, and being unable to proceed, he sent for major-general Burrard, who finding that the enemy was pouring down upon them on all sides, and several valuable officers, and many of the best men were killed and wounded, thought it prudent to surrender; for had the British troops persisted but a short time longer in the conflict, their fate would have been decided by the bayonet. Several officers of rank were wounded; two of them mortally; about thirty privates, and twelve seamen (including petty officers,) were killed, and fifty wounded. The number of those who surrendered prisoners of war, including officers, amounted to upwards of eleven hundred.

But the loss sustained in this expedition, was amply compensated by the conquests and captures made by the (z) The sandy shore at Alexandria being almost level with the sea, nothing of the beach is seen till you are almost in the harbour, which is very precarious, being little sheltered, and very rocky; the bottom is so much so, as to make it necessary to under-run every cable, and to moor opposite the castle with four cables, two a-head, two a-stern, lashed to others as far as four anchors are carried, and a buoy of some sort to each lashing. Thus every cable crossing each other, form quite a net, and would employ one ship's company two days at least to anchor; but it is a rule to send from the ships in harbour as many men as can be spared to assist the vessel coming in, it is so exposed, and there is sometimes so much swell, as to cause great confusion and distress. No boats can come off or land at this time, nor do the Turks desire they should, as they wish to see your vessel lost, in expectation of plunder. There is very little provision to be had of any kind: water is so extremely scarce, that you are obliged to purchase it at a dear rate, and the Turks, if you are not attentive, will put in salt water to increase the profits.

(a) The following is a copy of the memorial: "The Porte, as all Europe knows, has long continued at peace with France, and on terms of the strictest amity and good understanding; which good understanding it has done every thing in its power to maintain. With the utmost surprize, therefore, has it seen the Turkish territories abruptly, and in a most extraordinary manner, attacked by the French arms.

"A man of the name of Bonaparte, giving himself out to be a French general, has made war on the Turkish province of Egypt. It is impossible for the Porte to believe that such a proceeding, so contrary to the rights of all nations, can ever be countenanced, much less commanded, by the French executive directory. A considerable force has, however, been sent to Egypt, to stop the progress of the invaders.

"Some of the emissaries of Bonaparte have pretended to persuade the people of Egypt, that they have been sent by Mohammed to give them perfect liberty and happiness, and render their religion the sovereign religion on earth; but the people have answered, that Mohammed authorises no injustice; and that they can place no faith in such promises from those who have denied their God, and renounced their own prophet."

Constantinople, Sept. 2.

British navy; which may be said, in the truest sense of the phrase, to have maintained the empire of the seas, while one grand achievement at length crowned the whole. After receiving intelligence of the conquest of Malta, and the departure of the French fleet from that island, a squadron was dispatched in pursuit of them, by admiral lord St. Vincent, from his fleet, under the command of rear-admiral sir Horatio Nelson. A long time elapsed before he fell in with them; and, in the interval, the public mind was universally agitated, for the result of an expedition so highly important to the interests of Great Britain.

After a long search for the fleet of the republic, he at last discovered it in the Bay of Aboukir, near the mouth of the Nile. He instantly directed his course towards them, and found them at anchor; in a line extending from N. W. to S. E. They were at single anchor, with springs on their cables, and riding head to wind, which was from the north-west. To approach them, it was necessary to sail round an island, and a reef which projected from it, to the distance of several miles from the point on which the small fort of Aboukir stands. The wind was perfectly fair both for this, and for approaching the fleet; but, unfortunately, in rounding the reef the Culloden, the leading ship, commanded by the gallant Trowbridge, ran aground, and could not take a part in the action. After this accident, admiral Nelson had only ten ships (three having fallen several leagues astern) to fight thirteen of the enemy, and several of these of superior force to any of those under his command.

The island also, fortified with two mortars, and some heavy guns, was to be passed within gun-shot; but he determined on an immediate assault, and made the signal to attack the van and centre of the enemy. It was nearly six in the evening when he closed with them. About half the number of his ships got between the enemy and the shore, either by cutting through their line, or sailing round the head of it, and the rest attacked on the outside. All dropped their anchors, so as to place themselves opposite and close to their opponents; one of the ships, in passing, destroyed the carved work of the enemy's stern. By this disposition all that were engaged on the land side were taken unprepared; the Zealous fired three broadsides before a gun was returned from that side.

The enemy began their efforts as soon as our ships came within shot. The Zealous dismasted the Guerrier, the headmost ship of the enemy's line, in three broadsides, and she was completely beaten in five minutes. Their six headmost ships were taken possession of the first night (remaining still at anchor), and L'Orient blew up, when the awe of the explosion produced a cessation of firing; but the conflict was speedily renewed. The next morning, at day-light, the action recommenced, and other ships were taken or destroyed; nor did the battle terminate till the forenoon of the third day, (August, the 3rd, when the enemy's rear was compelled either to surrender or run. Two ships of the line, and two frigates, by their being less disabled in their masts and rigging than our ships; escaped, though they were pursued. All the captured ships were dismasted. The Timoleon shared the fate of L'Orient; and those of her crew who swam to the shore, were said to be massacred by the Arabs. The advantages held out to Nelson by the French admiral were great indeed. If he could not have made such a disposition of his fleet at anchor, as to command the bay of Aboukir, he should have got his fleet under sail, that every ship might have had a chance of coming into action. As it was stationed, his line was so disposed as to lie in the direction of the wind, whilst Nelson had the option of attacking the line to the windward; and, of course, of throwing out of the action all the leeward ships, which, being tied down at anchor by their faulty disposition, could not repair to the assistance of those which were attacked; in consequence of which, the different parts of their line were beaten in succession; and victory inclined in favour of the English. In this action, seven ships of seventy-four guns each, were taken; one of eighty, and one of seventy-four were burned, besides a frigate of thirty-six guns, and another of the same force, that was sunk. One ship of eighty guns, one of seventy-four, one of forty-eight, and one of forty-four guns escaped.

The French began with great intrepidity; their admiral and commander-in-chief Brueyes was killed by a cannon-ball; many officers of rank fell, and the general slaughter was immense, all the ships that were engaged being greatly shattered. Admiral Nelson was wounded on the head, and obliged to be carried off the deck; but the service suffered no loss by the event, through the skill and intrepidity of captain Berry, the admiral's captain. The number of killed and wounded on board the British fleet, was, killed, sixteen officers, one hundred and fifty-six seamen, forty-six marines; wounded, thirty-seven officers, five hundred and sixty-two seamen, seventy-eight marines: Total, eight hundred and ninety-five. The killed and wounded of the enemy could not be ascertained, but without doubt it was very great. They also lost their admiral, while the victors lamented the death of captain Westcott.

This triumph diffused over the world, the renown of Nelson, and crowned the British seamen with immortal honour. The exertions of the gallant admiral, and the intrepid combatants who manned his fleet, furnished a lasting topic of conversation.

This victory was the most splendid and decisive of a series, in which, in the course of five years, such a number of French ships of the line were taken, as were alone sufficient to form a considerable navy; and had reduced the maritime power of France, from being the second in Europe, below that of Russia, and to a level with that of Sweden. It frustrated all attempts of invasion, and defeated the chimerical project of the directory of France concerning Egypt. The gallant admiral obtained the reward he so justly merited in a peerage and pension, and his name will be transmitted with honour to posterity (b).

To complete the success of the year, the fortress of Cittadella, and the island of Minorca, surrendered by capitulation on the 15th of November, to general Stuart and commodore Duckworth. This important event was accomplished without the loss of a single man; the Spaniards on the island, though they had a great superiority of force, not choosing to make any material resistance. There were found in the fortress immense quantities of stores and ammunition.

On the morning of the 19th of February, 1798, the lord mayor, attended by a numerous body of respectable merchants and bankers, appeared upon a temporary hustings, erected in the Royal Exchange, for the purpose of promoting the voluntary contributions recommended for the service of the country. The area of the Exchange was crouded with the most respectable merchants and traders of London, to the number of many hundreds. The lord mayor, in a concise speech, having stated the object of the meeting, Mr. Bosanquet observed, that they were now called upon, in a crisis of danger and difficulty, to step forward in defence of their country. The merchants of London, he declared, would ever support the high character for patriotism and liberality, which they had so successfully established; and he hoped that the present subscription would not only aid the public

(b) Shortly after the news arrived in England, a message was sent to parliament by his majesty, intimating that he had granted a pension of 2000*l. per annum* to lord Nelson, and to his two next heirs, in consideration of the eminent services of his lordship, which grant they resolved to establish.

We cannot suppress our inclination of communicating to the public, the particulars of the polite attention shewn by the king of Naples to admiral Nelson. His majesty's ship the Culloden, captain Trowbridge, the Alexander, captain Ball, and the frigate Bon Citoyenne, came into the port of Naples, on the eighteenth of September. His Sicilian majesty went out in his boat into the bay to meet them, as did numerous English and Neapolitan boats. The ships gave the royal salute to his majesty. Admiral sir Horatio Nelson, in the Vanguard, accompanied by the Thalia frigate, did not make his appearance in the bay till the 22nd, having been becalmed off Sicily. The king of Naples not only went off to meet the admiral, but instantly went on board the Vanguard, and continued on board till that vessel was at anchor in the port. The royal salute was given by all the king's ships, both on his Sicilian majesty's arrival on board the Vanguard, and on his leaving the ship. The day being remarkably fine, a great number of boats, with colours and music, attended the Vanguard, and all the shores and wharfs of Naples were crouded with a multitude of rejoicing people; and when the admiral came on shore, the Neapolitans received him with unbounded applause.

His majesty's ship, the Leander, of fifty guns, captain Thomson, on her voyage from the Nile, with dispatches from lord Nelson, nobly contended with the Généreux French man of war, of seventy-four guns, one of the ships which escaped from the battle of Aboukir, but, after a long and spirited resistance, was compelled to surrender to the enemy. The loss of the Leander, in this action, was three officers, twenty-four seamen, one serjeant, and seven marines, killed; seven officers, forty-one seamen, and nine marines, wounded; that of the Généreux was one hundred men killed, and one hundred and eighteen wounded.

service in a very material degree, but, as a proof of the general feelings and sentiments of the country, would be universal. Mr. Bosanquet concluded his speech with proposing several resolutions, stating the necessity of the subscription, from the conduct of the enemy; and proposing that books should be opened at the Exchange for subscriptions, to be afterwards forwarded to the bank of England; recommending, at the same time, to all bodies corporate, mayors, and chief officers of cities and towns in the kingdom, to call meetings, and promote subscriptions in their respective districts. The resolutions were unanimously agreed to, accompanied by the loudest plaudits. The thanks of the meeting were then returned to the lord mayor, and books were immediately opened, to which great numbers appeared crowding to be among the foremost of the subscribers.

At the dissolution of the meeting, four separate books were opened on the hustings, and, at the close of the day, the exact sum subscribed in cash, was forty-six thousand five hundred and thirty-four pounds fourteen shillings and six-pence. The number of subscribers was two hundred and sixteen, and the subscriptions from one guinea to three thousand pounds, which last sum was the donation of the house of Boyd, Benfield, and Co. with the promise of continuing it annually during the war. Several other subscriptions were also set down as annual.

About this time intelligence arrived from admiral lord Bridport, that l'Hercule of seventy-four guns, a French ship, was taken by the Mars, though the captain of the latter fell in the contest. Lieutenant Butterfield succeeded to the command of l'Hercule, and captain James George Shirley, was appointed to the temporary command of the Mars. L'Hercule contained seven hundred men. Besides captain Hood, captain White of the marines was killed, and lieutenant Argles severely wounded. We had about thirty killed, and as many wounded, most of them dangerously (c).

The capture of the Loire, one of the largest and finest frigates belonging to the French republic, was announced by dispatches from captain Durham, after an obstinate action of an hour and a quarter, in which the citizen Joseph Andrien Segone, her commander, fought with great skill and bravery. The ship, which was quite new, was presented by the city of Nantes, pierced for fifty guns, mounting forty-six, having on board six hundred and sixty-four men, troops included. La Loire had forty-eight men killed, and seventy-eight wounded. Our loss was not very considerable. By this conflict, we obtained cloathing complete for three thousand men, one thousand and twenty muskets in cases, two hundred sabres, three hundred and sixty pouches, and a great quantity of ammunition of different kinds.

His majesty was graciously pleased about this time to elevate admiral Nelson to the peerage, by creating him baron Nelson of the Nile, and of Burnham Thorpe, in consideration of the great zeal, courage, and perseverance manifested by him on different occasions; and particularly of his able and gallant conduct in the glorious and decisive victory obtained over the French fleet near the mouth of the Nile.

Gaeta and Capua afterwards yielded to the valour of captain Trowbridge, commanding a little army, composed of English, Russians, Neapolitans, Piedmontese, Swiss, and Ottomans. The French obtained permission to retire into their own country, on condition of not serving again till exchanged.

Early in the morning of the 26th of March, 1799, the French made an attack on the Austrian advanced posts at Santa Lucia and Bussolengo, before the expiration of the truce, but were repulsed with considerable loss at both places. The Austrians had many officers and men killed and wounded. General Kray repulsed the enemy at Leguago, killed two thousand, made two thousand prisoners, took fourteen pieces of cannon, and pursued the remainder of the enemy towards Mantua. The Piedmontese insurgents were now become so formidable against their new lords, as to threaten the capital (d).

The court of directors of the East India company, came to the resolution of thanking lord Nelson for the eminent services rendered by him to the company, and to request his acceptance of the sum of ten thousand pounds.

The emperor of Russia having, as a mark of friendship and regard to his majesty, and of esteem and respect towards his majesty's naval service, and particularly towards the officers and crews of the ships who served on the first of August, 1798, under the command of rear-admiral lord Nelson, signified to his majesty's minister at Petersburgh, his desire that the Leander of fifty guns, which, having been engaged in that action, was, after a most gallant and distinguished resistance, captured on its passage home by a French ship of the line of seventy-four guns, and has since been re-captured from the enemy, by his Imperial majesty's arms, at the surrender of Corfu, should be presented to his majesty, in his Imperial majesty's name, with a view to its being restored to his naval service; the king was pleased to accept this distinguished mark of attention and friendship on the part of his ally; and directed that the Leander should be received accordingly, from such officer as the emperor of Russia may direct to deliver the same, to be again placed among the ships composing his majesty's fleet employed in the Mediterranean.

A fresh war having broken out in India, with Tippoo Saib, Seringapatam, his capital, was taken, and himself slain in the assault. The earl of Mornington (since created marquis Wellesley) had made dispositions for counteracting the views of Tippoo; the sultan having received a small force from the Mauritius, and expected further assistance for an attack on the English. Eighteen thousand effective men, of whom twelve thousand were natives of India, marched from the Coromandel coast, under the command of lieutenant-general Harris; and, forming a junction with the troops of the Nizam, reduced some inconsiderable forts on the frontiers of Maissour. Tippoo, about the same time, attacked at Sidasir, a brigade of the army which had been furnished by the governor of Bombay, and was commanded by lieutenant-general James Stuart. Notwithstanding the great superiority of the assailants, in point of number, they were routed, with a loss which far exceeded that of their antagonists.

Tippoo Sultan then hastened to meet the grand army, and encountered the right wing near Malavelli. The engagement, though not sanguinary, terminated in the defeat of the Maissourians. On the approach of general Harris to Seringapatam, another favourable contest occurred to his army. He then commenced the siege of the town, and his enterprize was zealously promoted by the forces from Bombay.

The sultan neither obstructed the march of his enemies, or intercepted their supplies of provisions; an inattention which enabled them to carry on their operations with vigour and alacrity. Serjeant Graham led the forlorn hope with a cheerful countenance, but he received a shot through the head while he was fixing the colour-staff on the breach.

(c) On the 16th of October, 1798, the committee appointed to consider the best manner of disposing of the sword which had been presented to the court by admiral lord Nelson, reported the following resolution, which was agreed to unanimously: that the sword delivered to our gallant hero, lord Nelson, by the French admiral M. Blanquet, be put up in the most conspicuous place in the common-council chamber, with the following inscription engraven on a marble tablet:—"The "sword of monsieur Blanquet, the comanding French admiral, in the "glorious engagement off the Nile, on the first of August, 1798, pre-"sented to the court by the right honourable rear-admiral Nelson." The lord mayor was requested to communicate to lord Nelson, the high sense which the court entertained of the invaluable present of this sword, The thanks of the court, and a sword of the value of two hundred guineas, were ordered to be presented to lord Nelson; and the lord mayor requested to order the same, and to present it to the victorious admiral. The thanks of the court was also ordered to be given to captain Berry, and the captains, officers, and seamen, for their important services; and it was also resolved, that the freedom should be presented to captain Berry, in a gold box of the value of one hundred guineas.

(d) In the court of King's Bench, sentence was pronounced on the 30th of May, by Mr. justice Grose, on the reverend Gilbert Wakefield, for publishing a malevolent seditious libel, with intent to traduce the government of the country, and the administration of the public affairs of these realms. The offender was therefore adjudged to be committed to Dorchester jail, for the term of two years, and at the end of that term, to give security for his good behaviour for five years; himself in five hundred pounds, and two sureties in two hundred and fifty pounds each; and to continue in such jail till he had given such security.

At the same time, the attorney-general prayed the judgement of the court on Mr. Parry, the proprietor, John Vint, the printer, and George Ross, the publisher of the Courier new-spaper, for a paragraph which appeared in that paper, "stating the emperor of Russia to be a tyrant among his own subjects, and ridiculous to the rest of Europe." Mr. justice Grose pronounced the judgement of the court, which was, "that Mr. John Parry do pay the sum of one hundred pounds, and be imprisoned in the King's Bench prison for six calendar months, and enter into security for his good behaviour for five years; himself in five hundred pounds, and two secnrities in two hundred and fifty pounds each; and that John Vint and George Ross be imprisoned in the same prison, each for one calendar month."

The

The alarm attending this circumstance, having roused the sultan, he hastened along the rampart, and saw himself pursued by the grenadiers who had rushed through the breach. He endeavoured to rally the fugitives, and to check the invaders; but without effect, though he impeded their progress for a time. Retiring to the gate of the inner fort, the sultan received several wounds, and while he was aiming a blow at a soldier who was seizing his sword-belt, a ball struck him on the temple, and put a period to his life. The garrison no longer opposed; and the victorious officers eagerly repressed the violence of their men. The most rigid discipline could not prevent irregular acts of depredation; but the riches of the palace were reserved for regular distribution.

A quadruple division of the country was resolved on: the East India company obtained additional territory by this conquest; other parts were allotted to the Nizam and the Mahrattas; and the remaining portion of Tippoo's dominions was bestowed on a prince of that family which had been deprived of its power, by Hyder Ally's usurpation. By this successful enterprize, the British power in the East was established upon a permanent foundationr.

An expedition was about this time fitted out in the West Indies, under the command of lieutenant-general Trigge, and vice-admiral lord Hugh Seymour, consisting of two ships of the line, five frigates, and several transports: it arrived on the 16th of August, off the mouth of the river Surinam; when the fort New Amsterdam, and the town of Paramaribo, the capital of the Dutch colony of Surinam, surrendered by capitulation to the British commanders without attempting any resistance.

But the principal military operation undertaken by Great Britain, in this year, was the expedition fitted out to rescue the United Provinces from the hands of the French. After a long course of preparation, and a farther delay occasioned by unfavourable weather, a descent took place on the coast of North Holland. Seven thousand men, composed of French and Dutch, encountered the invaders; who with difficulty gained the advantage. The enemy had about one thousand killed or wounded, and the British combatants about four hundred and fifty. Sir Ralph Abercrombie intended to attack the Helder fort the next morning; but it was evacuated in the night, leaving our troops a considerable train of artillery. A naval magazine was also abandoned, and thirteen ships of war, with three Indiamen, were taken without opposition.

After making some judicious arrangements, vice-admiral Mitchell immediately stood down into the Texel, and offered battle to the Dutch fleet lying there; the whole of which, consisting of twelve ships of war, surrendered to the British admiral, the Dutch sailors refusing to fight, and compelling their officers to give up their ships for the service of the prince of Orange. Eight of the twelve ships mounted from fifty-four to seventy-four guns.

But as the Hollanders were averse to the restoration of the Stadtholder, few of them submitted to the intruders, the majority threatening a strenuous opposition. For several days, the invading troops could find no shelter, but by digging trenches in the sand; though they afterwards obtained more comfortable quarters. While they were waiting for reinforcements, they were vigorously attacked by a force of about twelve thousand men; but the English defended themselves so resolutely, that eight hundred of the assailants were killed or wounded, while only four hundred suffered on the part of the opponents. The guards acquired great honour in this engagement.

The duke of York now arrived in Holland with three brigades, and took the command of the army: a Russian army also disembarked. The allied host now amounting to thirty-five thousand men, the duke and general d'Herman was eager for an action. The Russians began with great impetuosity, making great havoc, and pushing forward to Bergen: Abercrombie's column penetrated to Hoorn; and the other two columns were successful in their attacks. But the rashness of the Russians exposed them to unnecessary danger, and obliged the whole force to retreat. About two thousand of the enemy were killed or wounded, and three thousand taken prisoners. Upwards of one thousand British soldiers were killed, wounded, or captured; and of the Russians about two thousand.

In another action, the army moved to the attack in four columns, under Abercrombie, d'Essen, Dundas, and Pulteney. The hostile force consisted of twenty-five thousand, including French and Dutch; the former were commanded by general Brune, and the latter by Daendels. The main body of the first column were not much opposed in the early part of the day; but, when sir Ralph Abercrombie approached Egmont, he met with violent opposition from a strong corps of French infantry, aided by a body of cavalry, and a train of artillery upon the beach. A smart conflict took place in the vicinity of Bergen: the brigades of major-general Coote, and the earl of Chatham, charged the enemy in flank and rear, and occasioned a confused retreat

At length the cavalry were baffled in an attack upon the British horse-artillery, and were gallantly driven towards Egmont, by lord Paget, with considerable loss. Night terminated the engagement, and the troops rested upon their arms. At day-break, the English and Russians were enabled to take several posts, in consequence of the retreat of the enemy. The number killed and wounded of the British combatants, amounted to upwards of one thousand three hundred and fifty. Six hundred Russians were killed or captured; but, the loss of the French and Dutch was said to be much greater.

The Russians had a considerable share in a conflict which happened on the 6th of October: they were so vigorously resisted by the enemy, that sir Ralph Abercrombie found it necessary to advance with a strong body to their relief. The action, from that moment, became general along the line, from Lemmen to the sea; but the invaders were left masters of the field. Of the Russians, about three hundred and eighty were killed, and seven hundred and thirty-five wounded. Of the British, about one hundred were killed, and seven hundred and twenty-five wounded: six hundred were also missing.

General Brune's army was rendered formidable after this action, as a considerable body of men had now joined it. This consideration, added to the ruined state of the roads, and the difficulty of procuring supplies and accommodations for the soldiers, induced the officers to resolve on a retreat. A convention was speedily adjusted between the commanders of the opposite armies. The principal of which were, that eight thousand of French and Batavian prisoners, taken before that campaign, should be restored to their respective countries: that the combined English and Russian army should evacuate the territory, coasts, islands, and internal navigation of the Dutch republic, by the 30th of November, 1799, without committing any devastation by inundations, cutting the dykes, or otherwise injuring the sources of navigation; and that the mounted batteries taken possession of at the Helder, or at other positions, should be restored in the state in which they were taken; or, in case of improvement, in the state in which they then were, together with all the Dutch artillery taken in them.

Thus terminated an expedition, the failure of which, when planned, was considered as almost impossible; and which, in fact, commenced with such brilliant advantages, and so fair a prospect of ultimate success. It must not, however, be forgotten, that the capture of the Dutch fleet almost annihilated the naval power of the new Batavian republic, and more permanently secured to Britain the sovereignty of the seas.

On the 15th of May, 1800, during the field-day of the grenadier battalion of foot guards, in Hyde Park, a shot was accidentally discharged from the ranks, which unfortunately wounded a gentleman of the name of Ongley, who was among the spectators. The shot preforated Mr. Ongley's thigh, but did not injure the bone or arteries. His majesty directed the military surgeon present to examine and dress Mr. Ongley's wound, and was much gratified by the favourable report made by Mr. Nixon, the surgeon of the grenadiers. His majesty in coming from the field, sent his commands to Mr. Keate, the surgeon-general, and Mr. Rush, the inspector of hospitals, to attend Mr. Ongley during the progress of his cure.

On the succeeding day, the following article was dispatched to the respective conductors of news-papers:—
"May the 16th, We have authority to state, that the mis"fortune which happened yesterday morning, at the field-
"day of the grenadier battallion of guards, in Hyde Park, "arose entirely from accident. A due regard to the an"xiety that every individual of the battalion feels, that "this matter should be properly understood, is our induce"ment for giving this statement to the public."

The coincidence of this event, with the attempt made at night in the theatre, tended to strengthen an opinion, previously previously entertained by some, that it was not entirely the effect of accident, but arose from a design against his majesty's person. But there was not the least reason to suppose this was the case: for the king was within twenty yards of the battalion, and about eight yards, upon a parallel line, from the gentleman who was wounded. His majesty was on horseback, and the musket which fired the ball, must not only have been pointed low, but could not have been directed against his person.

In the evening of that day, the king and queen, and the princesses Augusta, Elizabeth, Mary, and Amelia, with their usual attendants, went to the theatre to see a comedy. Just as his majesty had entered the box, and while he was bowing to the audience, a person who sat in the second row from the orchestra, but towards the middle of the pit, stood up, and levelling a horse pistol towards the king's box, fired it; but, providentially, a gentleman who sat next him, (Mr. Holroyd of Scotland Yard), had the presence of mind to raise the arm of the assassin, so as to direct the contents of the pistol towards the roof of the box. The audience continued for a few seconds in a state of alarm and suspence. The queen was at that instant making her entry; and the curtain rising, as generally arranged on such occasions, when his majesty waved his hand, as a signal to dissuade her from immediately appearing; and, instantly standing erect, raised his right hand to his breast, and continued for some time in a bowing attitude to the spectators, to shew to the audience that he had not received any injury. Her majesty now entered, and appeared much agitated, clasping her hands with great emotion. On the entry of the princesses, the confusion had not subsided; and, on being informed of the cause, Augusta fainted, but was soon recovered by the tender assiduities of her sister Elizabeth, and the ladies in waiting. Princess Mary also swooned at the alarming communication, but was speedily recovered. The offender was immediately seized, and hurried over the palisadoes, into the music-room.

A considerable degree of confusion ensued for a time, but one of the comedians asserting that the person who fired the pistol was in safe custody, the performances were suffered to go on without further interruption. Mr. Tamplite, a trumpeter in the band, who assisted in taking the offender over the orchestra, recognized him to be a soldier, and pulling open his coat, found he had on a military waistcoat, with the button of the fifteenth light dragoons. On being questioned by Mr. Sheridan, he said, "he had no objection to tell who he was—it was not over yet—there was a great deal more, and worse to be done. His name was James Hadfield; he had served his time to a working silversmith, but had enlisted into the fifteenth light dragoons, and had fought for his king and country." At this time the prince of Wales and duke of York entered the room. He immediately turned to the duke, and said, "I know your royal highness—God bless you! I have served with your highness, and (pointing to a deep cut over his eye, and another long scar on his cheek, said) I got these, and more than these, in fighting by your side. At Lincelles, I was left three hours among the dead in a ditch, and was taken prisoner by the French. I had my arm broken by a shot; and eight sabre wounds in my head; but I recovered, and here I am." He now began to shew manifest signs of mental derangement. Being asked who his father was, he said, "he had been postilion to some duke;" but could not say to what duke. He talked in a mysterious way of dreams, and of a great commission he had received in his sleep; that he knew he was to be a martyr, and was to be persecuted like his great master Jesus Christ—William Wake, the person of whom he had bought the pistols, being brought into the room, was examined. He said that the prisoner had bought a pair of pistols of him, and that he had said they were for his young master, who would give him a blunderbuss for them; but he had not yet got the blunderbuss. He knew very little of Hadfield, but knew where he worked, and had heard a good character of him; but that the least strong liquor affected his head. Several persons, from the house of Mrs. Mason, his acquaintance, confirmed this fact; and said, they ascribed it to the very severe wounds he had received in the head. Search being afterwards made for the slugs, a mark was discovered in the top of the canopy over the royal box; and, in the orchestra below, a flattened and irregular piece of lead was found, supposed to have recoiled from the place where it struck.

An address of congratulation was unanimously agreed to be presented to his majesty by the lords and commons, on his happy escape from the effects of lamentable insanity; and the city of London, in common council assembled, resolved to address his majesty on the same occasion.

James Hadfield who fired the pistol, was afterwards brought to trial before lord Kenyon, in the court of King's Bench; when the chief justice expressed his full conviction of his insanity; but in the present case, which alike concerns the king upon his throne, and the beggar at his gate, he could not think of discharging him: he must be disposed of, added he, in such a manner, that relief may be administered to his unfortunate case. My brothers agree in thinking with me, that he was not so far under the guidance of reason, as to be capable of knowing what he did: therefore the court are of opinion, that he should be carried to his late place of confinement, till he can be farther disposed of. He was therefore conducted to a coach, and conveyed back to prison.

Although the proceedings of the British parliament concerning an union with Ireland, were rendered abortive by the opposition of the Irish legislature in 1799, that business was introduced into the parliament of Ireland, on the 5th of February, 1800, by a message from the lord lieutenant, in which his excellency stated, that he had it in command from his majesty, to acquaint both houses of legislature, with the resolutions of the British parliament, and to express his wish that they would take the important measure into their most serious consideration. After a spirited debate, the ministry prevailed by a majority of forty-three. The great abilities of Mr. Grattan were eminently exerted on this interesting occasion. In a debate which occurred on the 17th of February, on proposing the first article of the union, he opposed the measure with such vehemence, that the chancellor of the exchequer (Mr. Corry) accused him of associating with traitors, and of disaffection to the government. The reply of Mr. Grattan was so pointed and severe, that the chancellor thought proper to resent it by a challenge. A duel was the consequence; five shots were exchanged, and the chancellor was wounded in the arm. The question was carried by a majority of one hundred and sixty-one against one hundred and fifteen; and as the discussion proceeded, the numbers of the opposition appeared to diminish. The last struggle was made on the 13th, when sir John Parnell, who had resigned the office of chancellor of the exchequer, moved to petition his majesty to call a new parliament, that the sense of their constituents might be more fully ascertained; but this motion was overruled by a majority of forty-six.

While these things were carrying on, the business proceeded with little opposition in the house of lords, and on the 24th of March, both houses adopted the whole of the articles of union, with very trifling alteration. In the course of a few days, both houses repaired to the lord lieutenant with a joint address, which was afterwards transmitted to Great Britain, and no time was lost by the minister in submitting the measures again to the British parliament, which, after a minute discussion, and very spirited debates in both houses, were sanctioned by a great majority; and, on the 2nd of July, the royal assent was given for a legislative union with Ireland, the articles of which were to the following effect:
